A. Yes, sir; that book was sent me this year.

According to Dr. Wigglesworth's Table, which has been adopted by this court, the expectancy of life of a man at twenty-nine years old is thirty and sixty-six hundredths years. The evidence objected to showed that the expectancy of life at twenty-nine years was nearly six years longer. When the action is to recover for the death of a person injured, as the measure of recovery is the value of his capacity to earn money, standard tables, showing the ordinary expectancy of life, are held to be competent. Where, as in this case, there is proof tending to show that the plaintiff's capacity to earn money is impaired or partially destroyed, the probable expectancy of life is equally competent; for the measure of recovery here is in part compensation for the impairment of his capacity to earn money. If, as is conceded, evidence of the ordinary expectation of life may be received where the capacity to earn money is destroyed by death, it is hard to see why such evidence cannot be equally received where the capacity to earn money is partially destroyed; for in either case the jury are, in making up their verdict, to be governed by the capacity to earn money which has been destroyed, and whether this is a partial or total destruction is not material. Greer v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 94 Ky. 169, 42 Am. St. Rep. 345, 21 S. W. 649.

The Carlisle Mortality Tables are based upon actual observation in the towns of Northampton and Carlisle, England. The deaths were taken, not from selected lives, but from the population generally. These tables have been very generally admitted by the courts of this country. Lincoln v. Power, 151 U. S. 436, 38 L. ed. 224, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 387; 17 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 900. The field, however, was so narrow that they have never been regarded as satisfactory. It is a matter of common knowledge that the expectancy of life is increasing. The American Table of Mortality has been made out from the combined experience of the life insurance companies of America, and is now regarded as the standard throughout the United States. It is true that it is based on insurable lives or healthy persons. Still, there is no great difference between it and the Carlisle Table, as by the Carlisle Table the expectancy of life of a person twenty-nine years old is thirty-five years. In cases of this character the aim of the court is to get the best information attainable. The American Tables of Mortality have been recognized by many of the courts of the country as perhaps the best means of arriving at the expectancy of life. The Wigglesworth Tables were made before 1858. Since then there has been great advance in medical science, and the data upon which such tables are calculated are much fuller now than then. The court, as information increases, will use that table which is the best and most reliable. The American Mortality Table was held competent in the case of Greer v. Louisville & N. R. Co. supra, and this case was followed in Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Gordon, 24 Ky. L. Rep. 1819, 72 S. W. 311. After maturely reconsidering the subject, we have reached the conclusion to follow the rule heretofore laid down, and to hold that in each case the expectancy of life may be shown, as any other fact, by the best evidence obtainable, and that, as improved tables come into use which are of standard authority, they may be given in evidence, instead of the older tables which they supersede.

Such tables show only the probable continuance of life, and not the duration of ability to earn money. They show the probable duration of life of healthy persons who are insurable risks; and the court, when requested, should tell the jury what the table shows, and that it is to be considered by them, in connection with the other proof in the case, for what it may be worth, considering the plaintiff's state of health and circumstances, in determining the probable duration of his capacity to earn money. 3 Wigram, Ev. § 1698; Gordon v. Tweedy, 74 Ala. 232, 49 Am. Rep. 813.

The court allowed the plaintiff to prove by a witness that Williams, long after the accident, acknowledged to backing his engine out on the main track on the time of the train, saying he forgot the dead time the train had there. This was no part of the res gestæ, and the admission by the servant was incompetent against the master. Chesapeake & O. R. Co. v. Smith, 101 Ky. 111, 30 S. W. 832. The evidence was, however, competent against Williams, who was sued jointly with the railroad company; but, when it was admitted by the court without any admonition, the jury would understand it to be competent against all the defendants. In admitting the evidence the court should have cautioned the jury that it could only be considered against the defendant Williams, and not against the other defendant. Cincinnati, N. O. & T. P. R. Co. v. Cook, 113 Ky. 161, 67 S. W. 383. It often happens, in suits against two defendants, that evidence of admissions is competent against the one who made them, and not competent against his codefendant; yet it is everyday practice to admit it, with proper admonition to the jury as to the defendant against whom it may be considered. There is nothing in this class of cases to except it out of the general rule, but it is a serious error for the court to admit the evidence without cautioning the jury as to the person against whom it may be considered. Illinois C. R. Co. v. Winslow, 27 Ky. L. Rep. 329, 84 S. W. 1175. The statement was made in a deposition. The writing is the best evidence. If proper foundation was laid, the statement might be used to discredit Williams as a witness; but the court should tell the jury it is not in this event to be considered as substantive testimony.

On the question of damages, the court, after directing the jury to find compensatory damages, added these words to the instruction: "If the jury believe from the evidence that the said collision was caused by the gross negligence of the defendant railroad company's agents or servants in charge of the engine with which passenger train collided on the occasion in controversy, then and in that event the jury may, in addition to compensatory damages, if any, award the plaintiff punitive damages against said defendant Illinois Central Railroad Company, not exceeding, however, in the aggregate $15,000, the amount claimed." As to whether there was enough in the evidence to warrant the awarding of punitive damages the court is equally divided. But when an instruction is given as to punitive damages the court should clearly tell the jury that the giving of punitive damages is a matter of discretion; and in this case the court should tell the jury that, if they believe, from the evidence, that the collision was caused by the gross negligence of the railroad company or its servants in charge of the engine, then, in addition to compensatory damages, if any, the jury may or may not, in its discretion, award the plaintiff punitive damages in such sum as, under all the evidence, they deem right, not exceeding, however, $15,000, the amount claimed in the petition. On another trial the first and second instructions will be combined in one instruction, as this will simplify the matter somewhat for the jury.

It is earnestly insisted that the verdict of the jury is palpably excessive, the result of passion and prejudice. In view of the uncertainty of the evidence as to the extent of the plaintiff's injuries, or as to what his condition will permanently be, we are of opinion that the verdict is excessive, and that, on the whole case, a new trial should be awarded.

Judgment reversed, and cause remanded for further proceedings consistent herewith.

GEORGIA SUPREME COURT.

W. L. TIMMERMAN, Plff. in Err.,

v.

G. W. H. STANLEY.

1. Contract — abandonment — action for breach.

If one agreed to teach another in certain lines of instruction until the pupil was proficient in them, and, after beginning the course and receiving payment in full, abandoned the contract and refused to teach the

Headnotes by LUMPKIN, J.:

Case Note.—The court in the above case points out with clearness the distinctions which are recognized in cases of rescission or abandonment of a contract, with respect to the necessity of restoring or tendering back what has been received by the party who asserts the right to rescind. The duty in general to restore the status in order to rescind is clearly established; but as an exception to this general rule the court clearly states that, where one party abandons the contract, he should not complain that the other party is willing to treat it as rescinded. The question of the right to student longer, the latter would have a right to treat the action of the teacher as a rescission, and bring suit for the amount which had been paid by him.

2. Same—inconsistent remedies.

If one of two contracting parties claims that the other has committed a breach of the contract, he cannot, in the same action, both treat the contract as rescinded and sue for the amount paid by him to the other party, and at the same time rely on the contract as existing.

3. Same—pleading.

The allegations of the declaration in this case make it a suit for the amount paid to the defendant by the plaintiff, treating the contract as rescinded. In addition, the plaintiff sought to recover certain damages resulting from a breach of the contract, treating it as of force. The latter claim should have been stricken on demurrer, as inconsistent with the former.

4. Same—demurrer—election.

The demurrer was not general for misjoinder of causes of action, so as to put the plaintiff upon his election, but was for inconsistency in joining certain claims with another, which had first been made, and which it was claimed determined the character of the action.

5. Same—rescission—restoration.

As a general rule, where one party asserts a right to rescind a contract for non-performance by the other of his covenant, the party seeking rescission must restore or tender back to the other party what has been received from him, so as to restore the parties to the condition in which they were before the contract was made. But this rule has no application to a case where one agrees to teach another a certain thing, and, after beginning the course of instruction, refuses to proceed further, whereupon the other party treats the contract as rescinded, and brings suit to recover the amount which he has paid under the agreement.

6. Same—pleading—damages.

Under the principles above announced there was no error in striking from the declaration certain claims for expenses in attending school, expenses pending suit, and delay in being prepared for business; but the entire case should not have been dismissed.

7. Same—copy of contract.

It does not appear that there was any con-rescind or abandon the contract because of the other party's default has been considered in a great number of cases, which have been carefully considered and weighed in the note to Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. v. Richards, 30 L. R. A. 33. This shows that there are many cases which sufficiently establish the distinction which the court makes in the above case. In general they hold that, if the act of one party be such as necessarily to prevent the other from performing on his part according to the terms of the agreement, the contract may be considered as rescinded, and suit may be brought against tract in writing, and a demurrer on the ground that a copy of it was not attached as an exhibit was not well founded.

(August 5, 1905.)

ERROR to the City Court of Macon to review a judgment in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover damages for breach of contract. Reversed.

Statement by Lumpkin, J.:

Timmerman brought suit against Stanley, alleging as follows: On July 29, 1903, the plaintiff bought of the defendant a scholarship in Stanley's Business College, in the city of Macon, in the telegraphic department, which embraced a course in learning telegraphy in said college. On August 12, 1903, he bought of the defendant a scholarship in the shorthand department in said college, which embraced a course in learning stenography, typewriting, etc. "The said scholarships were delivered to petitioner under the contract that a full course might be taken by him until he was proficient in said lines selected, without a limit of time." Stanley is the proprietor of the college, and the scholarships were sold by him to the plaintiff for the sum of $64. On August 2, 1904, the plaintiff was expelled by the defendant from the college for no fault or cause on his part. He had violated no rules of the college, nor had he been guilty of any conduct to authorize the expulsion. He had not completed the courses prescribed by the scholarships, and at the time of his expulsion was still pursuing his studies at the college. "Petitioner shows that said Stanley refuses to pay back to your petitioner the $64 paid for said scholarships, and to which your petitioner is entitled on account of said Stanley failing to carry out said agreement in said scholarships; and petitioner prays for a judgment against said Stanley for said sum." By the breach of the contract defendant has damaged plaintiff in the sum of $500. Plaintiff has paid out $300 for board and expenses in attending the school in order to qualify himself for business. By reason of the expulsion he cannot now finish his courses, so as to enter business, as other business colleges will not receive him after being expelled from this one. He is now at a monthly expense of $15, and will be so up to the time of the hearing of this action. "He prays for a judgment for said sum against the said Stanley." By reason of the breach of the contract defendant has delayed plaintiff in finishing his course so as to enter business for the current year, to his injury in the sum of $500. The defendant demurred to the declaration generally, and also specially. The demurrer to that part of the declaration which seeks to recover the price paid for the scholarships was based on the ground that such price was not the legal measure of damages to which the plaintiff was entitled, if entitled to anything under the declaration. The allegation as to the expenditure of $300 for board and expenses was demurred to on the ground that such items were not elements of damage for an expulsion from the college, and "because the plaintiff, having elected to disaffirm and rescind said contract by suing for recovery of the price paid for said certificate, cannot bring an action for a breach of said contract arising under said certificate;" because of an action for said expenses was an action inconsistent with a suit for the recovery of the purchase price of said scholarship, and cannot be joined in the same declaration. The allegation that the plaintiff could not enter any other business college was demurred to because it did not constitute an element of damage, for the same reasons. The allegation as to the monthly expense of $15 was demurred to for the same reason, and also be-the party in fault for money or property that he has already received under the contract. But this suit is in the nature of an action on the common counts, such as indebitatus assumpsit or quantum meruit. A few of the cases to this effect are Wright v. Haskell, 45 Me. 489; Miller v. Thompson, 22 Ark. 258; Dubois v. Delaware & H. Canal Co. 4 Wend. 285; Drew v. Claggett, 39 N. H. 431; Waggeman v. Janssen, 74 Ill. App. 41.

In support of this doctrine Wharton on Contracts, § 712, says: "When a contract has been in part performed, but the completion of the performance has been prevented by the action of one of the parties, then the other party may waive the contract as originally settled, and sue on an indebitatus count for simply the consideration actually received by the other party."

Bishop on Contracts, § 834, says: "Where rescinding is permissible, and it has been lawfully made by the party not in fault,—or unlawfully by the other party,—the one entitled may recover back the consideration or whatever else he has paid on the contract, including compensation for work done, goods delivered, and the like, prior to the rescission."

Pingrey on Extraordinary Industrial and Interstate Contracts, § 599, states the doctrine as follows: "When one party to an entire executory contract has failed to perform on his part, and the other party is not in default, and in a condition to rescind, he may abandon the contract, and bring an action of assumpsit to recover back what he has paid thereunder, whenever assumpsit will lie independent of the contract."

cause expenses incurred by the plaintiff subsequently to the alleged breach of contract cannot be an element of damage therein. The allegation of damage by reason of delay in plaintiff's finishing his course was demurred to because the alleged damages were too remote and consequential, and not capable of exact computation; because they are not the legal and natural results of the alleged act; and because they are inconsistent with the damages laid in the paragraph seeking to recover the purchase price of the scholarships, and cannot be joined in the same action. The declaration was also demurred to because no copy of the contract was set out as an exhibit. The demurrer was sustained, and the plaintiff excepted.

Mr. M. G. Bayne, for plaintiff in error:

There was a right of action for breach of the contract.

The damages directly traceable to the breach, such as the expenses of attending the school, railroad fare, etc., were a loss recoverable by plaintiff.

Messrs. Davis & Miller, for defendant in error:

Rescission for nonperformance is not allowable after there has been part performance.

Code, § 3712; 21 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, pp. 84, 91.

Lumpkin, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

1-5. Assuming the allegations of the declaration to be true, as we must do in considering the demurrer, each of the contracts evidenced by the two scholarships was entire, and when the defendant repudiated them, the plaintiff had the right to treat his action as a rescission, and bring suit for the amount which had been paid by him. Supreme Council A. L. of H. v. Jordan, 117 Ga. 808, 45 S. E. 33. Or he might sue for a breach of the contract. Alabama Gold L. Ins. Co. v. Garmany, 74 Ga. 51. In the latter event, that decision holds that in some cases the amount paid by the plaintiff may be considered in fixing the amount of the damages. In 8 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 632, it is said: "As has been said more than once, the fundamental principle of damages is compensation to the injured party. This rule in the present connection is simply the application of the principle stated to contracts, that is, the measure of damages in such cases is the value of the 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

bargain to the complaining party, or the loss which a fulfilment of the contract would have prevented or the breach of it has entailed. Or, as it has been said, the general intent of the law, which gives damages in actions for breach of contract, is to put the injured party, so far as it can be done by money, in the same position as if the contract had been performed. According to this principle, the measure of damages for breach of a contract is not, as a general rule, the consideration paid, but rather the value of the thing contracted for, unless, indeed, the plaintiff has, under the circumstances, a right to disaffirm the contract, and sues to recover the consideration paid." The plaintiff cannot in the same action both treat the contract as rescinded and rely on it. Harden v. Lang, 110 Ga. 392, 36 S. E. 100. It is not quite easy to determine whether this action is one for breach of the contract, or one for the recovery of the purchase price of the scholarships, based on the idea of a rescission, coupled with an effort to sue for the breach of the contract in the same action. It has been held that suit to recover the purchase price is equivalent to an express disaffirmance, and that after such a disaffirmance there cannot be a proceeding to enforce the contract, either by an equitable proceeding to compel specific performance or by an action for damages. 24 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 645, note 5. The plaintiff alleged that the defendant refused to pay back to him the $64 paid for the scholarships, to which the plaintiff is entitled; and he prays for a judgment for that specific sum, not as damages, or as a part of his damages, or as throwing light on the amount of damages, but as a return of the purchase money. Taking the pleadings most strongly against the pleader, the statement that the defendant refuses to pay back the amount to him implied that a demand had been made. We are of the opinion, therefore, that this part of the declaration treats the contract as at an end, and seeks to recover the amount paid by the plaintiff to the defendant under it. Such being the case, the particular portion of the declaration which sues for the recovery of such amount is not subject to demurrer on the ground urged against it.

It is contended, in the brief of counsel for the defendant in error, that there can be no recovery of the amount paid because, in order to rescind the contract, the plaintiff must restore the status, and must tender back to the defendant what he has received from him, and that this cannot be done in the present case. Civil Code 1895, § 3712. This is a general rule where one party to the contract has received goods, money, or other thing of value, which is capable of being returned to the other party. But in a contract like that involved in the present case, where a person agrees to teach another a certain thing, to qualify him for a certain position, if he gives the student some instruction and then refuses to complete his contract, there would be no possible way by which such instruction as he had given could be returned or tendered back to him; nor is the other party required to estimate value for what has been done and tender such amount. He cannot hold onto the amount paid, refuse to proceed with the contract, and defend against an action to recover the price paid on the ground that the plaintiff had not tendered back to him his instruction, and could not restore him to the status quo. He cannot by his own conduct place himself in a situation where restoration is impossible, repudiate the contract, and set up this situation as a defense to a suit for the amount paid. If he abandons the contract, he should not complain that the other party is willing to treat it as rescinded. The Code section cited has no application in such a case. Henderson Warehouse Co. v. Brand, 105 Ga. 217, 224, 31 S. E. 551. The cases of Alabama Gold L. Ins. Co. v. Garmany, 74 Ga. 51, and Supreme Council A. L. of H. v. Jordan, 117 Ga. 808, 45 S. E. 33, are also in point as to this contention.

It was argued that there was a misjoinder of causes of action; but the demurrer does not make this objection to the entire declaration. It attacks the effort to recover the money paid by the plaintiff to the defendant on the ground already considered. It then attacks other parts of the declaration on the ground that, the action being one based on a rescission of the contract, the items of damage claimed could not be properly joined with the suit for the money paid. This contention, if sustained, would result in striking those particular items, but not in dismissing the entire action for a misjoinder of causes of action. It is not the same thing to say that a declaration contains two inconsistent causes of action, and to put the plaintiff on his election to dismiss one of them, or have the entire suit dismissed; and to say that the action is of a particular character, and that certain other claims cannot be added to it.

6. From what has been said it is evident that the claim for expenses in attending school, expenses pending the suit, and delay in being prepared for business cannot be joined with the action for the return of the purchase price, based upon a rescission of the contract. Moreover, the allegations of the declaration with respect to those items are quite vague and general, and a part of the damages would not be recoverable, even 1 L.R.A. (N.S.) in an action based on a breach of the contract. The dismissal of the entire case was erroneous. The claim to recover the items of damage just referred to should have been stricken, and the case left to stand on the suit for the return of the price paid for the scholarships.

7. It does not affirmatively appear that there was a written contract, and the ground of the demurrer that no copy of it was attached as an exhibit is not well founded.

Judgment reversed with directions.

Headnote by CANDLER, J.

Case. Note.—McQuillin in his work on Municipal Ordinances, § 498, p. 783, says that "perhaps on no single topic of municipal corporation law have there been so many discordant utterances, even by the same courts and the same individual judges." as on this question of the right of a municipality to enact ordinances on a subject covered by state law. As the cases are practically harmonious in holding that such ordinances are valid where there has been a proper grant of power by the legislature, and the conflict arises in deciding what constitutes a sufficient grant of power,—which, of course, must be determined in each case by the wording of the particular charter or law by which the power is conferred,—it is difficult to lay down any general rules. But a carefully guarded statement of the conclusions that may legitimately be drawn from this mass of conflicting authorities is found in Dillon on Municipal Corporations, vol. 1, § 368. The author says: "In view of the somewhat strict construction of grants of corporate powers, elsewhere explained and illustrated, and of the subordinate nature and purposes of by-laws, the following rules, although seeming to rest on sound principles, are, in view of the decisions, stated with some distrust of their entire correctness: 1. A general grant of power, such as mere authority to make by-or telephone bets, on races of any sort, is an act prohibited by Penal Code 1895, § 398; and such an act cannot, in the absence of express legislative authority, properly be made penal by a municipal ordinance.

(November 8, 1905.)

WRITS of error to the Superior Court for Fulton County to review a judgment denying writs of certiorari to review judgments of the Recorder's Court of Atlanta convicting defendants of violating a municipal ordinance. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Reuben R. Arnold, for plaintiffs in error:

A municipality, in the absence of express laws, or authority to make by-laws for the good government of the place, and the like, should not be held to confer authority upon the corporation to make an ordinance punishing an act—for example, an assault and battery—which is made punishable as a criminal offense by the laws of the state. The intention of the state that the general laws shall not extend to the inhabitants of municipal corporations, or that these corporations shall have the power, by ordinance, to supersede the state law, will not be inferred from grants of power general in their character; nor will such authority in the corporation be held to exist as an implied or incidental right. 2. Where the act is, in its nature, one which constitutes two offenses, one against the state and one against the municipal government, the latter may be constitutionally authorized to punish it, though it be also an offense under the state law; but the legislative intention that this may be done ought to be manifest and unmistakable, or the power in the corporation should be held not to exist. 3. Where the act or matter covered by the charter or ordinance and by the state law is not essentially criminal in its nature, and is one which is generally confided to the supervision and control of the local government of cities and towns, but is also of a nature to require general legislation, the intention that the municipal government should have power to make new, further, and more definite regulations, and enforce them by appropriate penalties, will be inferred from language which would not be sufficient were the matter one not specially relating to corporate duties and fully provided for by the general laws."

In view of the hopeless conflict on the question of the sufficiency of the grant of power,—that is, whether the delegation of authority to legislate on any particular subject must be made in express terms, or whether it may be inferred from the general grant of power to provide for the welfare and good government of the city,—it will be impossible to do more than give some illustrations of the decisions of the various courts.

That a general grant of power is not sufficient to sustain such an ordinance, but that there must be some express legislative authority, has been decided in Re Sic, 73 Cal. 142, 14 Pac. 405; Savannah v. Hussey, 21 Ga. 80, 68 Am. Dec. 452; Reich v. State, 53 Ga. 73, 21 Am. Rep. 265; Kahn v. Macon, 95 Ga. 419, 22 S. E. 641; Moran v. Atlanta, 102 Ga. 840, 30 S. E. 298; Kassell v. Savannah, 109 Ga. 491, 35 S. E. 147; 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

For some cases sustaining an ordinance on a subject covered by a state statute, though there is no express delegation of authority, see Mobile v. Allaire, 14 Ala. 400 (sustaining power to impose fine for assault and battery, under authority to enact ordinances "for the good government of the place"); Van Buren v. Wells, 53 Ark. 368, 22 Am. St. Rep. 214, 14 S. W. 38 (sustaining ordinances punishing disturbances of peace, carrying concealed weapons, and keeping open saloons on Sunday, under grant of general authority to secure inhabitants against robbers, burglars, and persons violating the peace, and to preserve safety, health, prosperity, and morals of the inhabitants); Theisen v. McDavid, 34 Fla. 440, 26 L. R. A. 234, 16 So. 321 (sustaining ordinance forbidding any merchant or shopkeeper to keep open store or dispose of any wares or merchandise on Sunday, under authority to pass ordinances for preservation of the public peace and morals, and for the good government of the city. The court said that, were it not for the use of the word "morals" in the grant of power, they would have some hesitancy in sustaining the ordinance); Bloomfield v. Trimble, 54 Iowa, 399, 37 Am. Rep. 212, 6 N. W. 586 (sustaining ordinance for arrest and punishment of persons found intoxicated, under authority to preserve peace and order, prevent riots, etc., and promote the safety, health, morals, and comfort of the inhabitants); St. Louis v. Bentz, 11 Mo. 61 (sustaining ordinance punishing vagrants, under power "to regulate the police of the city," although general law provided that vagrants might be proceeded against before a justice of the peace. But see Jefferson City v. Courtmire, 9 Mo. 692, holding that, under power "to regulate police of the city," city had no right to enact ordinance to punish summarily offense made indictable by general laws of state); St. Louis v. Cafferata, 24 Mo. 94 (holding general welfare clause sufficient to sustain ordinance as to keeping open place of business on Sunday); St. Louis v. Schoenbusch, 95 Mo. 618, 8 S. W. 791 (holding general welfare clause sufficient to sustain ordinance prohibiting cruelty to animals); Brownville v. Cook, 4 Neb. 101 (ordinance imposing fine on any person wilfully, maliciously, or mischievously meddling with or trespassing upon personal or real property of another sustained under general welfare clause); Abbeville v. Leopard, 61 S. C. 106, 39 S. E. 248 (ordinance prohibiting carrying of concealed weapons sustained under general welfare clause); Greenville v. Kemmis, 58 S. C. 427, 50 L. R. A. 725, 36 S. E. 727 (ordinance making it an offense to permit gaming in any place or house sustained under general welfare clause); Seattle v. Chin Let, 19 Wash. 38, 52 Pac. 524 (sustaining ordinance imposing fine on any person connected with a lottery, under charter authority to pass ordinances for the punishment of all persons dangerous to public safety or health, and for the preservation of public morality); State ex rel. Milwaukee v. Newman, 96 Wis. 269, 71 N. W. 438 (sustaining ordinance providing penalty for keeping of gaming house, passed under authority of general welfare clause); McLaughlin v. Stephens, 2 Cranch, C. C. 148, Fed. Cas. No. 8,874 (sustaining ordinance prohibiting keeping of gaming tables in the town, under charter authority to make laws requisite for the regulation of morals and police of the town).

Mr. J. L. Mayson, for defendant in error:
The ordinance passed by the city does

And Cooley in his Constitutional Limitations, 7th ed., page 279, says: "Nor will conferring a power upon a corporation to pass by-laws and impose penalties for the regulation of any specified subject necessarily supersede the state law on the same subject; but the state law and the by-law may both stand together if not inconsistent. Indeed, an act may be a penal offense under the laws of the state, and further penalties under proper legislative authority be imposed for its commission by municipal by-laws; and the enforcement of the one would not preclude the enforcement of the other." This he says is the clear weight of authority. And this statement has subsequently been approved by many courts. For some cases holding that where a subject is covered both by ordinance and by state law a prosecution under one does not preclude prosecution under the other, see Gardner v. People, 20 Ill. 430; Mobile v. Allaire, supra; Anderson v. O'Donnell, 29 S. C. 355, 1 L. R. A. 632, 13 Am. St. Rep. 728, 7 S. E. 523; State ex rel. Milwaukee v. Newman, supra; United States v. Wells, 2 Cranch, C. C. 45, Fed. Cas. No. 16,662; Hamilton v. State, 3 Tex. App. 643 (holding offense against the proper police regulations of a municipality, 1 L.R.A. (N.S.) not undertake to make penal that which is made penal by the state under the head of gaming houses. On the contrary, the city leaves to the state the regulations of gaming houses, and undertakes to make illegal bookmaking at any other place or point of meeting. The city can do this.

Rothschild v. Darien, supra; Hill v. Dalton, 72 Ga. 314; Braddy v. Milledgeville, 74 Ga. 519; Mayson v. Atlanta, 77 Ga. 666:

which is also a violation of the penal laws, may be prosecuted under either): Brownville v. Cook, supra; State v. Wister, 62 Mo. 592; Van Buren v. Wells, supra; McInerney v. Denver, 17 Colo. 302, 29 Pac. 516; Theisen v. McDavid, supra. Contra, State v. Cowen, 29 Mo. 330; State v. Thornton, 37 Mo. 360; Ex parte Freeland, 38 Tex. Crim. Rep. 321, 42 S. W. 295. And, in Rice v. State, 3 Kan. 141, the court said it was not necessary in that case to decide whether both could punish for the same act, but added: "We have no doubt but that the one which shall first obtain jurisdiction of the person accused may punish to the extent of its power."

Where the manifest intention of the legislature is that the prosecution shall be limited exclusively to one jurisdiction, that intention must prevail. State v. Gordon, 60 Mo. 383.

That an ordinance is not impliedly repealed by the subsequent enactment of the state statute on the same subject is decided in People v. Hanrahan, 75 Mich. 611, 4 L. R. A. 751, 42 N. W. 1124; State v. Fourcade, 45 La. Ann. 726, 40 Am. St. Rep. 249, 13 So. 187. Contra, Hood v. Von Glahn, 88 Ga. 406, 14 S. E. 564; Strauss v. Waycross, 97 Ga. 475, 25 S. E. 329; Southport v. Ogden, 23 Conn. 128.

The constitutional right of the state to delegate to a municipality power to regulate by ordinance subjects which are already covered by the state law is sustained by the great weight of authority. For some authorities to this effect, see McInerney v. Denver, Theisen v. McDavid, and Hood v. Von Glahn, supra; Re Jahn, 55 Kan. 604, 41 Pac. 956; Rogers v. Jones, 1 Wend. 237, 19 Am. Dec. 493; Brooklyn v. Toynbee, 31 Barb. 282; Ex parte Douglass, 1 Utah, 108.

But power of the legislature to confer upon a city authority to make an offense against the city an act which the general state law makes an offense against the state, triable only in a court of record, is denied in Ex parte Fagg, 38 Tex. Crim. Rep. 573, 40 L. R. A. 212, 44 S. W. 294, where the state Constitution provides that all prosecutions shall be conducted in the name and by the authority of the state. And the power of the legislature to confer special authority to pass local laws which shall exclude general laws of the state on particular subjects is questioned in Washington v. Hammond, 76 N. C. 34.

Mabra v. Atlanta, 78 Ga. 683, 4 S. E. 154; Hood v. Von Glahn, 88 Ga. 411, 14 S. E. 564; Reeves v. Atlanta, 114 Ga. 851, 40 S. E. 1003.

Mr. W. P. Hill also for defendant in error.

Candler, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiffs in error, Thrower and Jones, were tried in the recorder's court of the city of Atlanta for the alleged violation of a municipal ordinance, of which the following is a copy: "It shall be unlawful for any person, firm, or corporation, agent or employee thereof, to maintain or carry on any office or place of business, or to have a space or portion of the office, store, or place of business of another, or to maintain a place or point of meeting, in or at which any person or persons is or are allowed to bet, or offer to bet, or place an order for a bet, or telegraph or telephone bets, on horse races, boat races, bicycle races, or any kind or description of race, whether such race is to be run in the city of Atlanta or any place outside of said city." They were adjudged guilty and fined by the recorder, whereupon they presented to the judge of the superior court of Fulton county their petitions for certiorari, which were denied, and they excepted. As the evidence in the two cases was identical, and both are governed by the same principles of law, they will be considered together.

In the view that we take of this case it is not necessary to consider the question whether the evidence introduced on the trial was sufficient to show a violation of the ordinance which has been quoted. We are confronted by the broader question whether the ordinance was invalid, in that it undertook to make penal that which was already prohibited by the state law making penal the keeping of a gaming house; and this question we feel constrained to decide in the affirmative. The very evident purpose of the ordinance was to prevent the maintenance of a "place" of any sort, whether on premises owned by another, on the public streets, or elsewhere, where betting of the character designated was permitted. That this is fully covered by the statute against keeping a gaming house (Penal Code 1895, § 398) has been distinctly held by this court. In Thrower v. State, 117 Ga. 756, 45 S. E. 126, which was an indictment under Penal Code 1895, § 398, for keeping a gaming house, Mr. Justice Lamar, speaking for the court, said: "In prohibiting a gaming house it is intended to prevent the maintenance of a place at which persons come together for the purpose of hazarding and betting money." Clearly, then, if the plaintiffs in error in the present cases were guilty of a violation of the municipal ordinance which has been quoted, they are guilty of a violation of the state law against keeping a gaming house; and the familiar principle that a municipality may not prohibit by ordinance that which is already made penal by state statute, unless there is express and specific legislative authority for the same, will apply.

The case of Penniston v. Newnan, 117 Ga. 700, 45 S. E. 65, is closely in point. There an ordinance of the city of Newnan provided that it should be unlawful for any person to keep an open business house on the Sabbath Day, or to trade or traffic on that day, or to work or cause work to be done on the Sabbath; the ordinance containing a proviso that it should not prevent the sale of drugs or the carrying on of works of necessity on the Sabbath Day. The accused, who was the proprietor of a drug store, kept open his place of business on the Sabbath Day, and his clerks therein sold tobacco and cigars. He was convicted in the police court, his petition for certiorari was overruled, and he brought the case to this court, where the judgment was reversed, on the ground that the offense proved against him was punishable under Penal Code 1895, § 422, making it penal for any person to pursue his business or the work of his ordinary calling on the Lord's Day, and that it could not be punished by the municipality. The case of Hood v. Von Glahn, 88 Ga. 405, 14 S. E. 564, relied on by counsel for the city, and the more recent one of Littlejohn v. Stells, 123 Ga. 427, 51 S. E. 390 are not in point, for the reason that in those cases the municipal ordinances which were attacked had been authorized by express legislative enactment, while it is not claimed that the city in this case had any such legislative authority. Nor is the case of Odell v. Atlanta, 97 Ga. 670, 25 S. E. 173, in conflict with what is here held. The dictum of Mr. Justice Lumpkin in the Odell Case, to the effect that the city, under the "general welfare" clause of its charter, had the right to break up the "business" of selling pools on horse races, was fully explained in the case of Thrower v. State, 117 Ga. 758, 45 S. E. 126, on the ground that the court in the case first mentioned was dealing solely with the legality of the alleged business or occupation, and did not have before it the question whether the city could make penal acts which were already prohibited by the state law against keeping gaming houses.

From what has been said, it follows that the court erred in refusing to sanction the petition for certiorari.

Judgment reversed.

GEORGIA SUPREME COURT.

JOHN SILVEY et al., Plffs. in Err.,

v.

M. W. TIFT, Trustee, etc., of E. H. Griffin, Bankrupt.

1. Bankruptcy—effect of judgment.

Where creditors filed a petition to have a debtor adjudged an involuntary bankrupt, alleging several acts of bankruptcy, among them being that, while insolvent, he made a preference to a firm, named as creditors, within four months before the filing of the proceedings, and, after adjudication in bankruptcy, the trustee brought suit against such firm, alleging that they received a preference with reasonable ground for believing that it was such, the adjudication in bankruptcy, duly made, was conclusive of the status of the bankrupt as such, but did not estop the defendants from setting up, by way of defense, that, some time prior to the proceedings in bankruptcy, they sold to the bankrupt goods, relying on certain representations made by him, and that they discovered that such representations were untrue, and rescinded the sale on account of fraud, and retook their goods.

2. Bankruptcy—instructions—evidence.

Where such a defense was made, and the defendants sought to show that the purchaser returned to them after the sale and stated that he had made a material misrepresentation, and thereupon they rescinded the sale, in a suit by the trustee in bankruptcy afterwards appointed, against them, as preferred creditors who had taken with reasonable ground to believe that a preference was made, it was error to instruct the jury that they could consider the statement so made solely for the purpose of impeaching the bankrupt, who was a witness for the plaintiff.

3. Sale—fraud—rescission.

If one purchasing goods makes a false representation as to a material matter, and the owner relies on such statement in making the sale, upon discovering the fraud he may rescind and reclaim his property, or so much of it as is still in the hands of the purchaser; or he may elect to continue the contract. If he elects to rescind, he must give notice to the purchaser thereof, and of his determination to reclaim the goods sold; and, if he has received anything in payment, he must return it, or tender it, to the purchaser.

4. Sale—rescission—reclamation.

If a vendor, in reliance upon material misrepresentations, has made a sale, and has rescinded it on discovery of the fraud, but all of the property sold is not in the possession of the purchaser, and some of it has been sold or disposed of by him so as to be beyond the reach of the vendor, the latter may reclaim all of the property which can be recovered. As to that which he cannot recover, he may have a right of action against the purchaser, not upon the contract of sale, but based on the theory of the conversion of the goods not found, or an action based upon the contract implied by law where a vendee has disposed of the goods for money and the seller has waived the tort. He cannot, however, proceed both under the contract of sale and against it.

5. New trial.

While in the present case there may have been sufficient evidence to authorize the verdict, it was not so clearly demanded that a new trial will not result from the errors of law.

Headnotes by LUMPKIN, J.

(August 4, 1905.)

Case Note.—In harmony with SILVEY v. TIFT and the authorities relied upon by the court in that case, is the similar case of Pepperdine v. Bank of Seymour, 100 Mo. App. 387, 73 S. W. 890, where it was held that an adjudication in involuntary bankruptcy for having, while insolvent, permitted a creditor to obtain judgment, is not conclusive as to the creditor's right in property obtained by virtue of such judgment, even though the creditor resisted the proceedings. It was said that the creditor was no party, direct or intermediate, to the bankruptcy proceedings, and, in resisting them, merely exercised a right accorded to all creditors by the statute; and that its rights in that portion of the bankrupt's property involved had attached prior to the adjudication.

And in Harmanson v. Bain, 1 Hughes, 188, Fed. Cas. No. 6,072, an adjudication of bankruptcy reciting a transaction similar to the 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

one in question as an act of bankruptcy was held not to preclude the consideration, in equity, of whether the transaction amounted to a preference, for the reason that the character of the court, the evidence, the parties to the proceeding, and the technical quality of the act itself were different.

An adjudication of bankruptcy is not conclusive evidence of the giving of an unlawful preference, as alleged in the petition, to the creditor whose claim for priority is under consideration. Re Dunkle, 7 Nat. Bankr. Reg. 72, Fed. Cas. No. 4,160.

That a bankrupt is adjudicated upon a petition charging him with making an assignment with intent to defraud does not preclude the assignee from disputing that fact, in proceedings against him for contempt. Re Marter, 12 Nat. Bankr. Reg. 185, Fed. Cas. No. 9,143.

ERROR to the City Court of Atlanta to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to collect assets alleged to have belonged to a bankrupt. Reversed.

Statement by Lumpkin, J.:

Tift, as trustee in bankruptcy of Griffin, brought suit against John Silvey & Company, alleging as follows: On March 15, 1902, Griffin, while insolvent, transferred and delivered to the defendants a portion of a certain stock of goods belonging to him. At the time of the transfer he was insolvent, and the defendants knew and had reasonable cause to believe that such was the case. The effect of the transfer was to enable them to obtain a greater percentage of their debt than the other creditors of the bankrupt of the same class received, and was a preference in contemplation of the act of Congress of July 1, 1898, entitled "An Act to Establish a Uniform System of Bankruptcy throughout the United States." Act July 1, 1898, chap. 541, 30 Stat. at L. 544 (U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 3418). The defendants received this preference, and had reasonable cause to believe that it was intended to give them a preference in contemplation of the act of Congress. They took possession of the property, carried it away, and converted it. On April 29, 1902, certain creditors of Griffin filed a petition in bankruptcy in the district court of the United States, alleging the commission of certain acts of bankruptcy by him, and praying that he be adjudicated a bankrupt. He was duly adjudicated a bankrupt, and the plaintiff was appointed trustee. In that capacity, and under leave of the court, he sues to recover of the defendants the value of the property so taken by them, which is alleged to be $1,400. The plaintiff alleged that the defendants were concluded and estopped from setting up in this suit "any defense in contradiction to the following facts." The petition then contains what appears to be a copy of a part of the petition in bankruptcy. A demurrer having been filed, the entire petition was set out by amendment, which showed that a number of creditors of Griffin filed a petition to have him adjudicated a bankrupt, alleging him to be insolvent. Three acts of bankruptcy were alleged: First, that, within four months next preceding the filing of the petition, Griffin, while insolvent, transferred a portion of his property, namely, a large part of his stock of goods, of the value of $500, to one Weslosky, doing business under the trading name of the Albany Grocery Company, a creditor, with intent to prefer him over his other creditors; second, that, while insolvent and within four months next preceding the filing of the petition, he transferred a portion of his property, namely, about $1,400 worth of hats, shoes, and dry goods, to John Silvey & Company, creditors of his, with intent to prefer them over his other creditors; third, that, while insolvent and within four months next preceding the date of the petition, he suffered and permitted one Turner, a creditor, to obtain a preference through legal proceedings, and did not within five days before the sale of the property vacate or discharge such preference, the levy being under a distress warrant for rent for $127, and being made upon a lot of hats, shoes, dry goods, etc., which were sold under the warrant, and the proceeds applied to the payment thereof. A subpoena issued to the alleged bankrupt on April 29, 1902, and on May 28th he was adjudicated a bankrupt. Later the trustee was regularly appointed. To that portion of the petition which set up an estoppel, a demurrer was urged on the ground that some of the allegations were not properly pleaded, and did not set out facts constituting an estoppel, and merely alleged legal conclusions. The allegations demurred to were as follows: "Petitioner further represents that defendants to this case are concluded and estopped from setting up in this suit any defense in contradiction to the following facts." Also: "The allegations of said petition set out above being necessary allegations of said petition, the said John Silvey & Company could then and there have pleaded, in defense to said petition, denial of the facts set out in the allegations of said petition transcribed above, and, having failed in said court to sustain any denial or contradiction of any of said facts and allegations, they are now concluded and estopped from contradicting and denying them, because of the judgment of the district court of the United States of the southern district of Georgia, made in said matter in favor of the petitioners in bankruptcy, declaring said Ernest H. Griffin bankrupt, said judgment being made and rendered duly and regularly by a court of competent jurisdiction." The court overruled the demurrer to the declaration as amended, and exceptions pendente lite were taken. The jury found for the plaintiff $468.68 principal, besides interest. Defendants moved for a new trial, which was refused, and they excepted. They also assigned error on the overruling of the demurrer.

Mr. Shepard Bryan also for defendant in error.

Lumpkin, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

1. The demurrer to the original declaration contained various grounds, but only 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

one is now insisted on. We do not think it good pleading to allege that a defendant is estopped from setting up any defense in contradiction "to the following facts," and then to set out an entire proceeding in bankruptcy, containing various allegations, several grounds for the proceeding, the adjudication, and the appointment of the trustee, and to allege in sweeping terms that the allegations set out are necessary allegations, and that the defendants could have pleaded in defense of them, but failed to do so, and are estopped from contradicting or denying them. This leaves the court to ascertain what defense the pleader deems to be in conflict with "the following facts." Moreover, to copy a part of a proceeding in bankruptcy, and to allege generally that it comprises necessary allegations, is a conclusion. It appears from the order overruling the demurrer that this was done after amendment, from which we presume that it was renewed after the amendment had been made. The real question argued before us was whether the adjudication in bankruptcy was conclusive on the defendants to the effect that the goods sued for belonged to the bankrupt on March 15, 1902, and were transferred by him to them with intent to prefer them as creditors over his other creditors; he being insolvent at the time. Their defense was that they had sold goods to Griffin upon certain representations made by him; that they ascertained that these representations were false, and the goods were therefore procured from them by fraud; and that they thereupon rescinded the sale and retook such of the goods as were on hand, not as a payment or preference to creditors, but as being a taking possession of their own goods. If the plaintiff's contention as to the effect of the adjudication is correct, the defendants would be practically precluded and estopped from defending at all, save possibly on the question of notice; and there would be little to do but take a verdict for the value of the goods. The allegations which he says are necessary, in the petition to have Griffin adjudicated a bankrupt, include not only his insolvency, but also a statement of a transfer by him of a portion of his property to the defendants, the value of the goods so transferred, and that this was a preference. The presiding judge overruled the demurrer.

An adjudication in bankruptcy is in the nature of a proceeding in rem, and the adjudication is in the nature of a decree in rem, so far as it fixes the status of the defendant in the proceeding as a bankrupt. Considered in the light of a proceeding in rem, the res involved is the status of the debtor, and the adjudication determines such status to be that of a bankrupt. All persons are bound by the adjudication to that effect; and this was true under the act of 1867 as well as under the act of 1898. If the court rendering the judgment had jurisdiction, such judgment could not be attacked collaterally, but only by a direct proceeding in a competent court, unless it appeared that the decree was void in form, or that due notice was not given. New Lamp Chimney Co. v. Ansonia Brass & Copper Co. 91 U. S. 656, 23 L. ed. 336; Chapman v. Brewer, 114 U. S. 158, 29 L. ed. 83, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 799; Shawhan v. Wherritt, 7 How. 627, 12 L. ed. 847 (under the act of 1841); Hanover Nat. Bank v. Moyses, 186 U. S. 181, 192, 46 L. ed. 1113, 1121, 22 Sup. Ct. Rep. 857. Where a proceeding in rem is against a particular piece of property, as a vessel, for charges against it, it is generally taken into possession, and the property itself is treated as the defendant, liable for its own debts or defaults; and, after seizure, subsequent proceedings are had by citation to the world, of which the owner is at liberty to avail himself by appearing in the case. In the present case, however, there was no such proceeding in rem against the goods. The proceeding was to determine the status of Griffin as a bankrupt, and it neither was, nor could have been, commenced by a seizure of the property claimed by the defendants. Mankin v. Chandler, 2 Brock. 125, Fed. Cas. No. 9,030; The Sabine (The Mayflower v. The Sabine) 101 U. S. 388, 25 L. ed. 984; Freeman v. Alderson, 119 U. S. 187, 30 L. ed. 373, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 165. To illustrate further, proceedings to appoint an administrator are also in the nature of proceedings in rem, and, where the court has jurisdiction, are not subject to collateral attack. But it will not be contended that if a person applies for administration, and sets out in his petition that the entire estate of the decedent consists of a certain house and lot, the judgment appointing him would establish the title of the estate to the property, if in fact it belonged to another than the decedent. The judgment would establish the status of the applicant as an administrator, and that he was duly appointed, but would not determine the title to the property.

There are two kinds of actions which are commonly spoken of as proceedings in rem. The first is a proceeding against the property without suit against its owner, treating the property as if it were the defendant, but with monition or notice giving any person claiming to be the owner an opportunity to appear. In this class of actions, which are strictly in rem, the judgment is against the property alone. The other class of proceedings in rem are proceedings to determine the status of some person or subject-matter. Such are judgments of outlawry, appointments of guardians, administrators, etc., where the proceeding is to determine status, not title to property. The res which makes it a proceeding in rem is the status, and the determination of status is not a conclusive judgment against third parties as to title. Sometimes a judgment in rem has been defined generally to be an adjudication pronounced upon the status of some particular subject-matter by a tribunal having competent authority for that purpose. Stroupper v. McCauley, 45 Ga. 74, 78; Childs v. Hayman, 72 Ga. 791, 796, 797; Woodruff v. Taylor, 20 Vt. 65. In the act of 1898 it is provided that "the bankrupt, or any creditor, may appear and plead to the petition within ten days after the return day, or within such further time as the court may allow." Act July 1, 1898, chap. 541, § 18b (30 Stat. at L. 551, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 3429, 1 Fed. Stat. Anno. p. 583). The bankrupt and his creditors are those given an opportunity to appear and defend against the adjudication in bankruptcy. The defendants in the present case, however, do not claim to be creditors, or defend as such, but contend that they were defrauded out of certain goods, and upon discovering the fraud rescinded the trade and resumed possession of their own goods. To compel them to admit that they were creditors and received the goods as such would require them to waive their defense before they could make it. In some of the decisions creditors are spoken of as being privies of the bankrupt. Often, however, they claim against the debtor rather than as privies. To hold that creditors could, by the petition in bankruptcy and the adjudication, conclusively subject the property of third parties, and make it a part of the estate of the bankrupt, if in fact it was not so, would be to go far beyond the determination of his status. To put an extreme case, suppose that creditors should seek to have their debtor declared a bankrupt, and in their petition should allege that he had conveyed a house and lot to a named person, as one among other grounds of the proceeding, when in fact the debtor had never owned the house and lot, and had never transferred it to the person named at any time. Clearly, an adjudication that the debtor was bankrupt would not invest him or his trustee with title to the property, or operate to take away the title of the real owner, who had never been sued or summoned into court, and who, perhaps, never heard of the proceedings. In such a case, to hold that the adjudication of bankruptcy against the debtor would take away the property of a third person and add it to his estate would approximate more nearly confiscation than adjudication. Suppose one should steal the property of another, and, upon its discovery, the real owner should resume possession; if later creditors of the thief should file a petition in bankruptcy against him, alleging that he had given a preference to the owner, surely an adjudication that the thief was a bankrupt would not vest the stolen property in him or the trustee. The object of the proceeding is to have the debtor adjudged to be a bankrupt, not to recover property from third parties. They cannot deny that he is a bankrupt, but they can deny that he owns their property. To adjudge A's status is not to adjudge B's property.

In the case of Traders' Ins. Co. v. Mann, 118 Ga. 381, 382, 45 S. E. 426, where a policy of insurance had been transferred by a debtor to creditors, and the debtor was afterwards adjudicated a bankrupt, it was held: "That the adjudication in bankruptcy was based on the fact of such preference having been made did not of itself authorize the trustee to ignore the assignment; but it would have been necessary to have the same set aside, or secure a reassignment in writing, before he could sue on the policy in his own name." In the opinion Mr. Justice Lamar said: "The adjudication in bankruptcy was not binding on them [the creditors who received the policy]. As a judgment in rem it conclusively fixed the status of Screws as a bankrupt, but Everett, Ridley, Ragan, & Company had still a right to be heard on the validity of the transfer. They might have been able to show that it was not made within four months before the filing of the petition in bankruptcy, or that they had acted in good faith, without notice of insolvency, and purchased the policy for full value."

In Lewis v. Sloan, 68 N. C. 557, it was held: "The jurisdiction of a bankrupt court being conceded, its adjudication of bankruptcy is a judgment in rem fixing the status of the bankrupt, which upon that point is binding upon all the world, and can only be impeached for fraud in obtaining it. . . . Every court, however, in which a controversy as to the title to the property alleged to have been fraudulently conveyed may arise, has jurisdiction to inquire whether the conveyance was in fact and in law fraudulent; i. e., whether the conditions prescribed by the act to make it fraudulent existed." In the opinion it was said: "Although the adjudication of bankruptcy is a judgment in rem, and as such conclusive on all the world, and although in arriving at that judgment the bankrupt court declares the conveyance alleged as the act of bankruptcy to be a preference among creditors, and therefore fraudulent within the meaning of the act,—yet such declaration is no part of the judgment, but is merely incidental to it, and, so far from being conclusive on strangers that the conveyance was fraudulent, is not even evidence against them for that purpose. It is merely res inter alios acta quæ nemine nocere debet. No one not a party to the record is affected by it, except so far as it is in rem. Duchess of Kingston's Case, 2 Smith, Lead. Cas. 438-447; Barrs v. Jackson, 1 Younge & C. Ch. Cas. 585, 1 Phill. Ch. 582. Of the American cases, see King v. Chase, 15 N. H. 9, 41 Am. Dec. 675. In addition to what is said in those cases, there is no reason why the effect of a judgment in rem should be more closely confined to the precise point adjudged, viz.: That, so far as it is in rem and fixes the status of the person or property affected, it binds all the world; whereas a judgment in personam binds only parties and privies who have once had an opportunity of contesting it."

In Neustadter v. Chicago Dry-Goods Co. 96 Fed. 830, it was held by Judge Hanford, of the United States district court, that, "where the issues arising upon a petition in involuntary bankruptcy were decided adversely to the petitioners, and an order made dismissing the proceedings, no notice of the proposed dismissal being given to the other creditors," certain of such other creditors could not have the case reinstated, but were not debarred from bringing a new and independent petition in bankruptcy against the debtor.

In Re Henry Ulfelder Clothing Co. 98 Fed. 409, where in a petition for involuntary bankruptcy the debtor and one of his creditors answered the petition, putting in issue the allegation of insolvency, and also denying that the petitioner was a creditor; and on a trial the allegations of the petition were found to be true, and an adjudication in bankruptcy was made,—it was held to be conclusive evidence of the validity of the petitioner's claim when it was presented for an allowance as a claim against the bankrupt's estate; and that it could not be disputed either by the bankrupt or a creditor who joined in the proceedings and opposed the adjudication. But, the petitioning creditor having put in evidence certain promissory notes made by the debtor to third parties for the purpose of proving insolvency; and the debtor having contested their validity and consideration; and, upon the hearing, with evidence on both sides, the court having found the allegations of the petition to be true and made an adjudication of bankruptcy,—it was held that, as such notes were not directly in issue, but only collaterally brought in question; and as the holders thereof were not parties to the proceeding,—the adjudication in bankruptcy was not conclusive of their validity, and would not preclude the bankrupt from opposing their allowance as claims against his estate. In the course of the opinion De Haven, District Judge, said: "If the court, upon the evidence then before it, had found against their validity [that is, the validity of the notes of the other creditors], and, for that reason, had adjudged that the corporation was not insolvent, and dismissed the proceeding, such finding and judgment would not have constituted a bar to a subsequent action by Henry Ulfelder and A. Levy [holders of the notes] against the bankrupt to recover upon the same claims. They would not have been estopped by such a judgment, because, not being parties, the question of the validity of their present claims was not, and could not have been, litigated by them in the involuntary proceeding. In the case of Re Schick, 2 Ben. 5, Fed. Cas. No. 12,455, the defendant was adjudged bankrupt upon the ground that a certain judgment confessed by him in favor of one Cowen was an act of bankruptcy; and, in the course of the opinion, it was said by Blatchford, J.: "This proceeding, however, is, so far, one merely between the petitioning creditor and the debtor. Cowen is no party to it, although examined as a witness for the creditor; and in the further progress of the matter, if the assignee of the debtor to be appointed should institute proceedings to realize, for the benefit of the debtor's estate in bankruptcy, the property levied on by the sheriff under the execution, Cowen will have a full opportunity to assert his rights, and maintain, if he can, the integrity of the judgment, and there is nothing in this adjudication to preclude him from doing so." And in the case of Re Drummond, 1 Nat. Bankr. Reg. 231, Fed. Cas. No. 4,093, McDonald, J., in adjudging the defendant bankrupt because of his act in preferring certain creditors, said: "It is proper, also, to say that I give no opinion touching the liability of any of the preferred creditors in case of a suit against them by the assignee in bankruptcy who may be appointed in this case. . . . And, indeed, as the preferred creditors are not parties to this proceeding, it would be unjust that the present decision should in any matter affect their interest, except so far as it fixes the status of Drummond as a bankrupt." See also Re Dibblee, 3 Ben. 283, Fed. Cas. No. 3,884."

In Magnus v. Ketcham, 50 C. C. A. 517, 112 Fed. 752, it is stated broadly in the syllabus that "an adjudication of involuntary bankruptcy, duly entered on default for want of an answer to the petition, is as binding on the bankrupt and creditors as one entered upon a hearing, and is conclusive of the commission of the acts of bankruptcy charged in the petition." A careful examination of the entire case, however, will show that the real question was whether the adjudication was binding on the question of the insolvency of the bankrupt, and that the creditor who was held to be concluded was a judgment creditor who had obtained the judgment by confession; that, in connection with the proceedings in bankruptcy, an injunction was prayed for and issued, restraining a sale under the execution; that the creditor appeared and moved to dissolve the injunction, and, by agreement, a modification was made in the order, and he had ample opportunity to contest the point in issue.

A slight consideration of the difference between the issues involved in a proceeding in bankruptcy and a suit to recover property from a person holding it adversely and claiming to be the owner will show that the two proceedings are not identical, and that the former is not conclusive of the latter, except as to determining the status of the bankrupt as such. The issue in the former proceeding is whether the debtor is or is not a bankrupt within the meaning of the act of Congress. Where it is sought to recover property from one alleged to be a creditor who has received a preference, the proceeding rests upon § 60b of the bankrupt act, which reads as follows: "If a bankrupt shall have given a preference within four months before the filing of petition, or after the filing of the petition or before the adjudication, and the person receiving it, or to be benefited thereby, or his agent acting therein, shall have had reasonable cause to believe that it was intended thereby to give a preference, it shall be voidable by the trustee, and he may recover the property or its value from such person." 30 Stat. at L. 562, chap. 541, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 3445. The various requisites to a recovery under this section of the act are quite different from the mere determination upon the proceedings in bankruptcy that the debtor is a bankrupt.

This position may be further illustrated by considering a voluntary proceeding in bankruptcy. While differing from a proceeding in invitum, the adjudication there as to the status of the bankrupt would also be, to some extent, in the nature of a judgment in rem, so as to show that he was a bankrupt; but certainly it would not be pretended that a person voluntarily going into bankruptcy could possess himself of property which did not belong to him, or have the title to property claimed by third parties adjudicated to be his, no matter what allegation he might make in his petition or schedule. The adjudication in bankruptcy, therefore, conclusively determined the status of Griffin as a bankrupt, but did not conclude the defendants from making their defense on a suit by the trustee in bankruptcy against them to recover the property.

In the answer of the defendants no reference is made to other property, except that which they claim to have been obtained from them by fraud, and to have been recovered. It appears from the evidence that they received other property also. The question whether in fact there was a rescission for fraud, or whether there was a preference, in view of the entire evidence, was for the jury. The ground of demurrer insisted on should have been sustained. The adjudication in bankruptcy could be pleaded, but the effort to estop the defendants from pleading rescission for fraud cannot succeed. True, the court charged that the adjudication in bankruptcy did not conclude the defendants, except as to the insolvency and proper adjudication of bankruptcy; but the other ruling remained unreversed.

2. Evidence was introduced to show that Griffin made a certain statement to the defendants as a basis of credit, that they extended credit to him, and that subsequently he informed them that such statement was not true in fact, and that it did not correctly give the amount of his indebtedness; and they insist that thereupon they rescinded the sale for fraud and retook their goods. The court charged as follows: "Certain evidence, gentlemen, has been permitted to go to you as to the alleged statements made by Griffin. Any statement made by Griffin, if he made statements, would not be binding upon this plaintiff in this suit as admissions, and such evidence as has been allowed to go to you with reference to the alleged statements of Griffin is to be considered by you exclusively on the question as to whether Griffin was successfully impeached or not and should not be considered by you as an admission of Griffin's, binding upon the plaintiff in this case." One question in the case was whether, if there was a preference, those receiving it had reasonable cause to believe that a preference was intended. On this branch of the case the statements of Griffin to them were admissible and proper for consideration. They were not, of course, binding or conclusive on the plaintiff, but, as bearing on the question of knowledge by the defendants, they could be considered; and it restricted the use of this evidence too much to confine it solely to the matter of impeaching Griffin as a witness. Civil Code 1895. § 5176, declares that "when, in a legal investigation, information, conversations, letters, and replies, and similar evidence, are facts to explain conduct and ascertain motives, they are admitted in evidence, not as hearsay, but as original evidence." And § 5179 says: "Declarations accompanying an act, or so nearly connected therewith in time as to be free from all suspicion of device or afterthought, are admissible in evidence as part of the res gestæ." See also McLean v. Clark, 47 Ga. 24; Cook v. Pinkerton, 81 Ga. 89, 12 Am. St. Rep. 297, 7 S. E. 171; Cohen v. Parish, 105 Ga. 339, 31 S. E. 205; 3 Wigmore, Ev. § 1777.

3. If one purchasing goods makes a false representation as to a material matter, and the owner of the goods relies on such statement and sells, upon discovering the fraud the owner may rescind and reclaim his property, or so much of it as is still in the possession of the purchaser. In order to rescind, it is not necessary that the purchaser should consent to a rescission, or to make a new contract with the vendor for that purpose. The vendor, upon discovering the fraud, may elect to rescind or to continue the contract. If he elects to rescind, he must give notice to the purchaser of such election and of his determination to reclaim the goods sold; and, if he has received anything in payment, he must return it or tender it to the purchaser. If, however, the transaction, which is claimed, on the one hand, to have been a rescission, and, on the other, to have been a preference, was accomplished by consent or agreement between the vendor and the purchaser, it is not error for the trial court to submit that fact to the jury to aid them in determining what was the real nature of the transaction. Upon the right of a vendor to rescind upon discovering that he has acted on a false representation in making a sale, see Clayton v. O'Conner, 29 Ga. 687; Woodruff v. Saul, 70 Ga. 271; East Tennessee, V. & G. R. Co. v. Hayes, 83 Ga. 558, 10 S. E. 350; Newman v. H. B. Claffin Co. 107 Ga. 89, 32 S. E. 943; Mashburn v. Dannenberg Co. 117 Ga. 567, 44 S. E. 97; 1 Benjamin, Sales, 6th Am. ed. § 661; 24 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 643; 1 Bigelow, Fr. 76.

4. If a vendor, in reliance upon material misrepresentations, has made a sale, and has rescinded it on discovery of the fraud; but all of the property sold is not in the possession of the purchaser; and some of it has been sold or disposed of by him so as to be beyond the reach of the vendor,—the latter may reclaim all the property which can be recovered. As to that which he cannot recover, he may have a right of action against the purchaser, not upon the contract, but based on the theory of the conversion of the goods not found, or an action based upon the contract implied by law where a vendee has disposed of the goods for money, and the seller has waived the tort. 2 Mechem, Sales, § 909, and citations; Hersey v. Benedict, 15 Hun, 282; Sleeper v. Davis, 64 N. H. 59, 10 Am. St. Rep. 377, 6 Atl. 201; Cragg v. Arendale, 113 Ga. 181, 38 S. E. 399; Southern R. Co. v. Born Steel Range Co. 122 Ga. 658, 50 S. E. 489. He cannot, however, proceed both under the contract of sale and against it. He cannot take back such of the goods as remain on hand as part payment of the indebtedness arising from the contract of sale, and retain a claim or seek payment for the balance of the purchase price. These two positions would be inconsistent.

5. It is insisted by the defendant in error that the evidence demanded the verdict, and that there should be an affirmance, independently of the consideration of any alleged errors on the part of the court. There was undoubtedly ample evidence to have sustained a finding in favor of the plaintiff, but we are not prepared to hold that it so plainly required a verdict for him that an affirmance must necessarily result. The plaintiff contended that there was not in fact a legal rescission, but that Griffin, being insolvent and about to fail, came to Atlanta and conferred with the defendants for the purpose of giving them a preference; that the matter of rescission, now sought to be set up, was not the real transaction between the parties; that the admission of having made a misstatement was merely colorable; that the defendants took, not only their own goods, but other goods of Griffin; and that they did not merely seek to reclaim goods on the ground of an alleged fraud, but to get paid for the contract price, crediting the goods received thereon,—both those bought from them and others. The defendants claim that there was a bona fide rescission, and not a preference; that, if any goods were received by them in connection with the rescission which were not included in their sale to Griffin, it was a mere accident, and not intentional; and that the receipt of other goods later was a separate and distinct transaction for the purpose of partly compensating them for such of their goods as could not be reclaimed. Of course, any receipt of additional goods in payment would not stand on the basis of a rescission. While the jury might have found a verdict in favor of the plaintiff, we could not hold that it was so clearly demanded as to require an affirmance.

Judgment reversed.

ILLINOIS SUPREME COURT.

GILBERT CALKINS et al., Plffs. in Err.,
v.
CHARLES CALKINS et al.

Will—attestation.

Attestation of a will in another room, out of range of testator's vision, is not within a statutory requirement that it shall be in his presence; and the defect is not cured by a subsequent acknowledgment by the witnesses, or ratification and approval by the testator

(June 23, 1905.)

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Kane County to review a decree refusing to set aside the probate of the will of Cyrus Calkins, deceased. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. N. J. Aldrich, Theodore Worcester, and Lee Mighell, for plaintiffs in error:

The subscribing witnesses to a will should subscribe the same in a position where it is possible for the testator to see them in the act of subscribing, if so disposed.

Rev. Stat. chap. 148, § 2; Schouler, Wills, §§ 341, 342; Drury v. Connell, 177 Ill. 43, 52 N. E. 368; Re Tobin, 196 Ill. 484, 63

Case Note.—That a statute requiring a will to be attested and subscribed by witnesses in the presence of the testator is not sufficiently complied with where the signing was done elsewhere and subsequently acknowledged in his presence and approved by him, is expressly held in Mendell v. Dunbar, 169 Mass. 74, 61 Am. St. Rep. 277, 47 N. E. 402, and Re Downie, 42 Wis. 66, cited in CALKINS v. CALKINS.

Re Downie is cited and followed in Pawtucket v. Ballou, 15 R. I. 58, 2 Am. St. Rep. 868, 23 Atl. 43, and is said in Riggs v. Riggs, 135 Mass. 238, 46 Am. Rep. 464, to lay down too severe a rule in holding that the subscription must take place where it is possible for the testator to see. In that case the testator could only look upward, but the signing was done in his hearing and where he could have seen had he been able to turn his head. This was held to be a signing in his presence. After the witnesses had signed, the paper was handed to the testator, who read their names and said he was glad it was done.

This last case was relied on in Cook v. Winchester, 81 Mich. 581, 8 L. R. A. 822, 46 N. W. 106 (cited in the CALKINS CASE), where it was held that a signing in an adjoining room, which the testatrix might have seen by moving to the edge of her bed, which she was unable to do, was in her presence, within the meaning of the statute. The court goes on to say, however: "But we hold that the execution of this will was valid expressly upon the ground that not only

Mr. Robert Egan, with Messrs. Raymond & Newhall, for defendants in error:

A will is duly attested in the presence of a testator, within the meaning of the statute of Illinois, where the witnesses subscribe their names in another room, but within the hearing, knowledge, and understanding of the testator; after which they immediately return to the bedside of the testator, and the will is handed to the testator for inspection, then read to the testator in the presence of the subscribing witnesses, and, after the reading thereof, including the attestation clause and signatures, the testator states that the will is in accordance with his wishes and desires.

Rev. Stat. chap. 148, § 2; Re Tobin, 196 Ill. 484, 63 N. E. 1021; Drury v. Connell, 177 Ill. 43, 52 N. E. 368; Gibson v. Nelson, was the act of signing by the witnesses within the hearing, knowledge, and understanding of the testatrix, but, after such signing, the witnesses came back into the room where she was with the will, which was on one sheet of paper; that the will was then again all read over to her by the scrivener, and the names of the witnesses read to her and their signatures shown to her, and she informed by the witnesses, or one of them in the presence of the other, that the will had been signed by them; and that she then said it was all right. 'just as she wanted it; witnesses and everything was all right.' This seems to us to have been a substantial compliance with the statute, and a witnessing in the presence of the testatrix."

Cook v. Winchester is cited in Cunningham v. Cunningham, 80 Minn. 187, 51 L. R. A. 642, 81 Am. St. Rep. 256, 83 N. W. 58, another of the cases mentioned in the CALKINS CASE as holding a contrary view. The statute was held to be sufficiently complied with where the witnesses signed in an adjoining room, where the testator might have seen them by stepping forward 2 or 3 feet, which he was physically capable of doing. Upon the witnesses' return he looked the paper over and pronounced it all right.

It is also cited in Raymond v. Wagner, 178 Mass. 315, 59 N. E. 811, where a signing was held to be in the presence of the testatrix, which took place in a room at the other side of a narrow entry, where the testatrix could have seen it by raising herself slightly in bed, although it did not appear whether she had power to do so. Immediately after the signing, the paper was shown to the testatrix.

It is apparent that the doctrine that a subsequent acknowledgment is not equivalent to a subscription in the testator's presence is not substantially controverted by these cases, which, rather, are based on a broad construction of the phrase "in the testator's presence."

It is also to be observed that the foregoing cases are decided under statutes requiring wills to be attested and subscribed in the testator's presence, and that in the CALKINS CASE and other Illinois cases cited, where the statute requires the will to be so attested only, attestation is regarded as including subscription. It may be queried whether, in jurisdictions where attestation and subscription are regarded as separate acts, and the statute requires attestation only in the testator's presence, a signing not in his presence would not be good.

The rule under discussion is approved in the following text-books: Page, Wills, § 215, citing Lamb v. Girtman, 33 Ga. 289; Mendell v. Dunbar, 169 Mass. 74, 61 Am. St. Rep. 277, 47 N. Cartwright, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Appellants filed their bill in the circuit court of Kane county to contest the will of Cyrus Calkins, deceased, alleging, among other things, that the will was not executed in conformity with the requirements of the statute, for the reason that the persons signing the will as witnesses did not attest it in the presence of said Cyrus Calkins, but signed it in another room from the one in which he was lying, and out of the range of his vision, where he did not and could not see the act of attestation. F. M. McNair, the executor, and Charles Calkins and Clara Calkins, three of the appellees, by their answer alleged that the will was signed within the range of vision of the testator, and that, after it was signed by the witnesses, it was immediately presented to the testator, and by him read over and acknowledged in the presence of said witnesses who had so signed the same. An issue was formed and submitted to a jury for trial, when the alleged will was presented signed by Cyrus Calkins with his mark, and with the usual attestation clause signed by Phoebe Catlin and Edwin M. Harris. The subscribing witnesses testified that the will was prepared by the witness Harris, and was signed by the testator at 9 or 10 o'clock in the evening; that the testator was lying in bed with a broken hip; that, after affixing his mark to it, he, in response to a question by Dr. McNair, the executor, requested said witnesses to witness it; that they took the will and went into an adjoining room, out of the presence of the testator and outside of the range of his vision, where it was a physical impossibility for him to see them or the will, and sat down by a table and wrote their signatures; that Mr. Harris then took the will and a lamp, and they went back into the room where the testator was; that Mr. Harris then read the will to the testator, including the signatures, and showed them to him, and he said it was all right. The will, being offered in evidence, was objected to by the appellants on the ground that it was not executed in accordance with the statute, and was not attested in the presence of the testator, or within his sight or view, or within the possible range of his vision. The court overruled the objection, and admitted the will in evidence. The same question was afterwards raised by instructions asked by the appellants and refused, and the court gave instructions at the instance of appellees, stating, in effect, that there was a valid attestation of the will if the jury found the facts to be as testified to by said witnesses. The verdict was that the writing introduced in evidence was the last will and testament of Cyrus Calkins, deceased, and, after overruling a motion for a new trial, the court entered a decree in accordance with the verdict. From that decree this appeal was prosecuted.

It must be borne in mind that the question, What will constitute a valid will devising property, or a valid attestation of such an instrument? is legislative, and that the only legitimate function of the court is to declare and enforce the law as enacted by the legislature. The office of the court is to interpret the language used by the legislature where it requires interpretation, but not to annex new provisions or substitute different ones. The statute requires that all wills, testaments, and codicils shall be attested in the presence of the testator or testatrix, by two or more credible witnesses, and if we should attempt to change that provision so as to authorize an attestation out of the presence of the testator or testatrix, either on account of a desire to sustain a particular will, or because we regard a subsequent acknowledgment by the witnesses, or ratification or approval by the testator, just as good and effective as an attestation according to the statute, we should justly be charged with offensive judicial legislation. Our duty is merely to determine whether this will was attested in the presence of the testator; and the evidence was that it was not so attested, but was afterwards read over to the testator, and the signatures of the witnesses were shown to him. Attestation is the act of witnessing the actual execution of an instrument, and subscribing the name of the witness in testimony of the fact. 4 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 888. In the case of Drury v. Connell, 177 Ill. 43, 52 N. E. 368, it was said that the attestation of a will consists in the subscription of the names of the witnesses to the attestation clause as a declaration that the signature of the testator was affixed or the will acknowledged in their presence; and in the case of Sloan v. Sloan, 184 Ill. 579, 56 N. E. 952, the court considered the question whether there is a distinction between the attestation of a will and the subscription of the names of the witnesses. In that case the proponent offered to prove by one who was present that the will was signed by both the witnesses in his presence, and that it was executed and published by the deceased as and for his last will in his presence; but it was said that a different rule had been too long acquiesced in and understood in this state, and that, to render a will valid, it must be subscribed by the attesting witnesses. The supposed distinction, as applied to our statute, was rejected; and it was held that an attesting witness must be a subscribing witness, and that it is not competent to prove a will by a person who was present and witnessed its execution, but did not sign as an attesting witness.

That the attestation mentioned in the statute consists in the witnesses subscribing their names is shown by other provisions of our statute. In the case of a deceased, insane, or absent witness, the court may admit proof of the handwriting of such witness, and admit the instrument to probate as though it had been proved by such subscribing witness in his or her proper person. Proof of the handwriting or the subscribing witness in such a case raises the presumption that the witness duly attested the will in the presence of the testator, and believed him to possess testamentary capacity. More v. More, 211 Ill. 268, 71 N. E. 988. It is not indispensable that the witnesses shall sign a formal clause of attestation. The attestation clause may consist of a simple word, such as "witness," "attest," or "test," or there may be no words of attestation at all; and yet the signature of the witness alone constitutes an attestation of every fact necessary to make the will valid.

The provisions of the statute as to the signing by the testator and the witnesses are different. He may either sign the will in the presence of the witnesses, or acknowledge that the will is his act and deed; but, as to the witnesses, the only provision is that they shall attest the will in his presence. All the authorities declare that the object of the law is to prevent fraud and imposition upon the testator or the substitution of a surreptitious will; and, to effect that object, it is necessary that the testator shall be able to see and know that the witnesses have affixed their names to the paper which he has signed and acknowledged as his will. The legislature have determined that such object shall be attained by requiring the attestation of the subscribing witnesses to be in the presence of the testator; and, if that is not done, it is no answer to say that some other method would effect the same object. Numerous methods may be devised by which the testator can be made acquainted with the fact that the witnesses have signed the identical will which he executed, and that there is no fraud or imposition upon him; but, where the legislature have determined in what manner the object in view shall be accomplished, no other method can be adopted, although in the opinion of the court it would be just as effective. To adopt any other rule would open a limitless field as to what would be equivalent to a compliance with the provision of the statute.

The authorities have always given to the word "presence" the meaning of conscious presence, so that the act of attestation may be within the actual personal knowledge of the testator; and in Witt v. Gardiner, 153 Ill. 176, 49 Am. St. Rep. 150, 41 N. E. 781, it was stated that the test of presence of the testator is contiguity, with an uninterrupted view between the testator and the subscribing witnesses, as the indispensable element to the physical signing in the testator's presence. It is not necessary that the act of attestation be performed in the same room, if it takes place within the testator's range of vision, where he can see the signing, considering his position and the state of his health at the time. It is still in his presence although he may turn and look away or choose not to look at the act. On the other hand no mere contiguity of the witnesses will constitute presence if the position of the testator is such that he cannot possibly see them sign. An attestation is not in the presence of the testator, although the witnesses are in the same room and close to him, if some material obstacle prevents him from knowing of his own knowledge, or perceiving by his senses, the act of attestation. The rule so stated was reaffirmed in Drury v. Connell, 177 Ill. 43, 52 N. E. 368.

But counsel say that, according to the rule so stated, a blind person would not be able to execute a will. The rule was naturally stated with reference to sight, because nearly all persons can see, and the rule would apply almost universally. In the case of a blind person, his will would be attested in his presence, if the act was brought within his personal knowledge through the medium of other senses. But, whether a person is blind or can see, an attestation is certainly not in his presence if he has no conscious personal knowledge of the act, and is merely told that it has been performed in another room. Neither is there anything in the suggestion that, if a testator were lying on his bed and could only look upward, the witnesses would have to be suspended in the air over his head. Means could be adopted to comply with the law, and the plain meaning of the authorities is that an attestation is in the presence of the testator only when he has personal knowledge that the witnesses are signing their names to his will in accordance with his request.

Counsel say that in this case the attestation was within the knowledge and understanding of the testator, meaning by that statement that, from the question asked by the doctor concerning witnessing the will, and the testator's answer, and the taking of the will into the other room, he would naturally conclude that they went there to attest the will, and were attesting it. It is perfectly clear that he could not have been a witness to the attestation, but that his knowledge, as it is called, was merely an inference or conclusion as to what was going on, based on other facts.

The question here involved was decided in Mendell v. Dunbar, 169 Mass. 74, 61 Am. St. Rep. 277, 47 N. E. 402, where the testator signed the will in the presence of the subscribing witnesses, and they withdrew to another room in the house and there subscribed it as witnesses. There was a question whether the fact that the witnesses afterwards returned to the testator, and one of them, with the assent of the others, said that they had signed the will, and showed him the signatures, and he assented thereto, was a sufficient compliance with the statute. The question was answered in the negative. The same view of the law was taken in the case of Re Downie, 42 Wis. 66. We have been referred to two cases adopting a contrary view: Cook v. Winchester, 81 Mich. 581, 8 L. R. A. 822, 46 N. W. 106, and Cunningham v. Cunningham, 80 Minn. 180, 51 L. R. A. 642, 81 Am. St. Rep. 256, 83 N. W. 58. In each of those cases there was a conscious effort on the part of the court to sustain the will on account of the equity and justice of the case. The subsequent acknowledgment was considered as effective as the actual attestation in the presence of the testator, and was held to be a substantial compliance with the statute. But we do not regard the reasons given as sufficient to justify a departure from the plain language of our statute. If some other method than the attestation in the presence of the testator would be just as effective to prevent fraud, imposition, or substitution of a surreptitious will, we deem it sufficient to say that the legislature has prescribed a particular method which must be followed in order to make a will legal and valid.

The court erred in overruling the objection to the will and in giving the instructions. The decree is reversed, and the cause remanded.

Petition for rehearing overruled October 11, 1905.

PENNSYLVANIA SUPREME COURT.
RE ESTATE OF CHARLES SIGEL, Deceased.

APPEAL OF WILLIAM SCHUDT.

1. Will—gift affected by codicil.

A gift once made by will is not to be cut down by a subsequent codicil, unless the intention of the testator to that effect appears clearly or by necessary implication.

2. Same—specific legacy in codicil.

The right of an heir under a clause in a will directing the residue to be divided between testator's heirs is not cut down by a subsequent codicil giving him a specific legacy, "and no more."

(October 9, 1905.)

APPPEAL by exceptant from a decree of the Orphans' Court for Warren County making distribution of a part of the estate of Charles Sigel, deceased. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Perry D. Clark and Jacob Stern, for appellant:

If the phrase had been expressed in full,

Case Note.—While scores of decisions are to be found in the books, in which courts have construed codicils for the purpose of ascertaining how far they modify the provisions of the will, they furnish very little aid as precedents by reason of the varying facts and language involved. They are mainly useful in determining the rules of construction. As stated by the court in RE SIGEL'S ESTATE "no case has been found which furnishes an exact precedent for the one now before us." This being true, we are forced to limit this inquiry to a presentation of the general rules governing the construction of codicils like the one involved in the SIGEL CASE.

It is undisputed that a will and codicil must be construed together as parts of one and the same instrument; and the disposition of the will shall not be disturbed further than to give effect to the codicil.

"and no more out of my whole estate," it would have excluded the legatees mentioned in the codicil from taking any part in the residuary estate.

McGovran's Estate, 190 Pa. 375, 42 Atl. 705.

The last clause in a will, of two inconsistent clauses, is the one that shall stand; and a bequest in a will, revoked by a codicil thereto, is void.

Newbold v. Boone, 52 Pa. 167; Stickley's Appeal, 29 Pa. 234; Shreiner's Appeal, 53 Pa. 106; Horwitz v. Norris, 60 Pa. 261; Hart v. Stoyer, 164 Pa. 523, 30 Atl. 497; 1 Jarman, Wills, 136.

The codicil was made after the will; it cannot be properly construed except from a point of time later than the will.

Whelen's Estate, 175 Pa. 23, 34 Atl. 329.

The words "and no more" have been frequently used by testators to prevent the legatee taking a greater share of the estate than the bequest which the words follow.

Ellison v. Woody, 6 Munf. 368; Bender v. Dietrick, 7 Watts & S. 284; McGovran's Estate, supra; Everitt's Estate, 195 Pa. 450, 46 Atl. 1.

Mr. John G. Johnson also for appellant.

Hard v. Ashley, 117 N. Y. 606, 23 N. E. 177; Westcott v. Cady, 5 Johns. Ch. 334, 9 Am. Dec. 306; Page, Wills, §§ 462, 470; 1 Jarman, Wills, 139.

The general rule is that, when two legacies are bequeathed to the same person, one by the will and the other by the codicil, and the testator has given both the legacies simpliciter, the courts in such cases, in the absence of intrinsic evidence, consider that, as the testator has given twice, he must prima facie be intended to mean two gifts; and it seems to be immaterial whether the legacies are of equal or unequal amounts, or whether they are of the same or different natures. 2 Roper, Legacies, 999; Manifold's Appeal, 126 Pa. 508, 19 Atl. 42; Stultz v. Kiser, 37 N. C. (2 Ired. Eq.) 538; Wainwright v. Tuckerman, 120 Mass. 232. Gray, Ch. J., in speaking of this question in the Wainwright Case, said: When legacies are given by different instruments, the general rule is that the second is to be treated as additional to the first, in the absence of anything signifying a different intention; but in this, as in all other questions of construction of testamentary instruments, the apparent intention of the testator must be the guide of the court; citing Hooley v. Hatton, 1 Bro. Ch. 390, note, 2 Dick. 461, Lofft, 122; Coote v. Boyd, 2 Bro. Ch. 521; James v. Semmens, 2 H. Bl. 213; Moggridge v. Thackwell, 1 Ves. Jr. 464; Heming v. Clutterbuck, 1 Bligh, N. R. 479; Fraser v. Byng, 1 Russ. & M. 90; Russell v. Dickson, 2 Drury & War. 133, 4 Ir. Eq. Rep. 339, 4 H. L. Cas. 293.

In case of doubt, an additional gift is presumed, rather than revocation. Schouler, Wills, § 438.

Messrs. Frank Gunnison and T. A. Lamb for appellees.

Potter, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Charles Sigel died February 21, 1904, unmarried and without issue, and leaving a large estate. On the day of his death he executed a will, by which he revoked all previous wills, gave certain legacies, and, in his own language, "the balance of my estate to the heirs of Charles Sigel;" that is, to his own heirs. On the same day he executed a codicil, which reads as follows: "I give to my sister, Matilda Sigel, of Kirchheim, Germany, Mary Schmidt, of East Orange, N. J., and Mary Schudt, of West Seneca, N. Y., each one thousand ($1,000) dollars, and to Gus Schudt, my nephew, two thousand ($2,000) dollars, and no more." It is agreed that Mary Schmidt and Mary Schudt were one and the same person, the daughter of a deceased sister of testator. Schudt was her maiden name, and Schmidt her married name. Gus Schudt was the son of testator's sister. All three legatees were heirs at law of the testator, and, in the absence of the codicil, would have been entitled to share in the distribution of his estate under the residuary clause of his will. Upon distribution of the balance shown by the executor's first account, the court below held that the legatees named in the codicil were entitled to receive the legacies there given them, and also to share in the residuary estate under the will.

The codicil will not operate as a revocation of previous testamentary provisions beyond the clear import of its language. Redfield v. Redfield, 126 N. Y. 466, 27 N. E. 1032.

In Goodwin v. Coddington, 154 N. Y. 283, 48 N. E. 729, O'Brien, J., lays down a rule that not only justifies the decision in RE SIGEL'S ESTATE, but renders any other impossible. He there says: "A codicil will not operate to revoke a previous devise or bequest beyond the clear import of the language used. Effect must be given, so far as possible, to all parts of the will, and, when the several provisions can be reconciled consistently with the intentions of the testator, as they appear and may be gathered from the original instrument and codicil, that construction will be favored. An estate once devised, or an interest intended to be given, will not be sacrificed on the ground of repugnancy, when it is possible to reconcile the provisions supposed to be in conflict," citing Van Vechten v. Keator, 63 N. Y. 55; Taggart v. Murray, 53 N. Y. 233; Freeman v. Coit, 96 N. Y. 63; Roseboom v. Roseboom, 81 N. Y. 356; Clarke v. Leupp, 88 N. Y. 228; Hard v. Ashley, 117 N. Y. 606, 23 N. E. 177; Byrnes v. Stilwell, 103 N. Y. 453, 57 Am. Rep. 760, 9 N. E. 241; Viele v. Keeler, 129 N. Y. 199, 29 N. E. 78; Redfield v. Redfield, supra.

In Bedford v. Bedford, 99 Ky. 273, 35 S. W. 926, it was held that, where the terms of a will clearly give an estate, the words of the codicil must manifest an equally clear intention to revoke it, before they can be construed to have such an effect.

Appellant claims that this construction of the will is erroneous, and that, by the use of the words "and no more" in the codicil, the testator expressed his intention that the amounts there given should be all that the legatees named should receive, and that the residue of his estate should be divided among his remaining heirs, to the exclusion of the three named in the codicil. In such a case as this, where a will and codicil are to be construed, the rule is well settled that they must be regarded as parts of one and the same instrument, and that the codicil is not to be allowed to vary or modify the will, unless such was the plain and manifest intention of the testator. In Spang v. Hill, 2 Woodw. Dec. 45, after a consideration of the authorities, the court said: "The general result of the authorities on this subject is that notwithstanding a codicil, the provisions of a will are to stand, unless, in order to effect the purposes of the codicil, it is absolutely necessary that the provisions of the will shall give way." Chief Justice Mercur said, in Lewis's Appeal, 108 Pa. 133: "It is not necessary to refer to the numerous English and American authorities which hold as a canon of construction that a clear gift cannot be cut down by any subsequent words, unless they show an equally clear intention. In applying this rule, it is sufficient that the subsequent words indicate the testator's intention to cut it down with reasonable certainty, and it is not necessary to institute a comparison between the two clauses as to lucidity. 1 Wms. Exrs. 185. It cannot be cut down by any doubtful expressions in the codicil. The language of the latter must be such as to clearly establish the modification claimed before such effect can be given to it." And in Sheetz's Appeal, 82 Pa. 213, this court said (p. 217): "The clearly expressed purpose of a testator is not to be overborne by modifying directions that are ambiguous and equivocal, and may justify either of two opposite interpretations. Such directions are to be so construed as to support the testator's distinctly announced main intention." The fundamental distinction between the nature of a codicil and a later will should be borne in mind. The later will works essentially a revocation, while the codicil is a confirmation, except as to the express alterations which it may contain; and therefore, while in the case of a later will a revocation may be presumed, this is not true of a codicil. It means, rather, an addition than a revocation.

While no case has been found which furnishes an exact precedent for the one now before us, yet we think in principle it is to be governed by the authorities which hold that a gift once made by will is not to be cut down by a subsequent codicil, unless the intention of the testator to that effect appears clearly or by necessary implication. Where it is possible to construe the codicil so as to give effect to all the provisions of the will, it certainly should be done. We do not think that it can be said in this case that the intention of the testator to revoke the gifts of proportionate shares in the residue made to the heirs named in the codicil, is clear from the use of the words "and no more;" for these may be construed to apply equally well as limiting the amount of the additional gifts to the sums named in the codicil. In Brisben's Appeal, reported in 1 Lanc. Bar, October 9, 1869, this court, speaking through Read, J., said: "It would appear to be perfectly reasonable that, where a legacy is given by will to a particular individual, and by a codicil another legacy is given to the same person, the second should be considered as additional to the first; and, therefore, where a paper is codicillary, and two legacies are given to the same person, they are cumulative. The more recent decisions treat this as conclusive, unless a contrary purpose is distinctly manifested by the instruments themselves." In the present case this general principle would unquestionably make the gifts to the individuals named in the codicil cumulative, were it not for the words "and no more." The doubt raised by them is as to whether they limit the words of the will and defeat the right to share in the residue. Or do they limit only additional gifts? We are inclined to the latter construction, under the accepted principle that, where a devise is made of an estate, a revocation will not be implied, unless no other construction can be placed upon the language. In this case we think the construction adopted by the court below, which saves the right to share in the residue, is reasonable and fair. If the codicil be read into the will, it would then read, "and the balance of my estate to the heirs of Charles Sigel, and, in addition, to the persons named in the codicil the amounts therein named, and no more;" that is, in addition to their proportionate share of the residue as heirs, under the language of the will, they get, respectively, the amounts named, "and no more."

We cannot accept the view that the words "and no more" in the codicil clearly and necessarily apply to the provisions of the will and cut down the gift there made. To apply them only in limitation of the amounts named in the codicil as additional gifts seems to us quite as much in line with the probable intention of the testator as the other suggestion. In Bender v. Dietrick, 7 Watts & S. 284, which was cited by the court below and by counsel for both sides, the decision was placed upon the ground that "an heir at law can only be disinherited by express devise or necessary implication, and that implication has been defined to be such a strong probability that an intention to the contrary cannot be supposed." Justice Rogers said (p. 287), in language peculiarly applicable here: "It seems to me that the expression that they shall have $50, and no more, of his real and personal estate, does not raise such a strong probability, as has been shown, as that a contrary intention may not be supposed. Indeed, the difficulty arising from the imperfection of the will is to ascertain what the testator did intend. His intention is at best but matter of conjecture, and certainly on such grounds no person heretofore has been deprived of his inheritance."

We think the conclusions reached by the court below in this case are justified by reason and the authorities. The assignments of error are overruled, and the decree of the Orphans' Court is affirmed, and this appeal is dismissed, at the cost of the appellant.

PENNSYLVANIA SUPREME COURT.

ESTATE OF LOUIS VANUXEM, Deceased.

APPEAL OF WILLIAM POTTER et al.,
Exrs., etc.

(212 Pa. 315.)

Collateral inheritance tax—land in other states.

The value of real estate in other states, which it is necessary to sell under authority vested in the executors to sell real estate to pay pecuniary legacies, is subject to collateral inheritance tax at testator's domicile.

Case Note.—1 Parmele's Wharton on Conflict of Laws, p. 201, says that treating the succession tax as a tax on the transfer of, or succession to, property, and not on property itself, it would, perhaps, be competent for a state or country in which a former owner was domiciled, by express words to that effect, to require the payment of the tax even with respect to real property in another jurisdiction; but thus far the laws imposing these taxes have been framed or

A PPEAL by the executors of Louis C. Vanuxem, deceased, from a decree of the Orphans' Court for Montgomery County, confirming an appraisement of the estate for collateral inheritance taxes. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court below by SOLLY, P. J., which is referred to in the opinion of the supreme court, and which was as follows:

"Louis C. Vanuxem, a resident of the township of Springfield, this county, died therein on December 21, 1903, unmarried and testate, leaving no lineal descendants. His will is dated October 16, 1902, and has several codicils attached. In the third item he gives general pecuniary legacies to the amount of $570,500, without deduction for taxes or like charges (which are to be paid out of the general estate), to his sisters, nieces, and other relatives and persons; payments to be made to them in the order named. In the fourth item the testator gives to his sisters, Mary and Florence, during their lives and the life of the survivor, the full and free use and occupancy, as a home for themselves and any of his sisters who may become widowed, his dwelling on Evergreen avenue, Chestnut Hill, and his plantation at Upatoi, Georgia, together with all household goods, furniture, horses, carriages, etc., at either place, on condition that they maintain the houses in good order, pay taxes and like charges, with the right to rent the premises for their benefit, should they not desire to occupy either. Upon the death of the survivor, the executors are directed to sell the properties, the proceeds of which shall pass into the residuary estate, which is devised and bequeathed in item five to and among certain persons and corporations, share and share alike, with the provision that, in the event of the death of either of two of his brothers-in-law in the lifetime of the testator, leaving his wife surviving, she shall be substituted as residuary legatee in place of her husband, and, should both husband and wife predecease him, leaving issue surviving, such issue shall take the share of their father or mother. By the third codicil, which is dated June 9, 1903, a pecuniary legacy of $50,000 is bequeathed to Louis Vanuxem Cochran, a nephew. The residuary clause construed so as to make the tax payable with respect to all real property within the jurisdiction, whether owned by a resident or nonresident; but with respect to no real property, even though the former owner was a resident, which is outside of the jurisdiction imposing the tax.

There is a conflict among the decisions whether the doctrine of equitable conversion may be applied for the purpose of subjecting of the will is amended and radically changed. In lieu of the devise and bequest of equal shares of the residue of the estate to the persons named in that clause, there are general pecuniary legacies of $10,000 each bequeathed to John Scott, Jr., James B. Walter, and Gustav H. Seelaus, and $25,000 each to the trustees of Princeton University and the trustees of Jefferson Medical College. The interests of his sisters, Mary and Florence Vanuxem, and his brothers-in-law William Potter, John Lewis Cochran, and Daniel L. Hebard, are to remain as devised and bequeathed in the residuary clause. They are therefore the residuary devisees and legatees of the estate. The language of the seventh item of the will, in part, is as follows: 'I give unto my executors hereinafter named full power and discretion to sell any or all of my real estate whenever any such sale be necessary or expedient for any purpose of my estate, of administration, distribution, or otherwise.'

"At the time of his death the testator was possessed of personalty, consisting of bonds, stock, mortgages, notes, insurance policies, cash, etc., all of the value of about $460,000, as fixed by the appraiser of the collateral inheritance tax. His debts amounted in round figures to $140,000. The general pecuniary legacies bequeathed in the will and codicils foot up to about $700,000. He was seised in fee simple of certain real estate in Pennsylvania, Georgia, Tennessee, and Illinois, a detailed statement of which, as well as the personal assets, with values, appears in the inventory and appraisement made up and filed by the collateral appraiser. Upon the real estate situated in the city of Knoxville he assessed the tax due at $1,350.13, and upon that in the city of Chicago at $6,741.82. He assessed no tax on the real estate at Upatoi, Georgia, because, in his opinion, it is not liable. His action is based upon the conclusion that there is an equitable conversion of the

the proceeds of sale of a resident's real property in another state to this tax.

In Pennsylvania it was held that real estate situated in Maryland was not subject to a collateral inheritance tax. The court said that all property of the citizen within the state may be taxed, and all property outside the state is drawn to or follows in law the person or domicile of the owner, such as bonds, mortgages, etc., no matter where situated. But real estate is not drawn to the person or domicile of the owner, for taxation or any other purpose; and hence cannot be taxed outside the jurisdiction where it is situated. But it may be that a state may impose a succession tax upon every citizen of the state who succeeds to either real or personal estate, from whatever source received. Bittinger's Estate, 129 Pa. 338, 18 Atl. 132.

In Coleman's Estate, 159 Pa. 233, 28 Atl. 137, it was held that proceeds of the sale of land located in the state of Pennsylvania were not subject to a collateral inheritance tax, where the testator, who was domiciled in another state, directed that the lands should be sold, and that his executors should apply the proceeds toward the payment of legacies.

In Re Handlev, 181 Pa. 344, 37 Atl. 587, a collateral inheritance tax was charged on the proceeds of a sale of real estate in another state, where the testator had peremptorily directed such land to be sold. The court said that as the testator had peremptorily directed a sale of land and the distribution of the proceeds, the doctrine of conversion applied, and the actual situs of the land was immaterial; as what passed under the will was not the land, but the proceeds, which were personalty, and liable to a tax. This doctrine rests on the basis that the testator intended and directed not a merely nominal or limited conversion, but an actual conversion by sale, and the blending of the proceeds with his other personalty for purposes of administration under his will. The same rule is applied in Miller's Estate, 182 Pa. 157, 37 Atl. 1000; and in Hale's Estate, 161 Pa. 183, 28 Atl. 1071. See also Miller v. Com. 111 Pa. 328, 2 Atl. 492.

But in Drayton's Appeal, 61 Pa. 172, it was held that real estate situate in another state was not subject to a collateral inheritance tax, where the executor was given a mere authority to sell, but not a positive direction.

The doctrine of equitable conversion is applied differently in some other jurisdictions. Thus, in Lorillard v. People, 6 Dem. 268, it was held that a devise of land owned by a resident of New York, but situated outside of the state, was not subject to a legacy tax.

And in Re Swift, 137 N. Y. 77, 18 L. R. A. 709, 32 N. E. 1096, the court held that real estate situated out of the state, owned by a decedent residing in the state at the time of his death, was not subject to the collateral inheritance tax laws of New York, even after it had been converted into money, which was in the hands of the executors.

In Connell v. Crosby, 210 Ill. 380, 71 N. E. 350, the court denied the right to collect a collateral inheritance tax in a suit at law upon funds arising from the sale of land situated in another state, upon the ground of equitable conversion by will, as the doctrine of equitable conversion is not applied in courts of law.

Also in State v. Brevard, 62 N. C. (Phill. Eq.) 141, it was held that an executor in North Carolina is not bound to pay a collateral inheritance tax upon his testator's real property located in Alabama. The court said that our revenue law does not impose a tax on the property of the decedent which is not in the state, though given by will, or devolved by law upon one of our citizens.

real estate, because there is not only an absolute necessity to sell the same to execute the will, but also such a blending of the real and personal estate by the testator as to show his intention to bequeath the fund arising out of the same as money. He cites a number of authorities to support the assessment of the tax on the Tennessee and Illinois lands. The executors and legatees have taken this appeal from the assessment of these lands. Their contention is that these lands pass as real estate to the legatees, there being no equitable conversion under the will. The act of May 6, 1887 (P. L. 79), provides that all estates,—real, personal, and mixed,—of every kind whatsoever, situated within this state, whether the person or persons dying seised thereof be domiciled within or out of this state, and all such estates situated in another state, territory, or country, when the person or persons dying seised thereof shall have their domicile within this commonwealth, which pass to collaterals, shall be subject to the payment of collateral inheritance tax. The tax imposed is not a succession duty on the recipient of the property, but is a tax upon the property itself, as appears from the second proviso in the third section,—that it shall remain a lien on the real estate on which the same is chargeable until paid. When the legislature undertook to impose such tax upon real estate situated in another state, it transcended the power of the state. Bittinger's Estate, 129 Pa. 338, 18 Atl. 132; Drayton's Appeal, 61 Pa. 172; Com. v. Coleman, 52 Pa. 468. The border line, however, is reached when property which is in fact real estate is to be treated as personalty under the doctrine of equitable conversion. Re Handley, 181 Pa. 339, 37 Atl. 587.

"Is there an equitable conversion of the lands situated in Knoxville and Chicago? If there is not, then they are not subject to the tax, for the 'state cannot exercise extraterritorial taxing power.' If there is a conversion, then they are liable, and the action of the appraiser must be sustained. Conversion is always a question of intent. The intent of a testator is to be gathered from his entire will, rather than from the terms of a particular devise, which, regarded alone, might be inconsistent with the testamentary scheme as a whole. Dean v. Winton, 150 Pa. 227, 24 Atl. 664. In Hunt's Appeal, 105 Pa. 128, Mr. Justice Paxson said: 'It ought to be settled by this time that, in order to work a conversion, there must be either—1st, a positive direction to sell; or 2d, an absolute necessity to sell in order to execute the will; or 3d, such blending of real and personal estate by the testator in his will as to clearly show that he intended to create a fund out of both real and personal estate, and to bequeath the said fund as money. In each of the two latter cases an intent to convert will be implied.' This case has been cited and the language of Justice Paxson quoted approvingly again and again by the appellate courts. Among instances are Irving v. Patchen, 164 Pa. 51, 30 Atl. 436; Sauerbier's Estate, 202 Pa. 187, 51 Atl. 751; Rauch's Estate, 21 Pa. Super. Ct. 60. Mr. Justice Mitchell, in the late case of Yerkes v. Yerkes, 200 Pa. 419, 50 Atl. 186, says: 'The doctrine of equitable conversion is based on the rule that what is to be or ought to be done shall be treated as if done already. It is a fiction, therefore, invented to sustain and carry out the intention of the testator or settlor, never to defeat it. Its application requires constant watchfulness to guard against the tendency to become a formal rule de jure without regard to its real purpose and necessity. It should never be overlooked that there is no real conversion. The property remains all the time in fact, realty or personalty, as it was; but for the purpose of the will, so far as it may be necessary, and only so far, it is treated in contemplation of law as if it had been converted. Few testators have any knowledge of the doctrine, or any actual intent to change the nature of their property, except when and to the extent that may be required to carry out the special purpose of the will. The presumption, therefore, no matter what the form of words used, is always against conversion, and even where it is required, it must be kept within the limits of actual necessity.' But conversion will take place, though the language confers a mere discretionary power of sale, where it is not possible to execute certain provisions of the will without a sale of the real and personal property into money. 'If a testator authorizes his executors to sell his real estate and to execute and deliver to the purchasers deeds in fee simple, . . . and it is clear from the face of his will that it was his intention that the power so conferred by him should be exercised, it will be construed as a direction to sell, and operate as an equitable conversion. If, in addition to this clear intention of the testator, it plainly appears that effect cannot be given to material provisions of the will without the exercise of this power, the conclusion is irresistible that a conversion is as effectually accomplished by the will, and the duties of the executors under it are the same, as if it contained a positive direction to sell.' Fahnestock v. Fahnestock,

"With these authoritative explanations of the doctrine of equitable conversion as applied in Pennsylvania, we turn to the will of the testator to ascertain his intent and his scheme of distribution. In brief, he gives general pecuniary legacies upwards of $700,000; devises certain of his real estate to two of his sisters for life, and at their death directs a sale by the executors; and devises and bequeaths the residue of his estate to his two sisters and three brothers-in-law. Whenever it is necessary or expedient for any purpose of the estate, of administration, distribution, or otherwise, the executors are given full power and discretion to sell any or all the real estate. The pecuniary legacies are to be paid before those to whom the residuary is given shall receive anything, because it is only what remains of the estate, after the specific legacies are paid, that passes as residue or remainder. These legacies pass to the legatees as money. The testator intended them to be paid in cash. There is nothing in the language of the will to show they are to be paid in any other way. Their character is personalty. He must have foreseen the necessity for a sale of his real estate to carry out his scheme of dividing his estate by first bestowing gifts upon the beneficiaries, in the form of pecuniary legacies. Else how were they to be paid? He therefore gives his executors full power to sell real estate whenever a sale is necessary for any purpose of the estate, of administration, distribution, or otherwise. It is true the power is discretionary, not direct and positive; but the intent is manifest that it is to be exercised if the purposes of distribution require it. The power is therefore to be construed as a direction to sell. The last codicil to the will was executed June 9, 1903,—less than seven months before testator's death. It will be observed he bequeaths $80,000 in pecuniary legacies to certain legatees who were included in the residuary clause of the will, thus giving them preference over the remaining residuary legatees. This amount, together with the legacies, given in the will, made money gifts, aggregating nearly $700,000, or several hundred thousand dollars more than his personal estate was then worth. The testator is presumed to have known the value of his personal estate at that time. He undoubtedly knew the extent of his gifts, and it would be passing strange if he intended their payment to be confined to the proceeds of the personal estate, resulting in each legatee receiving much less than the amount of the gift. The manifest intention of the testator is to first give legacies of different amounts, and what is left of the estate to five residuary legatees. The latter take what remains of the estate after the legacies have been first paid and satisfied thereout. 'A residuary clause in a will . . . is a gift of all that is left after the gifts specified or designated have been paid or satisfied.' Per Penrose, J., in Wood's Estate, 13 Pa. Dist. R. 195. It may be said the testator blended his real and personal estate, authorized a sale of the former by the executors when, in their discretion, the purpose of distribution required it. But there can be no shadow of doubt that in order to execute the will, carry out the provisions, and pay the general pecuniary legacies, it is absolutely necessary to sell the real estate. Effect cannot be given to the will without the exercise of the power of sale. For the purpose of administration and distribution, the proceeds of the lands must come into this court. It follows that an equitable conversion is as effectually accomplished by the will, and the duties of the executors under it are the same, as if it contained a positive direction to sell. In reaching this conclusion, the injunction of Yerkes v. Yerkes, 200 Pa. 419, 50 Atl. 186, to 'keep within the limits of actual necessity,' is observed.

"Although the tax is assessed by the appraiser upon the value of the lands situate in foreign states, it is really upon the proceeds to be brought here for distribution. In strictness it is the legacies themselves that are subject to the tax. General pecuniary legacies pass to the legatees only in the form of money. If real estate should be conveyed to such legatees in satisfaction of their legacies, it would only be a substituted equivalent for the pecuniary sum of the legacies. Miller v. Com. 111 Pa. 321, 2 Atl. 492. It is immaterial to this inquiry what the statutes of the states of Illinois and Tennessee are on the subject of collateral inheritance tax on lands within their jurisdiction owned by one dying domiciled in another state. Whether lands of this decedent situated in those states are liable to pay such tax or succession duty cannot affect the question before us. If there is an equitable conversion of the lands into personalty under the will of the decedent and the proceeds are brought in to this court for distribution among collaterals, the legacies payable out of such proceeds are liable for the collateral inheritance. From what has been said, it follows that the action of the appraiser must be sustained. In our view there is such an absolute necessity to sell the lands in the states of Illinois and Tennessee, and convert them into money, in order to pay general pecuniary legacies and carry out the intent of the testator and the provisions of his will, as to work an equitable conversion into personalty, the proceeds of which sales must be brought into this court for distribution. And now, July 21, 1904, appeal dismissed, at costs of appellants."

The status of the property at the instant of death must govern the question of tax, both as to liability and amount.

Where the conversion is not referable to the exact instant of testator's death, and where it may only take place provided the executors choose to exercise the power of sale, no legal conversion takes place which will bring the estate within the taxing power of the commonwealth.

Potter, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Louis C. Vanuxem, Esq., of Springfield township, Montgomery county, made his last will and testament, dated October 16, 1902. By item seven of his will he gives his executors full power and discretion to sell any or all of his real estate, whenever any such sale be necessary or expedient for any purpose of his estate, of administration, distribution, or otherwise. He was seised of certain real estate in Tennessee and Illinois, and upon this property the appraiser of collateral inheritance tax assessed taxes. This was done upon the ground that the directions in the will worked an equitable conversion of the lands into personal property, by authorizing the executors, in their discretion, to sell for distribution, and the further fact that it became necessary to sell in order to pay the pecuniary legatees. The orphans' court sustained the action of the appraiser. It was not pretended that the real estate in other states could be charged with collateral inheritance tax as real estate, but only by reason of the fact that it was necessary for the executors to sell it, in order to provide the money to pay the pecuniary legacies. And that being the case, the power to sell, if necessary to make distribution, became, under the manifest intent of the testator, a direction to sell. The judge of the orphans' court thus reasons it out in his opinion: "The pecuniary legacies are to be paid before those to whom the residuary is given shall receive anything, because it is only what remains of the estate, after the specific legacies are paid, that passes as residue or remainder. These legacies pass to the legatees as money. The testator intended them to be paid in cash. There is nothing in the language of the will to show they are to be paid in any other way. Their character is personalty. He must have foreseen the necessity for the sale of his real estate to carry out his scheme of dividing his estate by first bestowing gifts upon the beneficiaries in the form of pecuniary legacies. Else, how were they to be paid?"

The pecuniary legacies aggregated nearly $700,000, or very much more than the amount of the personal estate, so that we cannot see any way by which the executors can escape converting the land into money in order to carry out the provisions of the will. We agree with the conclusion of the court below that "an equitable conversion is as effectually accomplished by the will, and the duties of the executors under it are the same, as if it contained a positive direction to sell." It follows as a matter of course that, if sold, the proceeds of these lands must come into the courts of Pennsylvania for distribution. The tax, therefore, falls upon the legacies themselves, rather than upon the lands, which are now appraised in order to determine the amount of the tax. The opinion of the court below has met so clearly the questions involved in this appeal, and has disposed of them so fully, that further elaboration upon our part is both difficult and unnecessary.

The assignments of error are overruled and the decree of the orphan's court is affirmed.

Mitchell, Ch. J., dissenting:

I would reverse this judgment. The taxation of land not within the territorial limits of the state is admittedly beyond the legislative power, and the taxation of the value or proceeds of such land, under whatever form or disguise it is sought to be exercised, is upon the border line of questionable jurisdiction, and should be scrutinized closely, with every presumption against its validity. But, even if the lands in this case were within Pennsylvania, there was no proper conversion. They were devised as land to devisees named, and there is in the will no direction to sell, but only a power and discretion to do so when the executors should deem it expedient. The learned court below founded its judgment on the doctrine of necessity to carry out the will. But on this point the case falls clearly within the principle of Hunt's Appeal, 105 Pa. 128, 141, where it was held: "The most that can be said is that . . . [the testator] made a mistake as to the extent of his estate, and a sale of his real estate became necessary in order to pay his debts. But this is not to the purpose. The scheme of his will did not contemplate this, and if, by reason of the depreciation of his property, or for other cause, a necessity to sell the real estate arose which was not foreseen by the testator, it will not work a conversion, for the obvious reason that a conversion is always a question of intent." The necessity to sell which effects a conversion is one which must have been contemplated by the testator in order to carry out the scheme of his will, not a necessity as a matter of fact arising out of the actual circumstances of the estate after his death. Suppose the personalty, though insufficient to pay the pecuniary legacies at the time of testator's death, had so increased in value as to be sufficient before the time of payment: clearly there would have been no conversion which would require or justify an exertion of the executor's discretion which would subject these devisees' land to the payment of this tax, and equally so in the contrary case of a sufficiency of personalty at the death and a subsequent decline in value. Either case would come exactly within the quotation above made from Hunt's Appeal. To attribute the necessity to sell as within the contemplation of the testator seems to me like attributing the gift of foresight to those who are wise after the event. The testator gave large pecuniary legacies, but he had personal estate of still larger nominal value, and with this knowledge of his affairs he gave his executors, not a direction, but only a discretion, to sell. Clearly he did not contemplate a sale as a necessity, but only as a contingency, to be dealt with in the discretion of his executors.

I regard the present decision as at variance with the principles of all our later decisions, particularly Hunt's Appeal, 105 Pa. 128; Re Handley, 181 Pa. 339, 37 Atl. 587; Yerkes v. Yerkes, 200 Pa. 419, 50 Atl. 186; Sauerbier's Estate, 202 Pa. 187, 51 Atl. 751; and Cooper's Estate, 208 Pa. 628, 98 Am. St. Rep. 799, 56 Atl. 67.

PENNSYLVANIA SUPREME COURT.

GIRARD TRUST COMPANY

v.

MONTAGU M. W. BAIRD, Appt., et al.

(212 Pa. 41.)

Equitable mortgage—keeping alive after payment.

An assignment of real estate in the nature of an equitable mortgage may, by agreement between the parties, be kept alive after payment, so as to be valid security for a larger loan subsequently made, which will take priority over an assignment afterwards made to secure a loan from another person having notice of the prior agreement.

(May 8, 1905.)

APPPEAL by defendant Baird from a decree of the Court of Common Pleas, No. 2, for Philadelphia County in a proceeding to enforce a lien against certain real estate. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. J. W. Bayard, John G. Johnson, and Frank P. Prichard, for appellant:

The assignment of December 18, 1897,

Case Note.—The court, in deciding that the parties to an equitable mortgage may hold it after payment, as a continuing security for further advances, and that it is valid as against subsequent creditors with notice, cited Mitchell v. Coombs, 96 Pa. 430. This was a case in which a mortgage was executed to a bank as security for the payment of a bond. After the payment of the bond, the mortgagor being still indebted to the mortgagee, the mortgage, which had not been satisfied, was assigned to another bank, which advanced the amount still due. After the assignment was made, and before its record, other liens were filed, and the property was subsequently sold on foreclosure. In determining the priority of claims, the court held that, as to the mortgagor, his acquiescence in such an arrangement would, no doubt, estop him from was at most a mere mortgage of Tobias's interest in the real estate.

Kellum v. Smith, 33 Pa. 158; Harper's Appeal, 64 Pa. 315; Fessler's Appeal, 75 Pa. 483; Kinports v. Boynton, 120 Pa. 306, 6 Am. St. Rep. 706, 14 Atl. 135.

The loan secured by this mortgage having been paid off, the mortgage was extinguished, and cannot, as against creditors of the mortgagor, be revived.

Thomas's Appeal, 30 Pa. 378; Mitchell v. Coombs, 96 Pa. 430; Loverin v. Humboldt Safe Deposit & T. Co. 113 Pa. 6, 4 Atl. 191; Meigs v. Bunting, 141 Pa. 233, 23 Am. St. Rep. 273, 21 Atl. 588; Zimmerman v. Raup, 162 Pa. 112, 29 Atl. 352; Neale v. Dempster, 179 Pa. 569, 36 Atl. 338; Cook v. Berry, 193 Pa. 377, 44 Atl. 771.

If this mortgage had any validity as security for the loan of December 31, 1900. for $7,000, it was only valid to the extent of its face amount, namely, $2,500, and not the amount of that loan.

Re Neff, 185 Pa. 98, 39 Atl. 830; Bank of Commerce's Appeal, 44 Pa. 423.

Messrs. A. H. Wintersteen and George Tucker Bispham for appellee.

Mestrezat, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Joseph F. Tobias was the equitable owner of an undivided 169/800 part of certain real estate in Philadelphia, known as the "Old Oaks property," the legal title to which was in W. H. Jenks. Tobias borrowed money from the Fidelity Trust Company, from the Girard Trust Company, the plaintiff, from Montagu M. W. Baird, the defendant and appellant, and from Mr. Jenks. As collateral security for these loans, he "bargained, sold, assigned, and transferred" his setting up the payment of the bond to defeat a second mortgage, but, as to his judgment creditors, the transaction was of no legal force. As to them, the mortgage was satisfied, and no arrangement not apparent on its face would avail to continue its lien.

The same case was also cited in Peirce v. Black, 105 Pa. 345, in which the court held that an arrangement between the creditor and the judgment debtor, to keep a judgment alive to secure future advances, was valid between the parties. The court said: "We have no doubt that it is competent for the parties to a judgment . . . to change the purposes for which it may be held." But, with reference to creditors, the court said: "It is undoubtedly true that, as against subsequent lien creditors a mortgage or judgment once paid cannot be kept alive."

The cases of Loverin v. Humboldt Safe Deposit & T. Co. 113 Pa. 6, 4 Atl. 191, also cited in GIRARD TRUST CO. v. BAIRD, and Mitchell v. Coombs, were both referred to in Meigs v. Bunting, 141 Pa. 239, 23 Am. St. Rep. 273, 21 Atl. 588, in which the court said that, in the case of a mortgage, and a judgment on the accompanying bond, satisfaction of one is only presumptive payment of the debt. "The parties have an unquestionable right to extinguish one security, and keep the other alive." With reference to the right of a purchaser of the mortgaged premises at a sheriff's sale, the court said: A purchaser, finding the mortgage satisfied, but the judgment on the bond still apparently in force, may rely upon the records as conclusive evidence that the parties have exercised their right to maintain the judgment as a subsisting encumbrance, and therefore that the sale will discharge a mortgage subsequent thereto.

The Loverin Case is cited in Reap v. Battle, 155 Pa. 271, 20 Atl. 439, in which the court held that the satisfaction of a 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

mortgage by giving a renewal does not defeat the mortgagor's right to apply on the principal indebtedness an amount paid on the first mortgage as usury. The court said: "Though actual payment discharges a judgment or other encumbrance at law, it does not discharge it in equity if there are interests which require it to be kept alive for their protection." "There is no doubt that a mortgage may be kept alive, even after payment in full, if such was the intention of the parties. Wilson v. Murphy, 1 Phila. 203."

Another authority cited is Joslyn v. Wyman, 5 Allen, 62. This was a case in which the owner of an equity of redemption attempted to compel the mortgagee to execute a release of the mortgage after payment and surrender of the notes secured by it, but where the mortgagee had advanced a new loan, and new notes had been given, but the original mortgage had not been canceled. A court of equity, in refusing to grant relief, said: Such cases are based upon the fact that at no period of time has there been an actual extinguishment of the indebtedness secured by the mortgage. But it seems equally clear that, after an actual payment of the debt, the mortgage cannot be revived by an oral agreement to keep it in force to secure a distinct and independent debt. Merrill v. Chase, 3 Allen, 339.

The Joslyn Case is cited in Edwards v. Dwight, 68 Ala. 391, in which the court said that reasons, founded on public policy, would cause us to hesitate long before declaring that, before a mortgage security is executed to secure a debt of definite amount, parol evidence may be let in to tack to the mortgage another or different debt, whether sought to be done under an alleged contemporaneous or subsequent agreement. But the court also said: "There are cases that hold that, after a mortgage has become inoperative by the pay-interest in the Old Oaks property to each of his creditors, but none of these assignments was recorded. This bill was filed by the Girard Trust Company against Tobias, the Fidelity Trust Company, Baird, and Jenks for the purpose of having determined the priorities of lien of the several assignments, and for a decree directing the sale of Tobias's interest in the property and application of the proceeds to the payment of the plaintiff's lien. The plaintiff loaned Tobias $2,500 on August 19, 1897, and the same amount on December 18, 1897, and on each occasion took as collateral security the assignment of his interest in the Old Oaks property. Subsequently these loans were paid, but, instead of the assignment of December 18, 1897, being returned to Tobias, it was then agreed by the parties that the plaintiff should retain it to secure future loans. On December 31, 1900, the plaintiff company loaned Tobias $7,000, for which a promissory note was given, in which it was recited that he had "deposited as collateral security for the payment of this liability . . . assignment of an undivided interest of 169/800 in Old Oaks property, dated 12/19/97." The loan of the Fidelity Trust Company was made July 13, 1886; of Mr. Jenks, July 12, 1900; and of Mr. Baird, February 20, 1901. Accompanying each of the several loans was an assignment of Tobias's interest in the Old Oaks property as collateral security.

The court below held that the assignments were unrecorded equitable mortgages, and entered a decree that the several assignees had a lien against Tobias's interest in the Old Oaks property from the dates of their respective assignments, and that they were entitled to participate in the proceeds of the property according to the priority of date ment of the debt secured, it may be again delivered as a security for a further indebtedness, and will be binding on the parties to the transaction;" and to this cited Choteau v. Thompson, 2 Ohio St. 114, and Shirras v. Caig, 7 Cranch, 34, 3 L. ed. 260.

The court also cited the case of Stone v. Lane, 10 Allen, 74, which was a case in which the owner of an equity of redemption, who received the conveyance from the assignees in insolvency of the mortgagor, sought to redeem a mortgage which was held, after a breach of a condition under an oral agreement, as security for further payments in behalf of the mortgagor. In this case the court granted relief after allowance was made for such advancements.

In Atwater v. Underhill, 22 N. J. Eq. 599, also cited as an authority, the mortgage of a third person, which had been given as collateral security, was discharged by the release of the debtor from liability, but was repledged without the knowledge or authority of the owner of the mortgaged premises. The court said: "A mortgage which has been satisfied may be given a new vitality by a redelivery by the mortgagor to the mortgagee, or a third person, upon a new consideration, or for a purpose different from that for which it was made. Robinson v. Urquhart, 12 N. J. Eq. 515; Hoy v. Bramhall, 19 N. J. Eq. 563, 97 Am. Dec. 687. But, to give such effect to the mortgage, the repledging must be made by the authority of the person whose estate is sought to be held for the performance of the new obligation."

Other cases and text-books citing the authorities referred to in GIRARD TRUST CO. v. BAIRD may be mentioned as bearing on the doctrine established in that case.

In Carpenter v. Plagge, 192 Ill. 96, 61 N. E. 530, the court held that a mortgage which was due because of a breach of a condition may be held as security for additional L.R.A. (N.S.)

vances made subsequent to the breach; and cites Anthony v. Anthony, 23 Ark. 479; Scripture v. Johnson, 3 Conn. 211; and Brown v. Stewart, 56 Md. 431,—as sustaining that doctrine. This is on the theory that he who wishes the aid of a court of equity must do equity by paying the debt intended to be secured, according to the real equities between the parties. But the rule is limited to cases where the mortgagee is invested with the legal title to the property, and where the rights of subsequent encumbrancers are not prejudiced. Among the cases of this kind are Brown v. Gaffney, 32 Ill. 251; Williamson v. Downs, 34 Miss. 402; Upton v. National Bank, 120 Mass. 153; Pierce v. Le Monier, 172 Mass. 513, 53 N. E. 125; Re Neff, 185 Pa. 101, 39 Atl. 830. See also 11 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 230.

In Jones on Mortgages, § 362, it is stated that a mortgage which has been satisfied, and delivered up to the mortgagor without being canceled, may again be delivered by him as a valid security for another debt, by agreement of the parties; redelivery gives it validity again, except as against intervening interests. But section 947 states the rule as follows: "After a mortgage is once paid, whether it can, by a mere verbal agreement of parties, be transferred to a new debt, which it was not originally given to secure, may be questioned, but it is certain that the mortgage cannot be retained against the will of the mortgagor, as security for another debt." Section 948 states: "Generally the chief difficulty in reviving or continuing in force a mortgage which has been substantially satisfied is on account of the intervening rights of third persons."

of the assignments. From this decree Baird has appealed, and raises the single question of the right of the plaintiff company to have priority over him in the distribution of the proceeds of the sale of the interest of Tobias in the Old Oaks property. The appellant contends (1) that the original loan of $2,500 by the Girard Trust Company, secured by the assignment of December 18, 1897, having been paid off, the assignment, which is conceded to be a mortgage, was extinguished, and could not, as against creditors of the mortgagor, be revived; and (2) that, if the mortgagor had any validity as a security for the loan of $7,000 of December 31, 1900, it was only valid to the extent of its face amount, $2,500, and not the amount of the larger loan.

We do not regard either of these positions as tenable. The appellant concedes that the several assignments made by Tobias were equitable mortgages on his undivided interest in the Old Oaks property, and acquiesces in the position of the court below that they have priority according to their respective dates. It is true that a mortgage paid by the mortgagor cannot be kept alive and retain its lien against subsequent mortgage and judgment creditors without notice. But, as between the parties to the instrument, the mortgage may, by agreement, be kept alive and be enforced against the mortgagor for the amount of the loan secured by it. In Mitchell v. Coombs, 96 Pa. 430, a mortgage was given to a bank to secure a bond, which was subsequently paid by the obligor, but the mortgage was retained by the bank as security for further discounts. In delivering the opinion of this court, Mr. Justice Gordon says: "As to Coombs [mortgagor], his acquiescence in this arrangement [retention of mortgage to secure future advancements] would, no doubt, estop him from setting up the payment of the bond to defeat the mortgage; but, as to his judgment creditors, the transaction was of no legal force. As to them the mortgage was satisfied, and no arrangement, not apparent on its face, would avail to continue its lien." Loverin v. Humboldt Safe Deposit & T. Co. 113 Pa. 6, 4 Atl. 191, was, as stated by the court, an attempt to keep alive a mortgage which had been paid by the mortgagors against a subsequent unpaid mortgage given by the same mortgagors upon the same premises. Of course, this could not be done but in delivering the opinion Mr. Justice Paxson says: "Where creditors are not concerned there is perhaps no legal reason why it [keeping the mortgage alive] may not be done. Though actual payment discharges a judgment or other encumbrance at law, it does not discharge it in equity, if there are interests which require it to be kept alive for their protection. Thus it may be kept on foot for the protection of a paying surety, and other cases which it is not necessary to name. And it was said by Sharswood, J., in Wilson v. Murphy, 1 Phila. 203, 'there is no doubt that a mortgage may be kept alive, even after payment in full, if such were the intention of the parties, and even though there be no actual assignment to a trustee.' And in Massachusetts, while a mortgage cannot be kept alive by an oral agreement as security for a new indebtedness, yet it is there held that if such an agreement has been made, and money has been advanced in consequence thereof by the mortgagee to the mortgagor, a court of equity will not aid the latter, or one claiming under him with knowledge of the facts, in obtaining a discharge of the mortgage. Joslyn v. Wyman, 5 Allen, 62 Stone v. Lane, 10 Allen, 74; Upton v. National Bank, 120 Mass. 153.

It is therefore clear, we think, that the parties to a judgment or mortgage, as between themselves, may, by agreement, continue its lien, notwithstanding payment in full has been made by the debtor. There is no reason why this should not be so. It is simply permitting the parties to exercise the right of contract which they unquestionably have; and such an agreement binds not only the parties to the instrument, but also subsequent creditors with notice. It is settled that a third party with notice is bound by a contract between the mortgagor and the mortgagee to keep alive the security. Such party has no standing in law or equity to demand that his mortgage, taken with notice, shall have precedence over a prior mortgage, held to secure payment, of a bona fide loan. This principle is supported by authority as well as by reason. In Nice's Appeal, 54 Pa. 200, it is distinctly held that an unrecorded mortgage will avail, not only against the mortgagor, but also against his alienee and mortgage with notice. In Mellon's Appeal, 32 Pa. 121, Mr. Justice Strong, speaking for the court, says that, notwithstanding the recording acts, it has uniformly been held that an unrecorded mortgage is good as against the mortgagor, or anyone claiming under him with notice; and in Britton's Appeal, 45 Pa. 172, it was held that a mortgage given for the purchase-money of real estate, executed before, but not recorded until after, judgments had been entered against the mortgagor, is entitled to priority over them in the distribution of the proceeds of a sheriff's sale of the land, where the judgment creditors had actual knowledge of the mortgage before the debts were contracted for which the judgments were obtained. The doctrine of these authorities has been announced and enforced in many other cases decided by this court.

We are of opinion that the parties to the assignment of December 18, 1897, could agree to keep it alive in order to secure further loans, and that the assignment was valid, and had priority over a subsequent assignment by Tobias, taken with notice of the agreement. It was found as a fact by the court below that Baird, before making his loan to Tobias, had notice of the prior assignment to the Girard Trust Company, which was retained to secure the payment of the $7,000 loan made in December, 1900, and hence he is not in a position to deny its priority over his assignment made in February, 1901. And we also think that the assignment retained by the plaintiff company was effective to secure the full amount of the new loan. This is on the same principle that the parties could, by agreement, continue its validity to secure another loan. If the parties by contract could give the assignment life to secure another loan after the amount named in it had been paid, there is no reason why they could not at the same time stipulate the amount for which it was to remain a security. "We have no doubt," says Paxson, J., in Peirce v. Black, 105 Pa. 342, "that it is competent for the parties to a judgment, by their own agreement, to change the purposes for which it may be held." And in Atwater v. Underhill, 22 N. J. Eq. 599, Depue, J., in delivering the opinion, says: "A mortgage which has been satisfied may be given a new vitality by a redelivery by the mortgagor to the mortgagee, or a third person, upon a new consideration, or for a purpose different from that for which it was made." The original loan to Tobias was paid, and therefore the assignment was no longer held to secure its payment. The assignor received another sum of money from the assignee, for which the parties agreed that the instrument should remain a security. Tobias, the assignor, is not seeking to invalidate his contract, and is not contesting the right of the plaintiff to retain the assignment to secure the payment of the larger loan; and why should Baird, with notice of the sum loaned, occupy a higher ground? Why permit him to attack the validity of the contract, and enable him to prevent the payment of the plaintiff's loan and thereby secure his own loan, made with full knowledge of the contract and the amount of the loan the assignment secured? To permit him to do so under the circumstances would be a fraud on the plaintiff company, which on the faith of the contract furnished the $7,000. A court of equity will not lend its assistance to a party to secure a fund on which an L.R.A. (N.S.)

other has a claim which is prior in time and of superior equity.

The decree is affirmed.

PENNSYLVANIA SUPREME COURT.

JAMES RUSS, Appt.,

v.

COMMONWEALTH OF PENNSYLVANIA.

1. Legislative committee—public function—contract for entertainment.

Authority to contract for transportation and entertainment is conferred upon a legislative committee by a resolution, treated by the legislature as legislation, by which it decides to attend a public function in a body, and refers all matters pertaining to such attendance to the committee.

2. Salary limit—allowance for expenses.

A resolution by a legislative body to attend a patriotic event at public expense does not contravene a constitutional provision fixing the salaries of the members, and ordaining that they shall receive no other compensation whatever.

(January 9, 1905.)

APPPEAL by petitioner from a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas for Dauphin County dismissing his petition to secure compensation for services alleged to have been rendered to the legislature. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the following opinion delivered by WEISS, P. J., in the court below, overruling a motion to take off the judgment of nonsuit:

The plaintiff was authorized and allowed by an act of assembly approved April 25,

Case Note.—The questions decided in the above case do not seem to have been decided or considered in any prior decision. Legislative committees from Congress and state legislatures have often been sent to attend public functions of various kinds, at which it seemed fitting to the legislatures that there should be representation and participation on behalf of the government. Of the cases cited in briefs of counsel in support of the expenditure in the above case, that of Morton v. Philadelphia, 4 Pa. Dist. R. 523, decided that the sending of the Liberty Bell to the Atlanta exposition as a Pennsylvania exhibit was not unlawful; and that an appropriation to pay the expenses of the transfer and committee attending it was also lawful. The court, in this case, cites various decisions in support of the doctrine that it is within the power and discretion of municipal authorities to appropriate money for the commemoration of events of public in-1903 (P. L. 315), to bring suit in this court against the commonwealth "to recover any sum or sums of money that may be legally or justly due him." He sued in assumpsit, and in his statement claims $5,911.16, with interest from May 1, 1897, on a book account for "table supplies, wines, liquors, car fare, services, etc." furnished to the legislature of Pennsylvania on the occasion of the excursion of that body "to New York city to attend the General Grant monument dedication ceremonies." April 27, 1897. The claim is founded upon a contract entered into by the committee of military affairs of the senate and house of representatives of Pennsylvania with the plaintiff, claiming to act pursuant to a concurrent resolution passed by the senate and house of representatives after the same was disapproved by the governor and returned with his objections to the senate, in which it originated, and the house of representatives, and which read as follows: "In the Senate, March 25, 1897. Whereas, the dedication of a monument, erected in memory of the late General U. S. Grant, in New York, occurs on April 27th, and is a matter of national importance, which the commonwealth of Pennsylvania should suitably recognize as commemorating the life and deeds of a hero whose memory we revere; therefore, be it resolved (if the house concur), that the members of the senate and house of representatives attend said dedication in a body, and that all matters pertaining to such attendance be referred to the committee of military affairs of the senate and house." The cause came on for trial, and was so proceeded in that at the close of the plaintiff's testimony the defendant moved that a nonsuit be directed to be entered, which the court allowed, and the correctness of the allowance of the motion therefor is now for consideration.

The question embraces the authority of the committee of military affairs to make the contract, and, if such authority is given, whether the legislature has the power to confer the authority to enter into the contract with the plaintiff. The plaintiff urges the view that, as the legislature has unlimited power to tax, so it has unlimited power to expend public moneys, except as it is restrained by constitutional ordinance. The power to tax the subject, when exercised, is for public purposes, and it ought to follow that the power to expend public revenues is exercisable for public uses. A contract authorized by the legislature ought to be expressed in clear and unambiguous terms. Nothing relating to the essence of the contract should be left to inference. The reverence for the memory of the hero whose terest, or for the entertainment of guests of the city. One of these cases is Tagg v. Philadelphia, 18 W. N. C. 79, which decided that it was entirely competent for the city council to appropriate money for a dinner given by the city to a committee headed by the mayor of New Orleans, who came as an official escort of honor to the Liberty Bell upon its return from the New Orleans exposition of 1885; although, in contrast to this, United States Judge Pardee held, in Bayle v. New Orleans, 23 Fed. 843, that the city of New Orleans should be enjoined from making an appropriation to defray the expenses of returning that bell to Philadelphia on that occasion. The case was brought within the jurisdiction of the Federal court by joining a citizen of the French Republic as a plaintiff. In Tatham v. Philadelphia, 2 W. N. C., page 564, an appropriation of $50,000 to meet the contingent expenses incident to the Centennial Exposition at Philadelphia was sustained on the authority of other cases, some of them unreported, in which expenditures of public money for entertaining guests of the city, and for similar objects, had been upheld. The court also refers to numerous instances in which such expenditure had been incurred without being contested in court. In this case the court quotes from Dillon on Municipal Corporations, vol. 1, § 149, to the effect that, "without express power, a public corporation cannot make a contract to provide for celebrating the Fourth of July, or to provide an entertainment for its citizens or guests;" 1 L.R.A. (N.S.) citing the following cases: Hodges v. Bufalo, 2 Denio, 110; Cornell v. Guilford, 1 Denio, 510; Hood v. Lynn, 1 Allen, 103; Gerry v. Stoneham, 1 Allen, 319; Hale v. People, 87 Ill. 72; and further citing Tash v. Adams, 10 Cush. 252, in denial of the right to use public money of a municipality to celebrate the surrender of Cornwallis. These cases are, however, distinguished by the Tatham Case on the ground that the interpretation of the Philadelphia charter must be made in the light of long usage, under which such expenditures had been made many times.

Without going at greater length into this question of the power of a municipality to make such expenditures, it is, of course, obvious that this question is very different from the question of the power of the state legislature, which is limited only by constitutional provisions. None of the works on constitutional law seem to furnish any specific authority on this question. It therefore seems to rest entirely on the general doctrines of the extent of legislative power, except as limited by constitutional restrictions. The contention in the above case of Russ v. Com., that the payment from public money of the expenses of the whole body of the legislature while in attendance on a public function to celebrate a patriotic event amounts to an unconstitutional increase in their salaries, raises an entirely new question so far as can be discovered, and the decision on that point is one of first impression.

monument was to be dedicated is expressed in apt language in the concurrent resolution. So is that part of the resolution which recognizes the propriety of attendance by the senate and house of representatives at the ceremonies incident to the commemoration of the life and deeds of the great soldier. But the entertaining clause, from which the authority to contract must be derived, lacks the perspicuity which characterizes the other declarations. "All matters pertaining to such attendance be referred to the committee of military affairs" is not expressive of authority to contract for food and drink. The latter are incident to sustenance, but not to attendance, as such, upon a ceremonial. It would have been an easy task to embody in the resolution the delegation of authority to the joint committee to make the contract with the plaintiff. It could not be said of a person who would refer all matters pertaining to a mission, not of a business character, to another, not theretofore employed by him, that authority was thereby given to bind the party referring the matters, by a contract. The very act of reference would indicate that some report should be made to him. The resolution is silent as to the character and extent of the entertainment or the price to be paid. If it contemplated viands, it was unlimited in quantity and expenditure. It is true, the intention of the legislature must be ascertained; but it must be ascertained from the context, and not from what may have been in the breasts of the legislators or of the members of the joint committee. Little can be predicated upon the construction put upon the resolution by the joint committee or the members of the legislature. The testimony discloses the alacrity with which some of the members of the joint committee engaged potables immediately after its organization. It was incurring indebtedness for personal and private objects. That the attendance was to be by the body does not stamp it with a public character. The dedicatory services were of a general public character. But the attendance by the members of the senate and house of representatives in a body was nevertheless a private or personal affair. The effect of such construction is that public moneys are expended upon the members of the legislature attending the dedication in a body, and that by themselves upon themselves. The resolution lacks every element of authority to expend public money for public purposes, and interpretation of the resolution by themselves for their personal entertainment is not persuasive.

The vice of the resolution, so far as concerns a contract, is that it does not obligate the state to pay, or authorize it to be done; 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

nor does it disclose the banqueting feature as an incident to the dedication, nor that public money was to be appropriated to defray the expenses incurred during the attendance. That may have been the intention in the mind of the legislators, or it may be gathered from the subsequent action of the body or committee. But the resolution itself gives no token of such a purpose, and no extraneous intention can be read into it.

Nor is the act of May 15, 1903 (P. L. 406), making an appropriation for badges furnished, or "merchandise furnished," as it is generically called in the act, any aid in construing the resolution as conferring authority to contract this bill. An appropriation following the resolution would establish an analogy, but bills of appropriation made for the purpose were twice vetoed by two successive governors. Concurrent resolutions were passed in 1899 (P. L. 407) and in 1903 (P. L. 547) authorizing the appointment of committees to make arrangements for the inauguration of governors, who were authorized to expend a designated sum in carrying out the same, and whose chairmen were required to file with the accounting department vouchers and full proofs showing the manner of disbursements; and these were followed by appropriations of moneys for the purpose (P. L. 1899, p. 48; P. L. 1903, p. 534). It is apparent that this affords no guide to the interpretation of the resolution under consideration.

A reference by the legislature of all matters pertaining to an excursion to a committee is too vague and uncertain to warrant the conclusion that thereby the committee was empowered to contract with the plaintiff for food and drink to be furnished on this occasion. That the members of the legislature participated in the feast does not show that providing and serving it was contemplated by the terms of the concurrent resolution, nor does so doing bind the commonwealth. It is against the interest of the state to sustain the doctrine that the legislature may expend public money upon a banquet provided during an attendance by the members in a body upon a dedication public in its nature, pursuant to a resolution of reference to a committee, which in general terms embraces all matters pertaining to the attendance. It is no hardship to require, if such power exists, that the purpose be clearly expressed; and rules of interpretation cannot be invoked, by way of enlarging authority, to transform a memorial resolution into a contract for a festival. A reference does not imply power of final action. The resolution is ominously silent in respect of the object of the reference so far as relates to the subject-matter of this claim, or of the commonwealth's liability for anything the committee might do, or of the extent of the obligation to be incurred, or of the moneys to be appropriated therefor. If not suppressed, all this is unexpressed. Except by ratification, authority in writing is not construed into a contract by subsequent events. It is established by the instrument, and a reference of matters pertaining to an attendance upon a ceremony is at variance with power to contract a bill for food and drink, which, however necessary, are not pertinent to the attendance. Assuming the general power of the legislature to make or authorize a contract of this kind, a safe premise to lay down is that the contract or the authority to make it must be set forth in clear and unambiguous language, and that nothing substantive can be left to conjecture. This resolution, in our opinion, offends against this rule, and the right of the committee to make the contract claimed must be denied.

Having failed to show authority on the part of the committee with whom he contracted, the plaintiff's claim falls. He has no cause of action, and consequently has no right of recovery from the commonwealth. In view of the foregoing, there is no need to determine whether there is a constitutional inhibition against the making of the contract or authorizing it to be made by the legislature, and the motion to take off the judgment of nonsuit is accordingly overruled.

Messrs. John E. Fox and M. W. Jacobs, for appellant:

The power to make arrangements necessarily carried with it the power to create expenses for the carrying out of the arrangements.

The joint committee, composed of a large number of members of both houses, construed the resolution to authorize the incurring of expenses: a great majority of the members of both houses so construed it, as also did the legislature of 1897, by passing the vetoed bill, and the legislature of 1903, by passing the approved act. We thus have the contemporaneous construction, which is always valuable and persuasive, and the subsequent act, which was not only in pari materia, but was directly interpretative.

The intention of the legislature is the thing to be ascertained, and, in ascertaining 1 L.R.A. (N.S.) it, if the circumstances so require, the courts will go beyond the letter of the legislative act, and even give the act a construction which appears to be contrary to its letter.

The granting of authority to make contracts binding upon the state belongs to the legislative power.

Just as the legislature had practically unlimited power of taxation (Com. ex rel. Hepburn v. Mann, 5 Watts & S. 403; Kirby v. Shaw, 19 Pa. 258), so it had practically unlimited power to spend the money raised by taxation.

Prima facie, the legislative authority is absolute, except where expressly limited.

If long-continued and constant legislative practice is entitled to any weight in the construction of legislative powers, there is on our statute books a vast accumulation of precedents in favor of this claim.

The furnishing of entertainment is not of itself beyond the powers of the legislature.

The argument that the possibility of the abuse of the power to make such contracts must result in denying the existence of the power has no more merit.

Messrs. C. H. Bergner, Frederic W. Fleitz, and Hampton L. Carson, Attorney General, for appellee:

If the language used in the joint resolution does not plainly and unmistakably mean that a contract binding the state is authorized to be made by the committee of military affairs, a subsequent act of the legislature, expressly declaring that the words used shall be construed to mean that such contract could be made, would be unconstitutional.

Com. ex rel. Roney v. Warwick, 172 Pa. 144, 33 Atl. 373.

A single meal, or a single drink of liquor, for a member of the legislature, paid for by the state, is as much an increase of his compensation to that extent as it would be to add a substantial sum of money to his salary, or to treble his mileage.

Buckalew, Const. p. 40.

Brown, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Want of authority from the state to the committees of military affairs of the senate and house to enter into a contract with the plaintiff was the reason given for the entry of the nonsuit, and the refusal to take it off. If there was such authority, it is to be found in the following preamble and resolution passed over the veto of the governor: "Whereas, the dedication of a monument erected in memory of the late General U. S. Grant, in New York, occurs on April 27th, and is a matter of national importance, which the commonwealth of Pennsylvania should suitably recognize as commemorating the life and deeds of a hero whose memory we revere; therefore, be it resolved (if the house concur), that the members of the senate and house of representatives attend such dedication in a body, and that all matters pertaining to such attendance be referred to the committee of military affairs of the senate and house." In the preamble there is not only a recognition by the people of the state, through their representatives, of the national importance of the dedication of the monument to a great soldier, but an avowal of the commonwealth's duty to suitably recognize the event. This was laudable, because it was patriotic. By the resolution, action was taken, committing the state to participation in the dedicatory exercises. It was sent to the governor for his approval, because it must have been regarded by those who passed it as committing the state to it; and, if so, it was a matter in the nature of legislation. It is only such resolutions that require executive approval, under § 26 of article 3 of the Constitution of 1874. Com. ex rel. Elkin v. Griest, 196 Pa. 396, 50 L. R. A. 568, 46 Atl. 505. If both houses had 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

simply resolved to attend the exercises in a body, and to adjourn for a day for that purpose, it would have been no concern of the governor, and they could have gone with or without his approval; but, if more was embodied in the resolution, amounting practically to an enactment authorizing special committees of the senate and house to act on behalf of the state in making suitable the recognition which both branches of the legislature had agreed upon, it was for the governor to approve or disapprove.

But the contention of the learned counsel for the commonwealth is that, even if the resolution does involve legislation, no authority to act was conferred upon the committees by the words, "all matters pertaining to such attendance be referred to the committee of military affairs of the senate and house;" their duty being simply to consider and report to the respective houses. This cannot be regarded as the reasonable meaning of the words. While there is no express authority given to the committees to do any particular thing, there is, on the other hand, no direction to them to report; and that they were to act, and not simply report what further action each house should take, seems to be manifest. The resolution was first introduced in the senate. Why should it ask for a report from the committee of military affairs of the house as to what it should do, and why should the house, subsequently concurring in the resolution to attend the dedication in a body, ask for a report from the senate's committee? Both bodies had resolved to go, and referred all matters in connection with their going to a joint committee composed of the appropriate committee of each. The intention of the legislature is to be gathered, not from the strained, but from the natural, meaning of the reference to the committee of all matters relating to the attendance. "All matters pertaining to such attendance" certainly included arrangements for the transportation and entertainment of the members of the legislature, and, if these were referred to the committees, the common understanding would be that they were to make them. If so, the power had necessarily been conferred on the committees of contracting for such arrangements. They so understood the resolution; the plaintiff, who dealt with them, had the same understanding of it; and the members themselves intended that it should be so understood, for, without calling for or receiving any report from the committees, they accepted the arrangements that had been made for them. The failure of the learned court below to so interpret it must be regarded as error. We consider this clear, with nothing before us except the resolution itself; but subsequent legislation, while not purporting to be expository of it, unmistakably indicates the legislative understanding of what was intended by it. By an act passed at the same session, though vetoed by the governor because regarded as an improper expenditure of the public funds, an appropriation was made for the payment of the expenses incurred by the legislature "in attending the ceremonies connected with the unveiling of the monument at the tomb of General U. S. Grant." From the testimony, it appears that the only expenses incurred were for the entertainment furnished by the plaintiff, and for badges supplied by J. H. Shaw. By the act of May 15, 1903 (P. L. 406), the sum of $421 was appropriated in payment of the badges furnished by Shaw. These acts were passed by the legislature with § 11 of article 3 of the Constitution before it, providing that no bill shall be passed "for the payment of any claim against the commonwealth without previous authority of law." The authority of law here was the reference by the legislature of all matters pertaining to the attendance to the committees of military affairs of the senate and house. The resolution and acts of 1897 and 1903 related to the same subject-matter, and are to be considered together in determining the legislative intention. "The correct rule of interpretation is that, if divers statutes relate to the same thing, they ought all to be taken into consideration in construing any one of them; and it is an established rule of law that all acts in pari materia are to be taken together, as if they were one law. Dougl. 30; 2 T. R. 387, 586; 4 Maule & S. 210. If a thing contained in a subsequent statute be within the reason of the former statute, it shall be taken to be within the meaning of that statute. Id. Raym. 1028. And if it can be gathered from a subsequent statute in pari materia what meaning the legislature attached to the words of a former statute, they will amount to a legislative declaration of its meaning, and will govern the construction of the first statute. Morris v. Mellin, 6 Barn. & C. 454; 7 Barn. & C. 99. Wherever any words of a statute are doubtful or obscure, the intention of the legislature is to be resorted to, in order to find the meaning of the words. Wimbish v. Tailbois, 1 Plowd. 57. A thing which is within the intention of the makers of the statute is as much within the statute as if it were within the letter. Stowel v. Zouch, 1 Plowd. 356. These citations are but different illustrations of the rule that the meaning of the legislature may be extended beyond the precise words used in the law, from the reason or motive upon which the legislature proceeded, from the end in view, or the pur- 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

pose which was designed,—the limitation of the rule being that, to extend the meaning to any case not included in the words, the case must be shown to come within the same reason upon which the lawmaker proceeded, and not only within a like reason." United States v. Freeman, 3 How. 556, 11 L. ed. 724.

A second question raised by the appellee is as to the power of the legislature to authorize the committees to make such a contract as the one on which the plaintiff sues. The test of legislative power is constitutional restriction. What the people have not said in the organic law their representatives shall not do, they may do. It is hardly needful that authorities be cited and multiplied in support of this, but, as they seem to be unheeded whenever legislation is not in accord with the sense of right, propriety, and reason of those affected by it, there is nothing for us to do, except to keep on repeating, even at great length, what has been said, in the hope that ultimately legislative power may be better understood. "The Constitution allows to the legislature every power which it does not positively prohibit." Norris v. Clymer, 2 Pa. St. 277. "To me it is as plain that the general assembly may exercise all powers which are properly legislative, and which are not taken away by our own or by the Federal Constitution, as it is that the people have all the rights which are expressly reserved. We are urged, however, to go further than this, and to hold that a law, though not prohibited, is void if it violates the spirit of our institutions, or impairs any of those rights which it is the object of a free government to protect, and to declare it unconstitutional if it be wrong and unjust. But we cannot do this. It would be assuming a right to change the Constitution, to supply what we might conceive to be its defects, to fill up every casus omissus, and to interpolate into it whatever, in our opinion, ought to have been put there by its framers. The Constitution has given us a list of the things which the legislature may not do. If we extend that list, we alter the instrument; we become ourselves the aggressors, and violate both the letter and spirit of the organic law as grossly as the legislature possibly could. If we can add to the reserved rights of the people, we can take them away; if we can mend, we can mar; if we can remove the landmarks which we find established, we can obliterate them; if we can change the Constitution in any particular, there is nothing but our own will to prevent us from demolishing it entirely. The great powers given to the legislature are liable to be abused. But this is inseparable from the nature of human institutions. The wisdom of man has never conceived of a government with power sufficient to answer its legitimate ends, and at the same time incapable of mischief. No political system can be made so perfect that its rulers will always hold it to the true course. In the very best, a great deal must be trusted to the discretion of those who administer it. In ours, the people have given larger powers to the legislature, and relied for the faithful execution of them on the wisdom and honesty of that department, and on the direct accountability of the members to their constituents. There is no shadow of reason for supposing that the mere abuse of power was meant to be corrected by the judiciary. There is nothing more easy than to imagine a thousand tyrannical things which the legislature may do, if its members forget all their duties, disregard utterly the obligations they owe to their constituents, and recklessly determine to trample upon right and justice." Black, Ch. J., in Sharpless v. Philadelphia, 21 Pa. 147, 59 Am. Dec. 759. "However easy it may be to demonstrate that public debts ought not to be created for the benefit of private corporations, and that such a system of making improvements is impolitic, dangerous, and contrary to the principles of a sound public morality, we can find nothing in the Constitution on which we can rest our consciences in saying that it is forbidden by that instrument." Moers v. Reading, 21 Pa. 188. "Nothing but a clear violation of the Constitution—a clear usurpation of power prohibited—will justify the judicial department in pronouncing an act of the legislative department unconstitutional and void." Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Riblet, 66 Pa. 164, 5 Am. Rep. 360. "To justify a court in pronouncing an act of the legislature unconstitutional and void, either in whole or in part, it must be able to vouch some exception or prohibition clearly expressed or necessarily implied. To doubt is to be resolved in favor of the constitutionality of the act. This rule of construction is so well settled by authority that it is entirely unnecessary to cite the cases." Com. ex rel. Wolfe v. Butler, 99 Pa. 535. "In creating a legislative department, and conferring upon it the legislative power, the people must be understood to have conferred the full and complete authority as it vests in and may be exercised by the sovereign power of any state, subject only to such restrictions as they have seen fit to impose, and to the limitations which are contained in the Constitution of the United States. The legislative department is not made a special agency for the exercise of specially defined legislative powers, but is intrusted with the general authority to make laws at discretion." Powell v. Com. 114 Pa. 265, 60 Am. Rep. 350, 7 Atl. 913. "But whatever the people have not, by their Constitution, restrained themselves from doing, they, through their representatives in the legislature, may do. This latter body represents their will just as completely as a constitutional convention in all matters left open by the written Constitution. Certain grants of power, very specifically set forth, were made by the states to the United States, and these cannot be revoked or disregarded by state legislation. Then come the specific restraints imposed by our own Constitution upon our own legislature; these must be respected; but in that wide domain not included in either of these boundaries the right of the people, through the legislature, to enact such laws as they choose, is absolute. Of the use the people may make of this unrestrained power, it is not the business of the courts to inquire. We peruse the expressions of their will in the statute; then examine the Constitution, and ascertain if this instrument says: 'Thou shalt not;' and, if we find no inhibition, then the statute is the law, simply because it is the will of the people, and not because it is wise or unwise." Com. ex rel. McCormick v. Reeder, 171 Pa. 505, 33 L. R. A. 141, 33 Atl. 67. "Prima facie, the legislative authority is absolute, except where expressly limited. This is the uniform principle of all political and legal views, and of all constructions recognized by constitutional law." Com. ex rel. Elkin v. Moir, 199 Pa. 534, 53 L. R. A. 837, 85 Am. St. Rep. 801, 49 Atl. 351. "The rule of law upon this subject appears to be that, except where the Constitution has imposed limits upon the legislative power, it must be considered as practically absolute, whether it operate according to natural justice, or not, in any particular case. The courts are not the guardians of the rights of the people of the state, except as those rights are secured by some constitutional provision which comes within the judicial cognizance. The protection against unwise or oppressive legislation, within constitutional bounds, is by an appeal to the justice and patriotism of the representatives of the people. If this fail, the people, in their sovereign capacity, can correct the evil; but courts cannot assume their rights. The judiciary can only arrest the execution of a statute when it conflicts with the Constitution. It cannot run a race of opinions upon points of right, reason, and expediency with the lawmaking power. . . . If the courts are not at liberty to declare statutes void because of their apparent injustice or impolicy, neither can they do so because they appear to the minds of the judges to violate fundamental principles of republican government, unless it shall be found that these principles are placed beyond legislative encroachment by the Constitution." Cooley, Const. Lim. 6th ed. 1890, chap 7, §§ 4, 5, p. 201.

Scanning the list of expressly forbidden legislation, as found in § 7, art. 3, of the Constitution, there is no restriction upon what was done by the legislature in its action assailed in this proceeding; nor is there any other line in that instrument by which the action is impliedly prohibited, for nowhere is such legislation, or anything relating to it, mentioned. The resolution may be regarded by some as unwise and improper, and, if in any legislative district there were those so minded at the time it was adopted, and they happened to be in the majority, they had the opportunity to exhibit their disapproval if any senator or member who voted for it came up for re-election. It is doubtful, however, if any legislative career would have been cut short for support of the measure. From time out of mind, legislative bodies have, at the public expense, and with hearty popular approval, paid fitting tribute to the deserving dead, who, in peace or war, had served the state or nation; and public money so expended is well spent for the public, for it strengthens and elevates patriotism, and helps to make better men and women of the young who witness the homage so paid. But this digression need proceed no further.

We do not understand that, if the legislature had named a separate commission to represent the state at the exercises, and had provided for the payment of its expenses, the power to do so would be questioned; but, because the two bodies constituted themselves such representatives, the power is questioned, for the reason that, as the claim of the plaintiff is for food and drink furnished them, they will, if it is allowed, receive compensation in violation of § 8, art. 2, of the Constitution, which provides that "the members of the general assembly shall receive such salary or mileage for regular and special sessions as shall be fixed by law, and no other compensation whatever, whether for service upon committee or otherwise." Proper entertainment of the legislature was not merely incidental to its attendance at the dedication, but was necessary, and therefore formed part of the state's expenses in making suitable recognition of the ceremony. The concurrent resolution contemplated the payment of nothing but such expenses, and their payment to the man who furnished what was so necessary cannot be regarded as compensation or pay to the members of the legislature for their services as legislators, in any sense, whether such strained meaning for "compensation" be searched for in dictionary or encyclopedia of law, or the word is to be interpreted as popularly understood.

It is conceded by the learned and able counsel for appellee that the payment of the expenses may not be technically compensation; and yet, by the process of reasoning through which they would have us declare it to be compensation, within the constitutional prohibition, the very ink furnished to senators and members, and the pens dipped into it in answering the daily inquiries of constituents, would have to be regarded as constitutionally unlawful compensation to them, if paid for by the state.

The payment of expenses by the state in having itself fittingly represented, when it ought to be represented on great public occasions, involves nothing but the maintenance of its own dignity; and who shall represent it or how it shall be represented, is for the legislature alone. If, in their judgment, its members, representing every portion of the state, ought to do so, who can better represent the commonwealth; and, when they do so, what legislative service are they rendering for which they are receiving forbidden compensation because the state pays the expenses necessarily incident to its representation? The state is often represented by commissions created by the legislature, composed in part of members of the senate and house; but no one has ever thought of asking a court to say that those members of such a commission who happen to be senators or representatives receive prohibited compensation because their hotel bills are paid, with those of the other members of the commission, out of the appropriation for the payment of its legitimate expenses. That members of a legislature may be only part of such commission, instead of, as one body, being the state's sole representative, can make no difference in principle, if the position taken by the appellee is to be sustained. It has not been very elaborately pressed by the learned counsel representing the commonwealth, and we need not discuss it further.

In disposing of the questions raised on this appeal, we have nothing to do with the appellant's claim as presented in the court below, and it would therefore be improper for us to say anything about it. If, after it shall have been passed upon by a jury, the plaintiff or defendant should feel aggrieved by the finding, and the court below should not correct any wrong that may be done, the alleged grievance may be the subject of another appeal. All that we now decide is that, by the act authorizing the appellant to sue the commonwealth, he is to recover such sum, as, under the rules of pleading and evidence, may be justly due him. Under these rules the case must be tried, and such sum awarded to him as, under proper instructions from the court and under all the proofs, the jury may find to be just.

Judgment reversed and procedendo awarded.

Mestrezat and Potter, J.J., dissenting:

That there may be no doubt as to the claim for which this action was instituted, and the items of which the majority of this court says are chargeable against the commonwealth of Pennsylvania, we state the claim in the language of the plaintiff himself, as found in his statement as follows:

The edibles and drink were furnished as a lunch and dinner; both meals being served between the hours of 11:30 A. M. and 6 P. M. on the boat which carried the legislative excursionists on the Hudson river from Jersey City to a point opposite the Grant monument, a distance of 10 miles or less, and back. There were 425 persons, of which number 253 were members of the legislature.

Relative to the meals and liquors furnished, Senator Krause, chairman of the joint committee to make arrangements for the excursion, testifies as follows:

Q. Tell us what he [Russ] furnished.

A. He furnished the lunch. As soon as we arrived at Jersey City and got on the boat, there was a very nice lunch prepared for us.

Q. Go on and state what else Mr. Russ did.

A. After the ceremonies were over, he furnished an elegant dinner for us, with wines and liquors and everything included, with the cigars; had cigars going on the train, cigars on the boat, and everything in first-class order.

1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Q. Do you remember the kind of wine that was furnished?

A. White Seal; wasn't any too good for the members of the legislature, we thought.

Q. Do you remember what else was furnished— Can you tell what was furnished in the way of food for the dinner?

A. Oh, it was so fine that I forget exactly all the elegancies that we had. We had everything first-class.

Q. Can you tell us what other liquors were furnished.

A. Liquors of all description.

Q. Describe them; tell what they were?

A. We had plenty of whisky, and we had plenty of beer, and plenty of apollinaris. I don't know how many drank apollinaris, but apollinaris was furnished.

Q. Did you specify what liquors?

A. Yes, sir; as far as the wines were concerned, because that was a motion unanimously carried in the committee.

Q. You did not specify anything with respect to the whisky, beer, or cigars?

A. Oh, I told him we wanted all those things.

Q. I understand, generally speaking, Senator, that you ordered nothing special from Mr. Russ except the wine?

A. That is all.

Q. You left it to his discretion?

A. That is right.

John Riebel, a cigar manufacturer of Philadelphia, was a member of the military committee of the house, as well as of the joint committee to arrange for the excursion. He was called as a witness by the plaintiff, and testified that the joint committee, about three fourths of which were present, held a meeting in Philadelphia the night before the excursion, and that Mr. Dooner served them with a lunch, for which a charge is made in plaintiff's bill.

He further testified:

Q. Can you tell what he [Russ] gave to you as lunch?

A. Only a first-class lunch. I can't begin to enumerate what articles he had there, or what food he had there; a first-class lunch in every respect.

Q. State whether he provided anything else.

A. On our return back he had supplied one of the finest dinners a man wanted to sit down to, served on the boat; had all the elegancies of the season,—anything you can mention in the eatable line, almost.

As to the contract made with him by Senator Krause, and what was furnished in pursuance of it the plaintiff testifies:

Q. What did he say to you when he came there?

A. He told me he wanted a first-class lay-out,—everything up to date,—and I did so.

Q. What did he tell you he wanted as to the number of meals, if anything?

A. Well, a lunch the moment we got on the boat, and a dinner returning towards New York—Jersey City.

Q. What did he [Krause] say?

A. He said I should go ahead and make all arrangements, and especially the one thing that they [the committee] put out especially was "White Seal champagne."

Q. (Mr. Fox) Now can you state what you did furnish?

A. Oh, Lord! I furnished everything. They had a nice lunch and very fine dinner.

Q. Now, about how much a head did you calculate to charge?

A. I did not calculate at all. There was no price whatever. If it cost $5,000,000, there was no price at all that was to it.

Q. In other words, there was no limit put on the cost?

A. No, sir; not a cent.

Q. You don't know the kind of liquors returned?

A. No.

Q. Do you know the price charged for the returned liquors?

A. Just that much there. It was very lucky any was returned at all.

The only basis for this claim of $5,911.64 against the state for table supplies, wines, and liquors, cigars, and "incidental expenses" (about one half of the claim, it will be observed, being for wines and liquors) is a joint resolution passed by the senate and house of representatives over the veto of the governor, in which it is resolved that the "senate and house of representatives attend said dedication [of the General Grant monument in New York] in a body, and that all matters pertaining to such attendance be referred to the committee on military affairs of the senate and house." The learned trial judge held that this resolution conferred no authority on the committee to make a contract with the plaintiff for the items charged in his bill, and hence he had no valid claim against the state. For the reasons set forth at length in the opinion refusing to take off the nonsuit, we entirely concur with the conclusion of the court below, and would affirm the judgment.

It does not aid the position of the majority of the court to cite authorities to sustain the proposition, conceded to be the settled rule in all the states of the Federal Union, that the power of the general assembly of a state to legislate is absolute, subject only to the restrictions and limitations imposed by the Constitution of the state and that of the United States. That principle is not controverted, but it is most strenuously denied that the legislature, by the joint resolution in question, gave authority to the committee on military affairs to bind the state by a contract to pay the plaintiff the claim for which this action was brought. It is apparent that the language of the resolution conferred no direct authority on the committee to enter into a contract to bind the state for any expense incurred by the legislature in attending the dedicatory exercises. If any authority to contract for such purpose is given, it is by implication, and that alone; and, not being necessarily implied from the power conferred upon the committee by the joint resolution, the court should not sustain it on that ground. The character of the claim conclusively rebuts any implication that the legislature, in passing the resolution, intended to authorize the committee to make a contract for it. Such interpretation of the resolution opens the door to raids upon the state treasury by committees of the legislature, by which the taxpayers of the state can be made to pay claims which, as in this instance, neither the general assembly of the commonwealth, nor any other self-respecting legislative body, would for one instant think of approving. Had the plaintiff's claim, the character of which is shown by the items thereof and the testimony, been presented to the senate and house in open session at the time the joint resolution was passed, we are satisfied that those bodies would not have authorized the committee to contract for or pay it. It would have shocked the legislative conscience, as well as that of the people of the commonwealth. The testimony leaves no doubt as to the purpose in view when the contract was made, and what was expected to be, and what was, furnished in pursuance of it. About $1,700 worth of food and $3,000 worth of wines and liquors were consumed on the steamer by the 425 guests of the state in six and one half hours. This tells the brief but comprehensive story of the manner in which the money claimed here was applied (in the language of the preamble to the joint resolution) "in commemoration of the life and deeds of a hero whose memory we revere." Further comment upon the subject is unnecessary. To hold that authority was conferred upon the legislative committee by the concurrent resolution to contract for such a claim is vio-lative of all sound rules of interpretation, and is not supported by reason or authority.

We would, moreover, take a step further than the trial court, and hold that the legislature was prohibited by the Constitution from authorizing the committee to make the contract under which this claim is made against the state. Section 8 of article 2 of that instrument provides: "The members of the general assembly shall receive such salary or mileage for regular and special sessions as shall be fixed by law, and no other compensation whatever, whether for services upon committee or otherwise. No member of either house shall, during the term for which he may have been elected, receive any increase of salary, or mileage, under any law passed during such term." At the time of the excursion to New York the members of the legislature were receiving as compensation a salary and mileage fixed by law; and hence, under this constitutional provision, they could receive "no other compensation whatever." Equally explicit and mandatory is the provision that no member shall "receive any increase for salary or mileage under any law passed during the term" for which he is elected. Mr. Buckalew, a recognized authority upon the interpretation of the Constitution, says (Const. 40): "Compensation to members is properly for time spent, for service performed, and for personal expenses incurred for the public; but the forms of the compensation to be made to them for outlay, time, and labor are the two expressly fixed by the Constitution, namely, salary and mileage, which are declared to exclude all others." A member of the legislature is therefore confined to his salary and mileage as compensation for his services, in neither of which is the claim here presented included. The joint resolution shows that the members attended the dedication as a legislative body, and the claim for the edibles, liquors, cigars, etc., furnished by the plaintiff, is "other compensation" to the members of the legislature than salary and mileage, and therefore is clearly within the constitutional inhibition. If the sum claimed by the plaintiff had been paid by the state to the members to defray their expenses in attending the dedication, it would clearly have been additional to the compensation allowed them by law. The practical effect of a payment by the state direct to the plaintiff is the same as a payment of the amount to the members, and by them to the plaintiff. In either case, they receive an additional compensation from the state for their services as members of the legislative body to which they belong.

INDIANA SUPREME COURT.

OLLIE GIPE, Appt.,
v.
STATE OF INDIANA.

(.... Ind....)

1. Dying declarations—discretion as to admission.

The conclusion of a trial court that dying declarations were admissible in evidence will not be disturbed on appeal, unless it is manifest that the facts did not warrant the conclusion.

2. Same—extremity.

The deduction that declarations were made under a sense of impending death, without hope of recovery, is warranted where the person making them, after great shock and exposure, declared that he did not believe that he could get well, and made them several hours later, having been sinking all the time, and having reached a state of extreme weakness.

3. Indictment—homicide—variance.

An indictment for killing by striking, wounding, and throwing the victim into a well is not supported by evidence of frightening him into insanity by an attempted burglary, so that he jumped into the well.

4. Instructions — verdict — presumption of harm.

That accused was found guilty of involuntary manslaughter does not show that an instruction was harmless which permitted a conviction on an indictment for striking, wounding, and throwing the victim into a well, although the evidence shows the frightening of him into insanity so that he jumped into the well.

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Henry County convicting him of involuntary manslaughter. Reversed.

Gillett, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Appellant was charged by indictment with the murder of one Mollie Starbuck and her infant child. There was a verdict of involuntary manslaughter, on which judgment was pronounced.

The first question which this appeal presents is whether the trial court erred in admitting as dying declarations certain statements of said Mollie Starbuck. On a Saturday night, between the hours of nine and ten, said decedent was found, in a frenzied condition, with said infant, in a shallow well, situate about 1,000 feet to the rear of her house. She and the child were the only members of her family who were at home during the evening, and there was evidence tending to show that the house was broken into that night, at some hour previous to the time that they were found in the well. Said declarant died about 4 A. M. the next Monday. One of the attending physicians testified that the cause of death was acute pulmonary congestion, while another physician, in testifying, ascribed her death to shock, fright, and exhaustion. The evidence warranted the conclusion that her condition and death were due to her experience of the preceding Saturday night. She continued very ill from the time she was found. She was in a highly nervous condition, and was suffering from pulmonary hemorrhage. She was better Sunday morning, but during that time, and up to her death, her breathing was heavy and labored. Between 2 and 3 P. M. of said day she asked one of the attending physicians whether he thought she could get well. He told her he had hopes of her recovery, that she had improved nicely, and he saw no reason why she should not get well. She replied that she did not believe she would. Between that time and midnight Sunday, when the declarations were made, there was a gradual decline in her condition, and said physician testified that at the latter hour he had no hope of her recovery. The declarations in question, and the circumstances in which they were made, are thus stated by said witness: "At one of her waking spells I said to her: 'Mollie,' I says, 'do you know me?' And she made no answer, and she looked at me, and I said: 'If you cannot answer me, Mollie' (she was getting weak), 'raise your hand if you know me,' and she raised her hand or finger. And I said: 'There are some things we want to know, and very badly, and, if you can possibly let us know any way whatever, do so.' I said: 'Was it some bad man carried you off?' And she summoned a great effort and said, 'Yes.' The nurse asked her then: 'Did they come in at the window?' And she said, 'Yes,' and looked toward the window where the screen had been torn away. And then the nurse asked her if there were more than one, and declarations and the occurrence of death is an element to be considered, the rule is laid down in 1 Greenleaf on Evidence, § 158, as follows: "It is the impression of almost immediate dissolution, and not the rapid succession of death in point of fact, that renders the testimony admissible." To this effect, the decisions on the subject are substantially unanimous. The fact that the declarant lives a few hours after having made such statements under a sense of impending death does not make them inadmissible under any of the authoritative cases on the subject. State v. Reed, 53 Kan. 767, 42 Am. St. Rep. 322, 37 Pac. 174; People v. Weaver, 108 Mich. 649, 66 N. W. 567. Even the fact that the declarant lived for some days after has been repeatedly held to be insufficient to render the declarations inadmissible. State v. Jones, 38 La. Ann. 792; Jones v. State, 71 Ind. 66; Rex v. Bonner, 6 Car. & P. 386; Com. v. Haney, 127 Mass. 455.

In Baxter v. State, 15 Lea, 657, and State v. Yee Wee, 7 Idaho, 188, 61 Pac. 588, declarations were held admissible though made sixteen days before death. Other cases sustaining declarations made even longer before death are: Com. v. Cooper, 5 Allen, 495, 81 Am. Dec. 702; Lowry v. State, 12 Lea, 142; Reg. v. Bernadotti, 11 Cox, C. C. 316; Craven's Case, 1 Lewin. C. C. 77. These cases fairly represent the great body of the decisions on the subject.

she said, 'I don't know.' And then I asked her if she recognized anyone and she made some answer, but we could not understand her,—she was getting very weak."

With this statement of the facts, we proceed to the discussion of the admissibility of said declarations. In John's Case, as reported in 1 East, P. C. 357, 358, from the MSS. of Buller, J., it appears that it was the unanimous opinion of the judges that, "if a dying person either declare that he knows his danger, or it is reasonably to be inferred from the wound or state of illness that he was sensible of his danger, the declarations are good evidence." That the character of the wound may of itself warrant the inference that the declarant was under a sense of certain and speedy death is settled upon the authorities. King v. Woodcock, 1 Leach, C. L. 503; Anthony v. State, Meigs, 265, 33 Am. Dec. 143; McLean v. State, 16 Ala. 672; Hill v. Com. 2 Gratt. 594, 608; 3 Russell, Crimes, 9th American from 4th London ed. p. 250; and see Green v. State, 154 Ind. 655, 57 N. E. 637. The question as to the competency of the declaration was one which the trial court was called on to decide before admitting the testimony. 1 East, P. C. 358; John's Case, supra; Donnelly v. State, 26 N. J. L. 463; Starkey v. People, 17 Ill. 17; 1 Roscoe, Crim. Ev. *37; 1 Bishop, New Crim. Proc. § 1212; 1 Elliott, Ev. § 355. Its conclusion that the declarations were admissible is one which will not be disturbed on appeal, unless it is manifest that the facts did not warrant the conclusion. Swisher v. Com. 26 Gratt. 963, 21 Am. Rep. 330. Professor Wigmore, who discusses the propositions above laid down, says: "In ascertaining this consciousness of approaching death, recourse should naturally be had to the attending circumstances. It has been contended that only the statements of the declarant could be considered for this purpose, or, less broadly, that the nature of the injury alone could not be sufficient; i. e., in effect, that the declarant must have shown in some way, by conduct or language, that he knew he was going to die. This, however, is without good reason. We may avail ourselves of any means of inferring the existence of such knowledge; and, if in a given case the nature of the wound is such that the declarant must have realized his situation, our object is sufficiently attained. Such is the settled judicial attitude. . . . No rule can here be laid down. The circumstances of each case will show whether the requisite consciousness existed, and it is poor policy to disturb the ruling of the trial judge upon the meaning of these circumstances." 2 Ev. § 1442. In this case it appears that on 1 L.R.A.(N.S.)

Sunday afternoon said decedent expressed the belief that she would not get well. Assuming that to have been her opinion then, and considering that she gradually grew worse until the physician had abandoned hope of her recovery, and bearing in mind her extreme weakness, as evidenced by the physician's testimony as to the circumstances in which her statements were made, we can but regard the deduction of the trial court as authorized that the declarations were made under a sense of impending death, without hope of recovery. The remarks of Eyre, C. B., in Woodcock's Case, supra, seem quite apropos in this connection, but we need not pause to quote them.

The indictment charged that appellant "did then and there unlawfully, feloniously, purposely, and with premeditated malice kill and murder Mollie Starbuck and Beulah Starbuck, by then and there feloniously, purposely, and with premeditated malice unlawfully striking and wounding and forcibly throwing the said Mollie Starbuck and Beulah May Starbuck in a well, then and there being." It is contended by appellant that, in view of the charge in the indictment as to the means by which the deaths alleged were caused, the court erred in giving to the jury instruction No. 3. By that instruction, the court, after calling the attention of the jury to the provisions of statute relative to the killing of a human being in the perpetration of, or attempt to perpetrate, the crime of robbery or burglary, charged that, if the jury found that appellant, either by himself or with others confederating with him, broke and entered the Starbuck house under certain circumstances set forth in the instruction (amounting in law to a burglary); and that, by reason of said acts, the said Mollie Starbuck was put in great fear and agitation, to such an extent that she lost her reason and became insane; and that by reason thereof, while in such state of insanity, she left the house and jumped into the well, carrying with her the infant child; and that, by reason of her exposure therein and her extreme fright and agitation, brought upon her by the facts aforesaid, she afterward died,—appellant would be guilty of murder in the first degree. In this case, as will be observed, the charge was a killing by "striking and wounding and forcibly throwing" said Mollie Starbuck and Beulah May Starbuck into a well. This clearly means that the killing was accomplished by physical violence. In an English nisi prius case, involving a state of facts somewhat similar to that involved in the hypothesis embodied in said instruction, we find that the facts as to the manner in which death occurred were pleaded. Reg. v. Pitts, Car. & M. 284. It is settled in this jurisdiction that the charge that the killing was by ways and means unknown to the grand jury is sufficient; and then it is a question whether the proof supports the averment. Waggoner v. State, 155 Ind. 341, 80 Am. St. Rep. 237, 58 N. E. 190; Donahue v. State (at this term) 74 N. E. 996. We have here, however, a case in which it is alleged that the killing was accomplished by an act of physical violence. The averment is descriptive of the crime charged, and it was therefore necessary to prove the allegation substantially as laid. Taylor v. State, 130 Ind. 66, 29 N. E. 415. As respects the allegation and proof as to the manner of death, it is sufficient if the proof agree with the allegation in its substance and generic character; precise conformity is not required; but, to quote from one of the older writers, "if a person be indicted or appealed for one species of killing, as by poisoning, he cannot be convicted by evidence of a totally different species of death, as by shooting, starving, or strangling." 1 East, P. C. 341. See also Mackalley's Case, 9 Coke, 67; Rex v. Waters, 7 Car. & P. 250; State v. Dame, 11 N. H. 271, 35 Am. Dec. 495; State v. Smith, 32 Me. 369, 54 Am. Dec. 578; State v. Fox, 25 N. J. L. 566; State v. Hoyt, 13 Minn. 132, 142, Gil. 125, 127; State v. Jenkins, 14 Rich. L. 215, 94 Am. Dec. 132; 10 Enc. Pl. & Pr. 128.

It is contended that the above instruction is shown to have been harmless, because the jury did not find appellant guilty of murder, but of involuntary manslaughter. There is no merit in this contention. The instruction, in view of the evidence, was strongly calculated to be influential, because of its indication to the jury that there might be a conviction for the homicide, if such it was, although the conclusion of the jury as to the manner of killing might be that death was caused by a means totally different from that which was alleged. It must not be forgotten that a charge of murder in the first degree comprehends every grade of felonious homicide, and that a finding of involuntary manslaughter cannot be disturbed on appeal because the evidence shows that the defendant was guilty of murder. Hasenfuss v. State, 150 Ind. 246, 59 N. E. 463. It has been declared, and properly so, that if an "error is in itself radical and affects substantial rights in a material degree, or may probably so affect such rights, then the error cannot be regarded as uninfluential unless the record, with decisive clearness and strength, affirmatively shows that it did not influence the final decision in the case to the prejudice of the party who complains." Elliott, App. Proc. § 643, note.

After a careful consideration of the question which the giving of said instruction presents, viewed, not in the abstract, but in the concrete, as applied to the testimony in the record, it is our conclusion that it does not clearly appear that appellant was not prejudiced. A reversal must therefore follow.

Judgment reversed, and a new trial ordered. The clerk will issue the proper notice of the return of the prisoner.

INDIANA SUPREME COURT.

ÆTNA LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY,
Appt.,
v.
PHILANDER H. FITZGERALD.

(... Ind.)

1. Accident insurance—disease.

An insurance against loss of business time resulting from bodily injuries effected through external, violent, and accidental means covers loss of time by disease, if it was proximately caused by a bodily injury through the stipulated means.

2. Accident insurance—periostitis.

Periostitis of the metacarpal bones, caused by placing the hand, during sleep, between the head and the edge of the bed rail, and using it as a headrest until it becomes numb and bruised, is covered by an insurance against injuries effected through external, violent, and accidental means.

3. Insurance—notice of loss—waiver.

Failure to give notice of loss within a reasonable time, as required by the terms of the policy, is not waived by subsequent denial of all liability on the ground that the loss is not covered by the policy.

TRANSFER by the Appellate Court, for the opinion of the Supreme Court, of an appeal by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court for Marion County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to Case Note.—It is evident, from the nature of things, that instances of an injury resulting from some act of an insured person while asleep, as in ÆTNA L. INS. Co. v. FITZGERALD, which do not fall within the usually excepted risks of accidents from somnambulism, are extremely rare. An extensive search has failed to discover a similar case.

In most of the following cases of injury resulting to the insured from some act of his own while asleep, dazed, delirious, or otherwise not in full possession of his faculties, the injury was admittedly violent and accidental, and the question involved was recover the amount alleged to be due on an accident insurance policy. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. W. H. H. Miller, John B. Elam, James W. Fesler, and Samuel D. Miller, for appellant:

Such policies as this do not make the insurer liable for the consequence of disease when there has been no accident within the meaning of the contract.

whether or not the cause was among risks excepted by the terms of the policy.

Where a sleeping person is asphyxiated by gas, without any intention to commit suicide, it has been held that death is due to "external, violent, and accidental means." Paul v. Travelers' Ins. Co. 112 N. Y. 472, 3 L. R. A. 443, 8 Am. St. Rep. 758, 20 N. E. 347. Affirming 45 Hun, 313.

Such an accident is not an "inhaling of gas," within the clause of the policy exempting the insurer from liability where the injury is caused "by taking of poison, contact with poisonous substances, or inhaling of gas, or by any surgical operation, or medical treatment." Ibid.

Nor is it a taking of poison, or contact with a poisonous substance, within the meaning of such clause. United States Mut. Acci. Asso. v. Newman, 84 Va. 52, 3 S. E. 805.

Nor is it within an exception of "death or disablement arising from anything accidentally taken, administered, or inhaled." Menneiley v. Employers' Liability Assur. Corp. 148 N. Y. 596, 31 L. R. A. 686, 51 Am. St. Rep. 716, 43 N. E. 54.

Nor is it within a clause providing that the insurance does not cover "injuries, fatal or otherwise, resulting from poison, or anything accidentally or otherwise taken, administered, absorbed, or inhaled." Where one walking in his sleep falls from a window, and is killed, somnambulism may be regarded as the proximate cause; though it would not be so regarded if the deceased got up in his sleep, and subsequently fell out of the window while asleep. Traveler's Ins. Co. v. Harvey, 82 Va. 949, 5 S. E. 554.

A fall from a window while delirious is not covered by an accident insurance policy excepting from risks assumed injuries received "in consequence of being, or having been, under the influence of, or affected by, or resulting directly or indirectly, in whole or in part, from, . . . disease or bodily infirmity." Carr v. Pacific Mut. L. Ins. Co. 100 Mo. App. 602, 75 S. W. 180.

A complaint alleging that the plaintiff, while traveling, fell asleep from weariness and motion of the cars, and, when it was quite dark, "and while he was in a dozed and unconscious condition of mind, and not knowing or realizing what he was doing, involuntarily arose from his seat and walked unconsciously to the platform of said car, and, without fault on his part, fell therefrom to the ground," and was injured, sufficiently shows that the injuries were not "self-inflicted," nor the result of "design" or "voluntary exposure to unnecessary danger," which risks were excepted in the policy. Scheiderer v. Travelers' Ins. Co. 58 Wis. 13, 46 Am. Rep. 618, 16 N. W. 47.

Where the insured, who was recovering from an attack of pneumonia, was suddenly awakened and directed to dress quickly, and arose, appearing dazed and confused, and, while endeavoring to remove his nightshirt, in which he became entangled, ruptured a blood vessel and died, his death cannot be said to have resulted "from an accidental cause," within the meaning of a policy of insurance: since his movements cannot be regarded as involuntary. Smouse v. Iowa State Traveling Men's Asso. 118 Iowa, 436, 92 N. W. 53.

Death caused by the insured hanging himself, or cutting his throat, while insane, is covered by a policy of insurance against injury through "external, violent, and accidental means." Accident Ins. Daviess, 87 Ky. 541, 9 S. W. 812.

And it is not within the exception of "self-inflicted" injuries. Accident Ins. Co. v. Crandal, and Blackstone v. Standard Life & Acci. Ins. Co. supra.

Gillett, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Action by appellee against appellant on an accident policy. By the contract, the company insured appellee "against loss of business time . . . resulting from bodily injuries effected during the term of this insurance through external, violent, and accidental means." The motion for a new trial presents the question as to whether the disability involved was due to an injury within the terms of the policy. It appears from the testimony that on July 31, 1902, appellee, being much fatigued from an extended business trip, retired about 8 p. m. As he was somewhat restless, he placed his left hand between the pillow and his head, in order to raise it higher. The hand was placed on edge, with the thumb next to the head, and he fell asleep in that position. Some time during the night, while asleep, he moved so that his hand, with his head continuing upon it as before, rested upon the edge of the bed rail, and he continued to sleep in that posture until 4 a. m., when he awoke. He found that his hand was wholly numb, and it continued in that condition for the space of half an hour. There was a black mark upon it, where it had rested upon the rail, and this mark existed for some time thereafter. The hand pained him a great deal during the following day, and during the next night he was compelled to call a physician. The testimony of the latter, as well as that of the family physician, who took charge of the case upon returning from a vacation, shows that the pressure on the hand while upon the bed rail resulted in an inflammation of the periosteum of the metacarpal bones lying back of the third and fourth fingers,—a condition which made an operation necessary and caused a protracted illness. The expert evidence shows that cases of inflammation of the periosteum, or, as the difficulty is technically termed, periostitis, are traumatic,—at least for the most part,—and that it is the opinion of the medical profession that all of such cases are due to some injury, perhaps forgotten.

The principal contention of counsel for appellant on the question of the sufficiency of the evidence is that appellee's loss of time was due to disease, and not to an injury within the terms of the contract. We hold that the policy in suit was an insurance against loss of business time by disease, provided that the disability was proximately caused by a bodily injury occasioned through external, violent, and accidental means. It is the general understanding that this class of policies insures against diseases so occasioned; and, where medical science reveals the fact that back of the disease stands a proximate cause answering in all respects to the terms of the policy, it will not suffice to discharge the company that the consequence is accounted a disease. The insured cannot know what may befall him as the result of possible injuries, and it must be taken to have been the understanding of the parties that loss of time occasioned by disease was insured against, where the disability was proximately occasioned by an injury within the provisions of the contract. It will be time enough to deal with the difficult cases suggested by appellant's counsel, involving subtle, external causes of disease, when they arise. There was no evidence tending to show that the inflammation from which appellee suffered was due to any cause other than that of the long-continuing force exerted by the weight of the head. It was said in McCarthy v. Travelers' Ins. Co. 8 Biss. 362, Fed. Cas. No. 8,682, that "an efficient, adequate cause, being found, must be deemed the true cause, unless some other cause, not incidental to it, but independent of it, is shown to have intervened between it and the result." See also Continental Casualty Co. v. Lloyd (Ind.) 73 N. E. 824; National Ben. Assn. v. Grauman, 107 Ind. 288, 7 N. E. 233. It was declared by this court, in Supreme Council, O. of C. F. v. Garrigus, 104 Ind. 133, 54 Am. Rep. 298, 3 N. E. 818, that the word "accident," as used in an accident policy, "should be given its ordinary and usual signification, as being an event that takes place without one's foresight or expectation." We are not here called on to 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

consider a case where the result is one which follows from ordinary means voluntarily employed, and in which the only element of unexpectedness lies in the fact that the pursuit of the means unexpectedly brings about a physical condition which makes disease possible. Here the element of volition was wholly absent, and the fact that, during a period of unconsciousness, there was a distinct and long-continued force applied, which compressed the tissues and blood vessels surrounding the bones, and thereby caused the inflammation, marks the case as one of accident.

We are also of opinion that the injury was a violent one within the terms of the policy. The degree of violence is not always a controlling consideration. Southard v. Railway Pass. Assur. Co. 34 Conn. 574, Fed. Cas. No. 13,182. We are not to be understood as holding that violence will be wholly implied to bring an accident within the terms of the policy. Our holding is that, where an injury proximately proceeds from a cause which falls within the limitations of the policy, interpreted according to the ordinary understanding of the force of words, that interpretation is to be preferred, rather than one which would defeat the protection of the assured in a large class of cases. Trew v. Railway Pass. Assur. Co. 6 Hurlst. & N. 844; Paul v. Travelers' Ins. Co. 112 N. Y. 472, 3 L. R. A. 443, 8 Am. St. Rep. 758, 20 N. E. 347; Healey v. Mutual Acci. Assn. 133 Ill. 556, 9 L. R. A. 371, 23 Am. St. Rep. 637, 25 N. E. 52. There were present in this instance, in a substantial sense, all of the elements necessary to bring the proximate cause of the disability within the requirement that the loss of time must result from a bodily injury effected through external, violent, and accidental means. The only thing that was extraordinary about the case was the result; but this will not relieve, for the company was paid for its undertaking to provide a conventional measure of indemnity against the fortuitous, provided that it proximately proceeded from such an injury as the policy describes. We hold that the evidence was sufficient to support the verdict.

Appellant has assigned as an error that the court below erred in overruling a demurrer to the complaint. As the only objection which is urged to that pleading has, in effect, been determined by us to be untenable in passing on the question as to the sufficiency of the evidence, it is enough to announce that appellant is not entitled to a reversal based on the overruling of said demurrer.

The policy in suit provided that an immediate notice of the injury should be given the company. Appellee did not give notice until about fifty days after the injury. October 23, 1902, the company, by its general agents at Indianapolis, sent appellee a letter, stating that the company declined to approve the claim on the ground that it did not "come within the classification of an accident." The trial court, by instructions which are not complained of, submitted to the jury trying the cause the question, as one of fact, whether, in view of appellant's condition, notice was given within a reasonable time; but the court also gave to the jury the following instruction, for which a reversal is sought: "On the question of waiver and the provision of the policy requiring immediate notice, I instruct you that, if you should find, from the evidence, that the notice required by the policy was not given within a reasonable time after the happening of the alleged accident and injury, but was given some time later; and that, after it was given, a claim was made upon the defendant on said policy for the injury in controversy; and that, in response to said claim, the defendant denied all liability, and placed its denial of liability solely on the ground that the policy sued on did not cover such an injury as this was, without saying anything about the failure to have given this notice required in the policy,—such fact would amount to a waiver of the provisions requiring immediate notice." Under the provisions of the Indiana statutes concerning foreign insurance companies, the provision of the policy above referred to amounted to a requirement of notice within a reasonable time. Burns's Anno. Stat. 1901, § 4923; Insurance Co. of N. A. v. Brim, 111 Ind. 281, 12 N. E. 315; Pickel v. Phenix Ins. Co. 119 Ind. 291, 21 N. E. 898; Peele v. Provident Fund Soc. 147 Ind. 543, 44 N. E. 661, 46 N. E. 990. It will be observed, however, that, by the instruction above set forth, the court instructed upon the hypothesis that notice was not given within a reasonable time, and informed the jury that a subsequent denial of liability on another ground, without mentioning the failure to give notice, would amount to a waiver. If this was a correct exposition of the law as applied to the facts, there was no question, under the uncontradicted evidence, to submit to the jury.

We considered the doctrine of waiver of proofs of loss at some length in Germania F. Ins. Co. v. Pitcher, 160 Ind. 392, 64 N. E. 921, 66 N. E. 1003, and, in view of what was there said, this case can be disposed of without much further discussion. It is true that we held in the Pitcher Case that there might be a waiver after the time for making proofs of loss had expired, but it will be observed that there the disagreement was as to the amount of the loss. A protracted negotiation over such a question after the expiration of the time for the making of proofs might warrant a jury in concluding that the company was recognizing a subsisting obligation to the extent of what it conceived to be the amount of the loss; but we cannot sanction the view that, after the assured has sinned away all right of recovery under the policy, he may yet recover by proof that the company refused to pay on the ground that the policy did not cover the claim asserted in the notice. The refusal to pay on a wholly different ground, made within the time that the policy holder may take steps to make good his right under the contract, is treated in this state as a waiver per se; but we perceive no reason, after the right is gone, for permitting the policy holder to go to the jury on the question of waiver under proof of the solitary fact that the company had afterwards declined for another reason to recognize the validity of the policy. The authorities support us in this view of the law. Fidelity & C. Co. v. Sanders, 32 Ind. App. 448, 70 N. E. 167, and cases cited: Patrick v. Farmers' Ins. Co. 43 N. H. 621, 80 Am. Dec. 197; Beatty v. Lycoming County Mut. Ins. Co. 66 Pa. 9, 5 Am. Rep. 318; Hart v. Fraternal Alliance, 108 Wis. 490, 84 N. W. 451; State Ins. Co. v. School Dist. No. 19, 66 Kan. 77, 71 Pac. 272; Employer's Liability Assur. Corp. v. Rochelle, 13 Tex. Civ. App. 232, 35 S. W. 869; May, Ins. § 464. In fact, we have not been able to find a case which seems to support appellee upon this point, unless it be Brink v. Hanover F. Ins. Co. 80 N. Y. 108, which is cited in the brief filed on his behalf. The value of that case as a precedent in appellee's favor was destroyed by Devens v. Mechanics' & T. Ins. Co. 83 N. Y. 168, where the court, referring to the Brink Case, said: "The doctrine of waiver was, we think, properly applied in that case; but it should not be extended, so as to deprive a party of his defense, merely because he negligently or incautiously, when a claim is first presented, while denying his liability, omits to disclose the ground of his defense, or states another ground than that upon which he finally relies. There must, in addition, be evidence from which the jury would be justified in finding that, with full knowledge of the facts, there was an intention to abandon, or not to insist upon, the particular defense afterwards relied upon, or that it was purposely concealed under circumstances calculated to, and which actually did, mislead the other party to his injury."

Appellee's counsel contend that, under the evidence, it appears that notice was given within a reasonable time. We have read the evidence as set out in the bill of exceptions, and, while we are of opinion that the question of reasonable time was for the jury, in view of the evidence as to appellee's condition, yet the case which he seeks to make out was not so convincing upon that point as to render harmless the giving of the above instruction.

Judgment reversed, and a new trial ordered.

IOWA SUPREME COURT.

NELLIE WILLIAMS, Appt.,

v.

MINERAL CITY PARK ASSOCIATION.

(.... Iowa)

1. Amusement park—negligence.

Failure to provide around a band stand erected above the seats provided for patrons, by an amusement association, a barrier which will prevent articles falling therefrom, is not negligence as matter of law.

2. Amusement park—care—jury.

The jury must determine the question of the duty of the keeper of a place of amusement to keep clear of articles which will fall therefrom, the platform of a band stand which is erected above seats, provided for patrons.

3. Trial—instruction—omission.

A party cannot complain of the omission from an instruction, which is right so far as it goes, of elements which he deems material, unless he calls the court's attention thereto.

4. Amusement park—injury to patron by employee.

The owner of a place of amusement is not liable for injury to a patron by a bottle carelessly dropped by a musician from a band stand erected over seats provided for patrons.

5. Amusement park—duty to patrons.

Reasonable care is the measure of duty under which the owner of a place of amusement rests with respect to the safety of places provided for patrons.

(March 8, 1905.)

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the District Court for Webster County in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have resulted from defendant's negligence. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. M. E. Mack and J. B. McCrary, for appellant:

The care required by appellee toward appellant was commensurate with the duty assumed by the contract.

Larkin v. Chicago & G. W. R. Co. 118 Iowa, 652, 92 N. W. 891; Burgess v. Sims Drug Co. 114 Iowa, 277, 54 L. R. A. 364, Case Note.—The court in WILLIAMS v. MINERAL CITY PARK ASSO. cites the case of Hart v. Washington Park Club, 157 Ill. 9, 29 L. R. A. 492, 48 Am. St. Rep. 298, 41 N. E. 620, as one of the authorities which imposes upon the proprietor of a hall or place of amusement to which the public is invited the duty to exercise reasonable care and diligence in protecting the persons attending from injury. This obligation is analogous to that of a carrier toward passengers; and there is a contract which implies a warranty, not only of due care on the part of the proprietor and his servants, but also on the part of himself and any independent contractor who may be employed to construct the building or stands, or to give exhibits.

In Hart v. Washington Park Club, 157 Ill. 9, 29 L. R. A. 492, 48 Am. St. Rep. 298, 41 N. E. 620, the court denied the liability for injury to a patron of a public exhibition, caused by collision with a race horse which had become frightened and ran away. The same rule is applied in the case of Hallyburton v. Burke County Fair Asso. 119 N. C. 526, 38 L. R. A. 156, 26 S. E. 114, in which it was held that a fair association is not liable for injuries to one who is injured by the bolting of a horse from a track where a race is being held, if it has provided a suitable grand stand from which the race may be viewed, and has erected a railing between the race course and the place where spectators are seated.

In Thompson's Commentaries on the Law of Negligence, § 7665, it is stated that negligence of persons conducting a public exhibition of horse racing cannot be presumed from the mere fact that a spectator was injured by a runaway horse, while in the place reserved for spectators.

Hart v. Washington Park Club, 157 Ill. 9, 29 L. R. A. 492, 48 Am. St. Rep. 298, 41 N. E. 620, is cited in Thornton v. Maine State Agri. Soc. 97 Me. 114, 94 Am. St. Rep. 488, 53 Atl. 979, in which an agricultural society was held liable for the death of one who was killed at the entrance of a fair ground by a bullet which penetrated the target of a shooting gallery. This decision was based on the theory that, when one expressly, or by implication, invites others to come upon his premises for business or any other purpose, it is his duty to be reasonably sure that he is not inviting them into danger; and, to that end, he must exercise ordinary care and prudence to render the place reasonably safe for the visit. The same doctrine is laid down in Cooley on Torts, 2d ed. p. 718.

WILLIAMS v. MINERAL CITY PARK ASSO. also cites Schofield v. Wood, 170 Mass. 415, 49 N. E. 636, in which it was held that one who maintained a hall for public exhibitions was liable to one who was injured by the breaking of a defective guard rail while watching a game of polo.

As another authority, the court referred to the case of Richmond & M. R. Co. v.

E. 620; Francis v. Cockrell, L. R. 5 Q. B. 501; 2 Thomp. Neg. p. 906.

The appellee impliedly warranted to this appellant that the place would be safe if used by her for the purposes intended.

There was a legal presumption of negligence on appellee's part from the injury occurring to appellant in an amphitheater when she was without fault.

Appellee, for a consideration, assented to the care and control of appellant, and, for her safety, was required to exercise the highest degree of care reasonably to be expected from human diligence and foresight.

Moore, 94 Va. 493, 37 L. R. A. 258, 27 S. E. 70, in which it was held that a street car company, which owns and manages a park to which it seeks to attract visitors, will be liable for the death of a boy killed by the release of a pole used in connection with a balloon ascension, if no notice that the pole would fall was given, and no precaution taken. This case was cited with approval in Texas State Fair v. Brittain, 56 C. C. A. 499, 118 Fed. 716, which sustained a spectator's right to recover for injuries sustained by the falling of seats at a show on a state fair ground. It was also cited in Indianapolis Street R. Co. v. Dawson, 31 Ind. App. 607, 68 N. E. 909, which held a street railway company liable for an assault upon a colored person in a park maintained by it, where the company had knowledge of a conspiracy to assault colored people.

In Mastad v. Swedish Brethren, 83 Minn. 40, 53 L. R. A. 803, 85 Am. St. Rep. 446, 85 N. W. 913, which is also cited in the case of WILLIAMS v. MINERAL CITY PARK ASSO., it was held that a person controlling a public place of amusement, to which he invites the public on the payment of an admission fee, and at which place he sells intoxicating liquors; and who sells such liquors to one in attendance at such place, thereby rendering him drunk and disorderly, well knowing that when in that condition he is likely to commit assaults upon others,—is bound to exercise reasonable care to protect his other patrons 1 L.R.A. (N.S.) from such insults; and, for the failure to do so, is liable for damages. The same rule is applied in Rommel v. Schambacher, 120 Pa. 579, 6 Am. St. Rep. 732, 11 Atl. 779, and Curran v. Olson, 88 Minn. 308, 60 L. R. A. 733, 97 Am. St. Rep. 517, 92 N. W. 1124.

Some additional cases, which also sustain the rule as to the exercise of reasonable care toward spectators at a place of amusement, are as follows:

In Selinas v. Vermont State Agri. Soc. 60 Vt. 249, 6 Am. St. Rep. 114, 15 Atl. 117, the court sustained the liability of an agricultural society for an injury inflicted on a visitor, who was hit by a mallet used to pound a striking machine which was on exhibition on the grounds.

And in Dickson v. Waldron, 135 Ind. 507, 24 L. R. A. 483, 41 Am. St. Rep. 440, 34 N. E. 506, 35 N. E. 1, the proprietor of a theater was held liable for acts of a janitor and ticket taker in wrongfully assaulting a person because he was engaged in a dispute with the ticket seller, who had attacked and was beating him.

In Clark v. Northern P. R. Co. 29 Wash. 145, 59 L. R. A. 508, 69 Pac. 636, the court denied the liability of a railroad company to one who was injured while crossing the switch yard on his way to attend a circus which the railroad company permitted to be held on its vacant land adjoining the switch yard.

In Fox v. Buffalo Park, 21 App. Div. 321,

E. 114; Hart v. Washington Park Club, 157 Ill. 9, 29 L. R. A. 492, 48 Am. St. Rep. 298, 41 N. E. 620; Cooley, Torts, 2d ed. p. 718; Thompson v. Lowell, L. & H. Street R. Co. 93 Mich. 348, 17 L. R. A. 726, 53 N. W. 529.

If the injury to the appellant resulted from the negligence of an employee of an independent contractor during the performance of an act, not hazardous or dangerous in itself, the appellee is not liable for the negligence of such servant of the independent contractor.

Weaver, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendant association is a corporation under whose management and direction a place or field for public amusements

47 N. Y. Supp. 788, the court sustained the right of a visitor at a public exhibition to recover for injuries resulting from the defective construction of a grand stand; and the proprietor was not allowed to avoid liability on the ground that he had employed a competent architect to construct the seats. In Currier v. Boston Music Hall Asso. 135 Mass. 414, the court held the proprietor's ignorance of the defects to be immaterial.

In Phillips v. Wisconsin State Agri. Soc. 60 Wis. 401, 19 N. W. 377, it was held that it was not, as matter of law, negligence for an agricultural society to leave unprotected the coupling of a shaft used for transmitting power to machinery, at the fair.

Shearman & Redfield on Negligence, § 706, states that, if the visitor is present for the benefit of the host, the latter should be held liable for the want of any ordinary care in respect to the condition of the property; citing Selinas v. Vermont State Agri. Soc. 60 Vt. 249, 6 Am. St. Rep. 114, 15 Atl. 117, and Dunn v. Brown County Agri. Soc. 46 Ohio St. 93, 1 L. R. A. 754, 15 Am. St. Rep. 556, 18 N. E. 496.

The proprietor of a place of amusement is not relieved of the duty as to reasonable care because the particular exhibition which injured the spectator was not given by himself. This rule is illustrated in Sebeck v. Plattdeutsche Volkfest Verein, 64 N. J. L. 624, 50 L. R. A. 199, 81 Am. St. Rep. 512, 46 L. R. A. (N.S.)

has been established at or near the city of Ft. Dodge, Iowa. Within this inclosure is erected a so-called "grand stand" or amphitheater containing benches or seats for the accommodation of the people attending the races and other exhibitions there given. Over the central portion of this amphitheater, at a height of some 25 feet, is a platform intended to be occupied by a band of music. This platform was inclosed by a rail 2 by 4 inches in size extending around the four sides about 3½ feet from the floor. On three sides, near the rail, were benches for the accommodation of the musicians. Except as described, the platform was inclosed by no barrier or netting to guard against the fall of any substance or article from the platform upon the audience seated below. An entrance fee was collected from visitors for admission to the grounds, and an additional fee for a seat in the amphitheater. Upon the day in question certain races had been provided by the defendant, to which, by the usual methods of advertising, the public was invited. The plaintiff attended the entertainment, paid the usual charges for admission to the ground and to the amphitheater, and was given a seat below the band platform. While sitting in the place thus provided, and without any apparent fault on her part, a quart bottle was dropped or fell from the platform upon

Atl. 631, which is also cited in WILLIAMS v. MINERAL CITY PARK ASSO., and in which the court said that, having invited the public to his park, the proprietor is chargeable with the duty of using reasonable care to see that the premises are kept in a safe condition for the use of his guests; and if the exhibition, though given by an independent contractor, was of a character to jeopardize the safety of those who were present on the defendant's invitation, the duty is cast upon the latter of using due precautions to guard against injury.

And in Thompson v. Lowell, L. & H. Street R. Co. 170 Mass. 577, 40 L. R. A. 345, 64 Am. St. Rep. 323, 49 N. E. 913, which is also cited in WILLIAMS v. MINERAL CITY PARK ASSO., a street railway company was held liable for an injury received by a spectator at an exhibition of marksmanship at a pleasure resort, although the performance was conducted by an independent contractor, where a small fragment of a bullet flew from the impact when the bullet hit the butt, striking the spectator in the eye.

On the contrary, in Smith v. Benick, 87 Md. 610, 42 L. R. A. 277, 41 Atl. 56, it was held that a proprietor of a public resort, who employed an independent contractor to make a balloon ascension to attract visitors, was not liable for an injury to a visitor by a pole which fell by the negligence of the balloonist while he was endeavoring to raise the pole for use in inflating the balloon.

the head of the plaintiff, resulting, it is alleged, in her serious injury. The plaintiff's petition sets out these facts, and charges the defendant with negligence (1) in constructing the platform without netting or other barrier to guard against such injuries to persons seated below; and (2) in giving the plaintiff a seat under said platform, when, in the exercise of due care, it should have known and provided against the danger to which she was thus exposed.

There was evidence tending to show that on one or more occasions during the day and prior to the accident, bottles of some kind had been seen upon the platform floor, and it is the theory of the appellant that the bottle by which she was hurt rolled, or was in some manner crowded or pushed, from said floor. No one testifies to seeing anything of this kind, but it is sought to be inferred from the facts above stated. On the other hand, a witness for the defendant testifies to having seen a member of the band pick up from the floor two quart bottles, and, in attempting to hold them on the rail with one hand, while he reached for the third with the other hand, a bottle slipped from his grasp, and fell over the rail. The witness, who was also a member of the band, immediately went below and learned that plaintiff was injured, evidently by the bottle which he had seen fall.

1. Appellant's counsel have given considerable attention in argument to the measure of duty incumbent upon the defendant to provide and care for the safety of persons attending its exhibitions, to which the public is invited. For the purposes of this case, most of the propositions advanced on this subject may be admitted. We find, however, by reference to the record, that, generally speaking, the trial court adopted the theory now contended for as regards the law of negligence, and instructed the jury accordingly. For instance, it is the claim of counsel that due care on part of the defendant required the inclosing of the space between the rail above referred to and the floor of the platform with boards, or netting, or other barrier; and that such protection, if provided, would have prevented the accident to plaintiff. Now, the trial court distinctly instructed the jury that, if ordinary care for the protection of the people below required the use of any such device, the failure to provide it was negligence; and if, by reason of such negligence, plaintiff was injured, she was entitled to a verdict. This instruction seems fairly to cover the entire contention of the appellant on this branch of the case. It is not, and could not well be, contended that the failure to provide the barrier was negligence as a matter of law. If that be true, the court could do no more than to instruct as it did instruct, and leave the question to the determination of the jury. The jury found the fact against the plaintiff, and we cannot say that the verdict is without support in the testimony.

2. It is further claimed that defendant was negligent in failing to exercise such care and control over the use and occupancy of the band platform as was required for the safety of persons seated below. There is evidence tending to show that dealers in various kinds of liquids were permitted to carry their wares to persons on the band platform, and that bottles of such kind were seen on the floor; and it is said that due care on part of defendant required it to keep the platform clear of such obstructions. In this, as in respect to the other charge of negligence, we have to say that the question thus presented was for the jury, and was fairly submitted to their consideration. It is argued that an instruction which told the jury that defendant would be liable for the negligence of its officers is erroneous, because it did not refer to the acts of its agents, servants, and employees, as well as officers. The instruction being unquestionably right as far as it went, and plaintiff having failed to call the court's attention to the further proposition now suggested, there is no ground to allege error. Wimer v. Allbaugh, 78 Iowa, 79, 16 Am. St. Rep. 422, 42 N. W. 587; Churchill v. Gronewig, 81 Iowa, 449, 46 N. W. 1063; State v. Viers, 82 Iowa, 397, 48 N. W. 732; Wheelan v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 85 Iowa, 167, 52 N. W. 119.

Complaint is made of an instruction to the effect that, if members of the band were drinking beer on the platform, and one of them carelessly dropped the bottle which injured the plaintiff, the defendant would not be liable. Counsel profess to believe this charge was "grossly unfair, very misleading, and injects something into the case not alleged or proved by either party, and takes away from the jury one of the vital points in the case." We do not so view it. There was evidence from which it might be found that beer was being consumed by some persons in and about the stand, and that the instrument of plaintiff's injury was a beer bottle. Certainly, the mere fact that a member of the band, whether he was the employee of the defendant or of the band director, carelessly dropped a bottle upon the plaintiff, would not sustain a charge of negligence against the defendant. The negligence of the servant for which the master must respond to a third person is negligence in some act, or failure to act, within the scope of his employment. This is elementary, and requires no citation of authorities. So far as the record shows, the employment of the band was for no other purpose than to provide music for the occasion, and ordinarily, at least, the relation of beer to harmony of sound is not so obvious or necessary that the passing of bottles between members can be said to be within the scope of a musician's employment. We are unable to see how the instruction complained of could in any manner have prejudiced the plaintiff's case. Exceptions are taken to other instructions, but we cannot notice them in detail without unduly prolonging this opinion. We have examined them all, and find no error.

We are not sure that we quite understand the proposition of counsel that "the obligation of care and control by defendant over its seats in the amphitheater and the right of its patrons to use them in safety extends upward indefinitely for the purpose of their use and enjoyment, and the duty of the defendant is commensurate with this obligation." If thereby it is meant to say that, in the erection of buildings, stands, platforms, and other elevated structures upon grounds to which the public is invited, the defendant must use reasonable care not to create or permit conditions which endanger the persons of visitors who are in their proper place, or in seats provided for their use, there can be no dispute of the correctness of the statement. We think, however, that this principle, so far as applicable, was fairly embodied in the instructions. As bearing upon the degree of care which the law imposes upon the owners and managers of exhibitions and places of amusement, the decided cases are not numerous, but, so far as the courts have expressed themselves, it appears to be settled that reasonable care in such cases is the measure of duty. We are therefore not prepared to accept counsel's contention that, when "plaintiff placed her person in defendant's hands for a consideration" it created "a sort of bailment, just as if she had placed herself in a railroad's hands as passenger." It would require too much ingenuity to adjust the law of bailments to the implied contract which arises between the proprietor of a place of public amusement and the visitor who attends such place upon the proprietor's invitation; and the undertaking of such a proprietor is not so similar to that of a common carrier of passengers as to call for an application of the same rule of responsibility. As holding to the rule of reasonable care in such case, see Hart v. Washington Park Assn. 157 Ill. 9, 29 L. R. A. 492, 48 Am. St. Rep. 298, 41 N. E. 620; Fox v. Buffalo 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Park, 21 App. Div. 321, 47 N. Y. Supp. 788; Lane v. Minnesota State Agri. Soc. 62 Minn. 175, 29 L. R. A. 708, 64 N. W. 382; Herrick v. Wixom, 121 Mich. 384, 80 N. W. 117, 81 N. W. 333; Schofield v. Wood, 170 Mass. 415, 49 N. E. 636; Dunn v. Brown County Agri. Soc. 46 Ohio St. 93, 1 L. R. A. 754, 15 Am. St. Rep. 556, 18 N. E. 496; Mastad v. Swedish Brethren, 83 Minn. 40, 53 L. R. A. 803, 85 Am. St. Rep. 446, 85 N. W. 913; Richmond & M. R. Co. v. Moore, 94 Va. 493, 37 L. R. A. 258, 27 S. E. 70; Thompson v. Lowell, L. & H. Street R. Co. 170 Mass. 577, 40 L. R. A. 345, 64 Am. St. Rep. 323, 49 N. E. 913; Sebeck v. Plattdeutsche Volkfest Verein, 64 N. J. L. 624, 50 L. R. A. 199, 81 Am. St. Rep. 512, 46 Atl. 631.

Counsel for appellee have dwelt at some length upon the theory that the band, or its director, is to be considered as an independent contractor, which had undertaken to furnish the music for defendant's exhibition, and that the latter cannot be held liable for any negligence of the former. The rule contended for is certainly not correct in all cases (see Richmond & M. R. Co. v. Moore, 94 Va. 493, 37 L. R. A. 258, 27 S. E. 70; Sebeck v. Plattdeutsche Volkfest Verein, 64 N. J. L. 624, 50 L. R. A. 199, 81 Am. St. Rep. 512, 46 Atl. 631), though it would doubtless be applicable under some circumstances. The case before us may readily be disposed of without passing upon that branch of the discussion, and we shall not attempt to do so.

The record before us presents a controversy which is almost wholly one of fact for the consideration of the jury. It has been so considered, and it is not within our province to disturb the verdict. Appellant has filed a motion to tax the appellee with the cost of an amended abstract filed by it in this court. An examination of the amendment indicates that it supplies some material omissions from the principal abstract, and the motion is overruled.

The judgment appealed from is affirmed.

Petition for rehearing overruled.

IOWA SUPREME COURT.

FRANK ROSS, Appt.,

v.

BOARD OF SUPERVISORS OF WRIGHT COUNTY et al.

(.... Iowa)

1. Drainage—validating act.

Authority to continue existing proceed-

Case Note.—The court, in ROSS v. WRIGHT COUNTY, in sustaining the power of the legislature to cure a constitutional defect in a previous statute which it had the power to ings for the construction of a drainage ditch, which have been declared void because of the invalidity of the statute under which they were instituted, for failure to provide for notice to owners of land not touched by the improvement, but which may be assessed for the cost, may be conferred by a statute correcting this defect by providing such notice, in the absence of any constitutional prohibition of retroactive laws.

2. Drainage—implied validation.

Pending proceedings for a drainage improvement need not be expressly legalized in order to permit their completion, by a statute enacted to provide for notice to persons liable to assessment, for want of which the statute has been held unconstitutional; it is sufficient if the statute assumes that the pending proceedings will continue, and would be idle and meaningless unless that intention was imputed to the legislature.

3. Drainage—notice—want of.

Proceedings for the construction of a drainage ditch cannot be avoided by prop-enact, and to give such amendment retroactive and curative effect upon proceedings instituted under such defective statute, settles a question which the courts have not frequently been called upon to decide. In arriving at this decision, the court discusses with approval the case of Ferry v. Campbell, 110 Iowa, 290, 50 L. R. A. 92, 81 N. W. 604. This case has been cited frequently in other cases, but on different questions. The court also cites and discusses with approval the case of Spencer v. Merchant, 125 U. S. 345, 31 L. ed. 763, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 921, which has also been cited frequently, but on different questions.

On this proposition, the court, in Sidway v. Lawson, 58 Ark. 117, 23 S. W. 648, said that the legislature can enact statutes on subjects which properly come within the cognizance of the courts, which may form the basis of judicial consideration and judgment in suits pending at the time of their enactment. Curative statutes, when valid and applicable, should govern the courts in such cases. They govern on the ground that the bringing of the suit vests in the party no right to a particular decision, and his case must be determined on the law as it stands, not when the suit is brought, but when the judgment is rendered.

In Donley v. Pittsburgh, 147 Pa. 348, 30 Am. St. Rep. 738, 23 Atl. 394, the court held that an assessment made under a void statute may be collected under a subsequent statute which cured the defect in the statute under which the assessment was imposed. The same rule is applied in Schenley v. Com. 36 Pa. 29, 78 Am. Dec. 359.

In Blake v. People, 100 Ill. 504, it was held that an assessment for a levee constructed under a statute which was unconstitutional in part may be collected under the authority of a subsequent statute which cured the defect in the prior statute.

But in State, Boice, Prosecutor, v. Plainfield, 38 N. J. L. 95, it was held that proceedings for widening streets under an ordinance which was void for failure to provide for notice could not be remedied by subsequent legislation, so as to render the proceedings valid. The distinction between this case and Ross v. Wright County lies in the fact that, in the former, the invalidity of the statute was fundamental, but in the latter case the statute was only partly defective.

In Kimball v. Rosendale, 42 Wis. 407, 24 Am. Rep. 421, the court said that the true limit of the curative power of the legislature (N.S.)

lature, as gathered from all of the authorities, and sanctioned by principle, is, or ought to be, that it can reach things voidable only, not void,—defects of execution only, not of authority or jurisdiction; and is confined to defective proceedings under previous legislative authority.

In Strosser v. Ft. Wayne, 100 Ind. 443, curative acts were held to be valid, and to heal defects in judicial proceedings; but proceedings had in a tribunal having no jurisdiction of the matter are invalid, and cannot be made valid by a curative statute.

In Tilton v. Swift, 40 Iowa. 78, the court held that remedies are always within the control of the legislature, and retrospective laws which affect pending suits are not unconstitutional.

And in Herriott v. Potter, 115 Iowa, 648, 89 N. W. 91, it was held that the succession to property during the existence of an invalid inheritance tax law cannot be subjected to such a tax under a subsequent amendment curing the defect in the prior statute.

In Lynch v. Murphy, 119 Mo. 163, 24 S. W. 774, the court held that a portion of a statute which is unconstitutional may be amended so as to cure the defect.

The case of Grubbs v. State, 24 Ind. 205, is sometimes cited as denying the power of the legislature to amend a void statute. But in this case the curative act itself was void on the ground that it did not remove the defect.

Wade on Constitutional Limitations, § 206, states that the legislature cannot do, by legislative statute, what it could not have previously authorized.

Sutherland on Statutory Construction, § 482, and Cooley on Constitutional Limitations, both lay down the doctrine that curative statutes are not invalid, although necessarily retroactive. The general rule is that the legislature can validate any act which it might have originally authorized; and such curative statutes should receive a liberal construction, as their purpose is to correct evils.

The rule as to curative statute is stated in Black's Constitutional Law, § 289, which says that retrospective curative statutes may be employed to remedy such defects in proceeding as amount to mere irregularities, but not to supply want of jurisdiction. Thus, where the equity of the party is complete, and all that is wanted is legal form, it is within the recognized power of the legislature to correct such defect.

erty owners properly served with notice because one owner of property affected was not served,—at least, where he subsequently appears, and presents and establishes his claim for damages by reason of the improvement.

4. Guardian and ward—notice—presumption.

In a collateral proceeding, requisite notice to a ward to bind him by acts of his guardian in his behalf will be presumed to have been given.

5. Assessment district—inclusion of land—hearing.

A landowner is not entitled to a hearing upon the question whether or not his land shall be included in a district which shall bear the cost of a drainage improvement, if provision is made for a hearing as to the assessment.

6. Taxing district—boundaries.

The legislative power to fix the boundaries of taxing districts for the construction of local improvements may be delegated to minor municipalities.

7. Constitutional law—taxing district—review.

Refusing a judicial review of the action of the board of supervisors of a county in including land in a drainage district does not offend the constitutional provision forbidding deprivation of property without due process of law.

8. Assessment—time for.

The completion of a public improvement is not a prerequisite to the levying of an assessment to pay for it.

(July 13, 1905.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the District Court for Wright County dismissing a proceeding to annul proceedings which had been instituted for the construction of a drainage improvement. Affirmed.

Statement by Weaver, J.:

Weaver, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Proceedings to procure the location and construction of the ditch were instituted by petition as required by the terms of the statute about March 13, 1903, and a bond to secure payment of costs and expenses was filed and approved. Thereupon the auditor placed a copy of the petition in the hands of an engineer, who made survey of the proposed improvement, and, on August 16, 1903, reported the same to the board of supervisors, with his estimate of the costs of construction. Beginning on March 9, 1903, notice of the proposed improvement was served personally or by publication upon the owners of the lands through which the ditch was to be constructed, that the matter would come up for hearing at the regular June, 1903, session of the board. Certain claims for damages having been filed, appraisers were appointed, who filed their report August 17, 1903. At the September, 1903, session of the board further consideration of the matter was postponed until November 12, 1903, at which time the ditch was established, and its construction ordered. Before any further proceedings were had in the matter, this court having held chapter 2 of title 10 of the Code to be unconstitutional, in that it undertook to provide for an assessment of the cost of the ditch in part against the lands in the vicinity not intersected by, or bordering upon such ditch, without any provision for notice to the owners of such lands (Beebe v. Magoun, 122 Iowa, 94, 101 Am. St. Rep. 259, 97 N. W. 986, and Smith v. Peterson, 123 Iowa, 672, 99 N. W. 552), the general assembly of the state undertook to remedy the defect thus disclosed. See chap. 67, p. 59, Laws 30th Gen. Assem., approved April 29, 1904. Thereafter the board of supervisors proceeded with the matter of the construction of the ditch in question, following with substantial accuracy the provisions of the statute as amended by the act of the thirtieth general assembly, and were about to assess the expense of such improvement upon the lands found to be benefited thereby, when this action was begun in certiorari 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

to have the proceedings adjudged void. The foregoing history of the case is sufficiently full and specific to enable us to understand the force and effect of the points made by counsel in argument.

1. The first and principal contention on part of the appellant is that, the proceedings to secure the construction of the ditch having been begun under a void statute, the subsequent amendment, even though it had the effect to make the statute constitutional and valid, could have no effect to give life to the pending proceedings, or authorize an assessment of the cost of a ditch thus constructed upon lands supposed to be benefited thereby. Assuming, for present purposes, that it is competent for the legislature to provide for the construction of a ditch for drainage purposes and the apportionment of the cost thereof as a special assessment upon lands thereby benefited, we think this objection cannot be sustained. Referring to the statute as it stood prior to the amendment, we find that it provided for notice of the institution of the proceedings to the owners of lands intersected by, or abutting upon, the ditch. Code, § 1940. As to such owners, it has never been held that, when thus brought into the proceedings, they were entitled to any further notice of the succeeding steps of the statute in letting the contract, classifying the lands, or making the apportionment of the costs and expenses. On the contrary, it seems to be well settled that a statute which provides for notice to the property owner at some stage of the proceedings before the assessment is made is not open to the constitutional objection simply because it does not provide for a new or additional notice of each successive step leading up to the assessment. Yeomans v. Riddle, 84 Iowa, 147, 50 N. W. 886; Oliver v. Monona County, 117 Iowa, 43, 90 N. W. 510; Weyerhaeuser v. Minnesota, 176 U. S. 550, 44 L. ed. 583, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 485; Winona & St. P. Land Co. v. Minnesota, 159 U. S. 526, 40 L. ed. 247, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 83; Voigt v. Detroit, 184 U. S. 115, 46 L. ed. 459, 22 Sup. Ct. Rep. 337.

The fatal objection to the proceedings under the statute in its original form was found in the further provision contained in Code, § 1946, whereby, when the construction had been determined upon, and an apportionment and assessment of the expense were to be made, it was provided that the same should be charged, not only upon the property through which the ditch was laid, and whose owners had been notified as aforesaid, but upon all other lands "in the vicinity" which a commission appointed for that purpose might find to be benefited by the improvement. No provision was made for notice to the owners of the additional lands sought thus to be taxed, and this we held to constitute a taking of property without due process of law as to such persons, and therefore unconstitutional. Smith v. Peterson, 123 Iowa, 672, 99 N. W. 552; Beebe v. Magoun, 122 Iowa, 94, 101 Am. St. Rep. 259, 97 N. W. 986. In the Smith Case we further held the statute to be of no force or effect against the owners of lands intersected by the ditch, and upon whom the notice required by § 1940 had been served, not because it was unconstitutional as to such persons, but because the void provision as to "lands in the vicinity" appeared to be such an essential feature of the scheme or plan sought to be effected that its elimination would lead to results not contemplated by the legislature, and defeat the purposes which the statute was intended to promote. In other words, the methods of the statute were constitutional and valid up to the point where the report of the commissioners appointed to classify the benefited lands and apportion thereto the cost of the improvement was returned to the board; but the failure to provide for notice to all the owners of property thus affected before confirmation of such report rendered ineffectual and void any attempt to make and enforce a valid assessment. The proceedings relating to the ditch in controversy reached just this state of advancement before the amendment to the statute found in chap. 67, p. 59, Laws 30th Gen. Assem., was enacted. That amendment leaves the statute unchanged as to all the proceedings in such cases from the filing of the petition up to the return or report made by the commissioners appointed to classify the benefited lands and apportion the expenses, and provides that when this stage is reached a time shall be fixed for hearing objections thereto, and notice thereof shall be served personally upon residents and upon nonresidents by publication; and upon such hearing the board is empowered to determine all objections to the assessment, and may increase, diminish, annul, or affirm the apportionments made in the commissioners' report, or any part thereof, as shall be found just and equitable. By § 2 of the amending act this amendment was made to apply to all proceedings then pending before the boards of supervisors for the location and construction of drains. Was it competent for the legislature to thus provide and authorize the defendants, with other boards of supervisors having similar proceedings in hand, to cause proper notice to be served, and proceed thereon to make an apportionment and assessment of the cost of the ditch? In our judgment, this question must be answered in the affirmative. The Constitu-tution of Iowa does not forbid the enactment of retroactive laws, and this court has frequently upheld the validity of such statutes. Iowa Railroad Land Co. v. Soper, 39 Iowa, 112; Tilton v. Swift, 40 Iowa, 78; McMillen v. County Judge & Treasurer, 6 Iowa, 391; Huff v. Cook, 44 Iowa, 639; Sully v. Kuehl, 30 Iowa, 275; State v. Squires, 26 Iowa, 340; Galusha v. Wendt, 114 Iowa, 597, 87 N. W. 512; Iowa Sav. & L. Asso. v. Heidt, 107 Iowa, 297, 43 L. R. A. 689, 70 Am. St. Rep. 197, 77 N. W. 1050; Windsor v. Des Moines, 110 Iowa, 175, 80 Am. St. Rep. 280, 81 N. W. 476; Ferry v. Campbell, 110 Iowa, 290, 50 L. R. A. 92, 81 N. W. 604; Fair v. Buss, 117 Iowa, 164, 90 N. W. 527; Clinton v. Walliker, 98 Iowa, 655, 68 N. W. 431. That the legislature may, by amendment, cure a constitutional defect in a statute the main purpose of which is within the scope of legislative power, and give such amendment retroactive effect upon cases already begun and pending, is expressly held by this court in Ferry v. Campbell, 110 Iowa, 290, 50 L. R. A. 92, 81 N. W. 604. In that case proceedings had been begun to enforce a collateral inheritance tax under a law which was found to be unconstitutional for want of provision for notice to parties in interest. Pending the proceedings, the statute was amended providing for notice in such cases, and making the amendment applicable to cases there undetermined. Acts 27th Gen. Assem. chap. 37, § 2, p. 27. This we found to be a valid exercise of legislative power, so far, at least, as it related to personal estate; and, unless we propose to overrule that precedent,—which we are not prepared to do,—we see no way to avoid giving like effect to the amendment to the drainage act with which we are now dealing. The same principle is recognized and upheld in several of the Iowa cases above cited.

Appellant's claim that the amendatory act was not intended to have a curative effect upon proceedings then pending is clearly opposed to the language employed therein. It was the apparently studied purpose of the legislature to remove the objection based upon the failure of the law to provide for notice to the landowners, and to give legal force and effect to proceedings then pending and liable to be rendered nugatory if such defect was not cured. While the term "legalized" is not expressly applied to the preliminary proceedings already had, § 2 of the amendment hereinbefore quoted would be idle and meaningless if they are not to be considered valid and sufficient to sustain the assessment made pursuant to the notice for which the act provides. The principle which we here apply was affirmed by us in Butts v. Monona County, 100 Iowa, 74, 69 N. W. 284. Perhaps no case can be found more nearly in point than Spencer v. Merchant, 125 U. S. 345, 31 L. ed. 763, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 921. In that case, under a statute authorizing the same, a city ordered a work of local improvement to be made. The work was done and the tax levied. After the levy had been made, and part of the property owners had paid the tax, other owners resisted payment, and were successful in having the proceedings adjudged void because the statute failed to provide for any notice, and was therefore unconstitutional. Stuart v. Palmer, 74 N. Y. 183, 30 Am. Rep. 289. After this adjudication was had, the legislature passed another act authorizing a relevy of such tax after due notice to the owners who had refused to pay their original apportionment. The validity of this legislation was affirmed by the court of appeals of New York (Spencer v. Merchant, 100 N. Y. 585, 3 N. E. 682), and reaffirmed by the Supreme Court of the United States, as above cited. The arguments there used against the validity of the later statute followed the same lines pursued by counsel in the case at bar, and were held unsound by the highest court of New York and of the nation. We do not stop to quote from these opinions, but those who care to pursue the inquiry will find the question there fully and exhaustively considered.

2. At the time the ditch was located the records of the county indicated that one of the tracts of land intersected by it belonged to one Pratt, a resident of New York, and notice directed to him was served by publication. It appears, however, that Pratt had died before the proceedings were instituted, and a minor daughter, Helen Portia Pratt, was the real owner, and the person upon whom the notice should have been served. Later, however, and after the order of November 12, 1903, establishing the ditch, Helen Portia Pratt, by her guardian, appeared to the proceedings, and filed a claim for damages, which was allowed, and the allowance was thereafter approved by the district court having jurisdiction of the guardianship matter. Counsel for appellant now contends that, even if chap. 67, p. 59, Laws 30th Gen. Assem., be given retroactive effect, and made applicable to proceedings then pending, the failure to include Helen Portia Pratt in the notice pursuant to Code, § 1940, is a fatal defect, and the board of supervisors and county auditor never obtained jurisdiction to inaugurate the proceedings; and that each and all of the orders subsequently made are therefore wholly void. This position is sought to be supported by certain decisions of this court in cases relating to the establishment or vacation of public highways. See Chicago, R. 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

I. & P. R. Co. v. Ellithorpe, 78 Iowa, 415, 43 N. W. 277, and Moffit v. Brainard, 92 Iowa, 122, 26 L. R. A. 821, 60 N. W. 226. But neither of these cases, nor any other which we have been able to discover, go to the extent claimed by counsel. The most that can be said as to this class of cases is that they apply the fundamental rule that no person's property can be taken from him by a court or other tribunal without notice and an opportunity to be heard. Generally speaking, at least, no one is entitled to raise the objection except the party entitled to the notice. Assume, for instance, that proceedings for the establishment of a highway several miles in length, and passing through the lands of many different persons, are instituted, carried through to the final order, and the road is established and opened to travel. If, a year or two later, it be discovered that a nonresident owner of a single small tract was by some mistake omitted from the notice for which the statute provides, we may concede that, as to such land and such owner, the order of establishment is voidable or void; but it would be a somewhat startling proposition to hold that failure to notify this one owner is a jurisdictional defect of which every other owner along the line may take advantage, even though he himself was duly and properly notified. Moreover, when the omitted owner voluntarily appeared to the proceedings, and procured an allowance of her claim for damages, we think it will be held to operate as a waiver by her of all objections based upon the failure to serve her with notice. The only interest the other landowners could have in her being properly made a party was that her property might be compelled to bear its share of the expense in case the ditch should be constructed, and, when she voluntarily appeared, the only possible ground of objection on their part was removed. Poundstone v. Baldwin, 145 Ind. 139, 44 N. E. 191; Hauser v. Burbank, 117 Mich. 642, 76 N. W. 111; Wolpert v. Newcomb, 106 Mich. 357, 64 N. W. 326; Hurst v. Martinsburg, 80 Minn. 40, 82 N. W. 1099. Under the law of the cases here cited,—and we find none to the contrary,—it is entirely immaterial whether a guardian is authorized to waive service of notice upon his ward; and we need not here pass upon that question. Had the notice been served, the ward could have done no more than to appear by guardian for the protection of her rights. He did so appear, and brought the matter before the court for its consideration and approval. If notice to the ward was necessary to bind her by such approval, we must assume in this collateral proceeding that the court did not act without it.

3. The statute as amended provides, as we have seen, for the appointment of commissioners who examine the lands with the view of determining what tracts are benefited by the improvement, classify them as "low," "wet," "swamp," and "dry," and fix their estimate of the proportion of the expense which each tract ought to bear. In effect, their report is a designation of the boundaries or territorial extent of the drainage district and a statement of the finding of the commissioners as to a just and equitable distribution of the cost upon the several tracts of land embraced in the territory so marked out by them. Appellant takes the position that the landowner is entitled to notice and hearing as to the extent of this district, and whether his land shall be included therein, and that the failure to provide for such notice and hearing renders the statute unconstitutional. In our opinion, the objection is unsound. The division of a state or lesser municipal territory into districts for the purposes of taxation or public improvement is a legislative matter, and the citizen affected thereby cannot complain because the power is exercised without notice to him. If, for instance, the legislature saw fit to divide the entire state into drainage districts, and make the lands in each district chargeable with the expense of such drains therein as the public welfare might demand, we apprehend that such legislation would be open to no serious constitutional objection on the ground that it deprives the landowner of property rights without due process of law. That such legislative power for local purposes may be delegated by the legislature to minor municipalities is a matter of universal recognition and constant practice. For example, a city may, by its council, divide its territory into sewer districts (Code, § 794), or the entire city may be declared a single district, and the cost of a sewer be made a general charge upon all the property within its boundaries; and the fact that an individual property owner has been given no hearing in the matter of the districting, or that he may believe that his property is in no manner benefited by the improvement, affords him no ground for impeaching the validity of the statute or ordinance by which the districting was accomplished. Other familiar instances of the exercise of this delegated legislative power will probably occur to the intelligent reader. State v. King, 37 Iowa, 462; State ex rel. Witter v. Forkner, 94 Iowa, 1, 28 L. R. A. 206, 62 N. W. 772; Topeka v. Huntoon, 46 Kan. 634, 26 Pac. 488; Robinson v. Schenck, 102 Ind. 307, 1 N. E. 698; Kinney v. Zimpleman, 36 Tex. 554; Stanfill v. County Revenue Court, 80 Ala. 287; Dunn v. County Revenues Court, 85 Ala. 144, 4 So. 661; Hyde Park 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

v. Spencer, 118 Ill. 446, 8 N. E. 846; Turner v. Detroit, 104 Mich. 326, 62 N. W. 405; State ex rel. Baltzell v. Stewart, 74 Wis. 620, 6 L. R. A. 394, 43 N. W. 947. The very objection here raised by appellant was involved in Voigt v. Detroit, 123 Mich. 547, 82 N. W. 253. And see same case on appeal, 184 U. S. 115, 46 L. ed. 459, 22 Sup. Ct. Rep. 337. In the cited case the Michigan court says: "No provision is made for a notice to property owners of a time and place of hearing upon either the question of fixing a taxing district or the question of the amount of the award to be spread thereon. This, it is claimed, leads to taking property without due process of law, and therefore the law is unconstitutional. The statute provides for a hearing in relation to the proportion each piece of property shall bear to the whole cost of the improvement, and the proper notice of this hearing was given. It is claimed by counsel that complainant was entitled to notice of the hearing relating to the establishment of the assessment district and of the amount of the total assessment; and, because the statute does not provide for these notices, it is unconstitutional as taking property without due process of law. . . . We do not think this position of the counsel can be maintained. The right of the legislature to establish special assessment districts in which all the taxes necessary to be raised to pay for a local improvement may be assessed was for a long time questioned, but that right has been so often sustained by the courts that it is no longer open to question." After citing authorities, the court proceeds: "Under these authorities, it is very clear that the legislature itself might have established the special assessment district. Had it seen fit to do so, would it be claimed that its right to do so could be questioned as unconstitutional because no notice was given to the property holders affected thereby that it intended to establish such a district? If the answer to this question should be in the negative, why, when the legislature has delegated to the common council of the city the right to establish the special district, should it be said that the law delegating this power is unconstitutional because notice is not required? The establishment of the special assessment district, in the one instance, by the legislature, and, in the other instance, by the common council, is the exercise of a legislative power, with which the courts will not ordinarily interfere." Upon appeal to the United States Supreme Court, the judgment of the state court was affirmed. The provision of law by which, when the proceeding has reached the stage where it is proposed to levy the tax, a notice must be served on the property owner, was held sufficient to avoid the constitutional objection, notwithstanding no notice is required in respect to the creation of the district or the determination of the aggregate amount of the tax to be collected. See also to the same effect, State ex rel. Baltzell v. Stewart, 74 Wis. 620, 6 L. R. A. 394, 43 N. W. 947; People ex rel. Griffin v. Brooklyn, 4 N. Y. 419, 55 Am. Dec. 266; Rogers v. St. Paul, 22 Minn. 494; Kelly v. Minneapolis, 57 Minn. 294, 26 L. R. A. 92, 47 Am. St. Rep. 605, 59 N. W. 304; Erickson v. Cass County, 11 N. D. 494, 92 N. W. 841; Paulsen v. Portland, 149 U. S. 30, 37 L. ed. 637, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 750. In the last-cited case the rule is thus stated: "It is settled that, if provision is made 'for notice to and hearing of each proprietor at some stage of the proceedings upon the question, What proportion of the tax shall be assessed upon his land? there is no taking of his property without due process of law.'" In the case before us there is, under the statute, as amended, ample provision for notice to every landowner, and opportunity given for the hearing of all objections he may have to assert against the validity and justice of the proposed charge upon his property. This, under the law, is all he can rightfully ask. It is to be noted, moreover, that, upon the hearing which the statute gives the owner pursuant to the notice provided for by the amendment, the board of supervisors may not only increase or diminish the apportionment of the tax reported by the commissioners, but may "annul" it entirely. The action of the board at this meeting is the final and authoritative settlement of the boundaries of the taxing district; and this is done only after full opportunity is given to each landowner to show cause, if he has any, why his land should not be included therein. It is not denied that the notice required by the amended statute was given, and plaintiff given full opportunity to be heard; and the objection here made is not well taken.

4. The constitutionality of the act is further questioned because, by Code, § 1947, which allows an appeal from the assessment made by the board of supervisors, it is also provided that, upon the trial of the appeal, it shall not be competent for the owner to show that his land received no benefits from the improvement. Counsel seem to contend that the landowner is thus cut off from all opportunity to be heard on the question whether his land receives any benefit by reason of the ditch for the construction of which he is taxed. But, as noted in the concluding part of the preceding paragraph, this is a mistake. The landowner is given opportunity to appear before the board of supervisors, which body is authorized to try all such objections, and, if it be found that any tract of land reported by the commissioners is not in fact benefited by the improvement, it may be relieved of the burden. The effect of the restrictive clause in Code, § 1947, is to deny the right of appeal from this finding of the board of supervisors, and confine all further review to the question whether the appellant's land has been assessed in equal and fair proportion, as compared with other property embraced in the district. That a statute making the finding of the board conclusive upon the question whether a given tract of land is properly included in the benefited district, and denying appeal therefrom, is not an unconstitutional deprivation of property without due process of law, is a rule which has been affirmed by the great weight, if not the universal current, of authority. The right to an appeal from one court or tribunal to another has never been held to be in itself a denial of due process of law. The power to make a final determination beyond which there is no appeal must rest somewhere, and, in the absence of express or clearly implied constitutional limitations upon its authority in this respect, the legislature may confide that power in any given proceeding to any court, board, or commission. Of course, the tribunal thus designated must observe due process of law,—that is, the party must be given notice and have opportunity to be heard; but, if the finding be against him, no constitutional guaranty is violated by denying him the right of appeal. Such is clearly the doctrine of our cases. Chambliss v. Johnson, 77 Iowa, 612, 42 N. W. 427; Lambert v. Mills County, 58 Iowa, 666, 12 N. W. 715; Allerton v. Monona County, 111 Iowa, 560, 82 N. W. 922; Oliver v. Monona County, 117 Iowa, 43, 90 N. W. 610. To the same point, see State ex rel. Hughes v. District Court (Minn.) 103 N. W. 744; *State ex rel. Baltzell v. The holding of the trial court comes well within the law of the cited cases, and must be upheld.

5. Some other questions are suggested as to the details to be observed in carrying the statute into effect. Among other things, it is said that the tax should not be levied until the work is actually done. We see no reasonable ground for the objection. Certainly the statute seems to authorize the proceeding taken by the supervisors. When the contract is let, the amount for which the drainage district is to be made liable is approximately ascertained, and it is the dictate of business prudence that the board proceed at once to provide for the means with which to discharge the debt. Our attention is called to no precedent or rule of law in support of the proposition stated by counsel, and we think the objection must be overruled. If, as claimed, the board failed to fix the proportion of the tax to be paid yearly, we have to say that the petition in this action was filed September 21, 1904, interrupting the proceedings by the board before any assessment was made; and that the order distributing payment over a series of years pertains to a matter of detail which we may presume the supervisors will properly attend to when the termination of this litigation leaves them free to go on with the matter.

Other points made in argument are merely incidental to, or are governed by, those 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

which we have already considered at length, and do not require further discussion.

The conclusion reached by the District Court is correct, and the decree appealed from is affirmed.

MINNESOTA SUPREME COURT.

Anna MOHR

v.

Cornelius WILLIAMS.

(.... Minn.)

1. Excessive verdict—correction—discretion.

Whether a new trial upon the ground of excessive or inadequate damages should be granted or refused, or whether the verdict should be reduced where excessive, rests in the sound judicial discretion of the trial court, in reviewing which this court will be guided by the general rule applicable to other discretionary orders.

2. Assault—liability for.

It is unnecessary to show, in a civil action for an assault and battery, that defendant intended by the act complained of to injure the plaintiff. It is sufficient if it appear that the act was unlawful.

3. Surgeon—unauthorized operation.

A surgical operation by a physician upon the body of his patient is wrongful and unlawful where performed without the express or implied consent of the patient. In the absence of such consent, the physician has no authority, implied or otherwise, to perform the same. Consent may be implied from circumstances.

4. Same.

Headnotes by BROWN, J.

Subject Note.—Liability of physician performing surgical operation without consent.

In England the question as to the liability of a physician for performing a surgical operation upon a patient without consent seems to have arisen but once, and in the unreported case of Beatty v. Cullingworth, tried before the Queen's bench division, and criticised editorially in 44 Cent. L. J. 153. The defendant performed the operation of double ovariectomy on plaintiff, against her express direction. Just before the operation the plaintiff told the defendant that if both ovaries were found to be diseased he must remove neither. He replied, "You must leave that to me." The plaintiff denied hearing the remark. The surgeon and his assistant affirmed that the plaintiff's life and health would have been imperiled by failure to complete the double operation. The jury brought in a verdict for the defendant, the court practically di-examined the organ and advised an operation, to which plaintiff consented. After being placed under the influence of anesthetics, and when plaintiff was unconscious therefrom, defendant examined her left ear, and found it in a more serious condition than her right, and in greater need of an operation. He called the attention of plaintiff's family physician to the conditions he had discovered, who attended the operation at plaintiff's request, and finally concluded that the operation should be performed upon the left instead of the right ear, to which the family physician made no objection. Plaintiff had not previously experienced any difficulty with her left ear, and was not informed, prior to the time she was placed under the influence of anesthetics, that any difficulty existed with reference to it, and she did not consent to an operation thereon. Subsequently, on the claim that the operation seriously impaired her sense of hearing and was wrongful and unlawful, she brought this action to recover damages for an assault and battery. It is held:

(a) That defendant had no authority to perform the operation without plaintiff's consent, express or implied.

(b) That her consent was not expressly given, and whether it should be implied from the circumstances of the case was a question for the jury to determine.

(c) That, if the operation was not authorized by the express or implied consent of plaintiff, it was wrongful and unlawful and constituted, in law, an assault and battery.

(June 23, 1905.)

CROSS-APPEALS from orders of the District Court for Ramsey County, made recting that there was tacit consent to the operation.

In the United States, also, the authorities on the question are few. In Cuthrell v. Protestant Hospital (Ohio C. P.), another unreported case, cited in note to § 375, Kinhead on Torts, the plaintiff brought an action against the defendants to recover damages for performing an operation upon her without her consent. The plaintiff claimed the operation performed was different from that she had submitted to. The court, in charging the jury, said: "The consent of a person submitting to an operation is presumed, unless he was the victim of a false and fraudulent misrepresentation. . . . The consent of the plaintiff was necessary before the defendants . . . could lawfully perform the operation which it is claimed was performed. If such consent was not given, then said defendants had no right to operate in the manner complained of."

The court then said that, if the plaintiff had placed herself in the care of the defendants, authorizing them to do whatever seemed reasonable, from their knowledge and skill as physicians and surgeons, to save her life, or to protect her from continued and serious illness, such acts might be taken as her consent to the performance of such an operation as was, in the exercise of ordinary surgical care and skill, considered reasonably necessary; and that in such a case express consent was unnecessary. Continuing, the court said: "If you find that the consent of plaintiff was given for an operation, which was termed the scraping of the womb, and that she did not consent to the operation which is claimed to have been performed, then the consent to the scraping of the womb cannot be interposed to excuse said defendants, or to justify them in the performing of some other different operation."

Except in cases where the consent of the patient is express, or implied by circumstances and occasions other than a mere general retainer for medical examination and treatment; and except, also, where there is a superior authority which can legally and rightfully dispose of the person of the patient, and which gives consent,—a surgeon has no right to violate the person of the patient by a serious major operation, or one removing an important part of the body. Pratt v. Davis (Ill. App.) 37 Chicago Legal News, 213.

In the last-named case the patient was deceived as to the nature of the operation she was to undergo, and the surgeon was held liable to respond to her in damages. As illustrations of superior authority which would justify an operation without the consent of the patient, the court mentioned the control which the state takes of persons under sentence for crime, the power which is vested in parents over minor children of tender age, and the authority given to legally constituted guardians of the person of those who are insane or imbecile, and, in a more restricted sense, in the marriage relation which makes the husband the head of the family; although this last-named authority was not instanced as supreme in the matter of surgical operations.

But a physician cannot be held liable for performing an operation upon a patient without consent upon a pleading based on the theory of negligence.

The question of plaintiff's lack of consent to an operation in an action against a surgeon for malpractice is immaterial, under a declaration averring that he was negligent in operating upon the left, instead of the right, leg, as directed to do by plaintiff: the liability depending solely upon the question of negligence. Sullivan v. McGraw, 118 Mich. 39, 76 N. W. 149.

In an action against a surgeon for damages for negligent and unskillful surgical treatment causing the death of an infant, where the complaint, in addition to various allegations of negligence, charged that the defendants performed an unnecessary operation upon the infant without the consent of the infant or his custodian, the court was held properly to have required plaintiff during the trial of an action brought to recover damages for alleged assault and battery in performing an unauthorized operation upon plaintiff; defendant appealing from an order denying a motion for judgment notwithstanding a verdict in plaintiff's favor; and plaintiff appealing from an order granting a new trial. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. H. A. Loughran and S. C. Olmstead, for plaintiff:

Consent was necessary.

Pratt v. Davis (Ill. App.) 37 Chicago Legal News, 213; 1 Kinkead, Torts, § 375.

The fact that the consent had been given for a purpose different from the act performed does not justify any departure from the acts as consented to.

Reg. v. Bennett, 4 Fost. & F. 1105; Reg.

to elect whether he would try the case as an action for performing an operation without authority, or as a suit for negligence. Wood v. Wyeth, 106 App. Div. 21, 94 N. Y. Supp. 360.

A physician is not liable for failure to procure the consent of a husband to a surgical operation upon his wife, if the wife herself consents to it. State use of Janney v. Housekeeper, 70 Md. 162, 2 L. R. A. 587, 14 Am. St. Rep. 340, 16 Atl. 382.

And, assuming that a husband, as the head of the family, is naturally the protector and guardian of an insane wife's interests, where his consent alone is asserted in justification of an operation upon his wife, the defendant must show two things affirmatively: First, that the patient was not mentally in a condition to be in control of her own body; and, secondly, that her husband consented to the operation. Pratt v. Davis (Ill. App.) 37 Chicago Legal News, 213.

A surgeon cannot be convicted of the crime of manslaughter for performing an operation upon the deceased without his consent if the operation did not result in his death. State v. Gile, 8 Wash. 12, 35 Pac. 417.

In the last-named action it was a strongly contested question whether the operation was not performed without the consent or knowledge of the deceased. The court held, in effect, that the question of consent was immaterial as a defense, unless it appeared that the operation had been performed with due care and skill.

Implied consent.

If a woman voluntarily submits to a dangerous surgical operation, her consent will be presumed, unless she is the victim of a false and fraudulent representation; and the burden of proof upon the question of consent is not, therefore, upon the surgeon performing the operation. State use of Janney v. Housekeeper, 70 Md. 162, 2 L. R. A. 587, 14 Am. St. Rep. 340, 16 Atl. 382; 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Messrs. Keith, Evans, Thompson & Fairchild and John D. O'Brien, for defendant:

Appellant had respondent's implied consent to the operation which he performed.

Cuthreil v. Protestant Hospital (Ohio C. P.) Kinkead, Torts, § 375, note.

An allegation, in a complaint against defendants for wrongfully performing a surgical operation upon an infant, that the defendants were employed by the infant to attend him and cure him, imports that such parental consent had been given as was necessary to authorize the doctors to do whatever might be proper in the treatment of the patient for the purpose of bringing about the desired cure; and, under such an allegation, it is unnecessary for the surgeon to prove any further consent to a necessary and proper operation. Wood v. Wyeth, 106 App. Div. 21, 94 N. Y. Supp. 360.

In Pratt v. Davis (Ill. App.) 37 Chicago Legal News, 213, the court said that, if a soldier goes into battle with a knowledge beforehand that surgeons attached to the army are to have charge of the wounded, it might perhaps be considered as an implied license for such operations as the surgeon afterwards, in good faith, performed. "Perhaps, too," added the court, "the various cases which might be supposed of sudden and critical emergency, in which the surgeon would be held justified in a major or capital operation without express consent of the patient, might be referred to the same principle of an implied license."

In Boydston v. Giltner, 3 Or. 118, a case in which a surgeon was employed to set a broken or fractured arm, the court charged the jury that, if the defendant refracted the arm without informing the plaintiff what he was doing or about to do, it did not follow from that fact alone that he was guilty of bad surgery. Continuing, the court said: "But, unless you do find from the evidence, both that the defendant refracted the arm, and that it was the result of a lack of ordinary skill or care, there is no blame to be attributed in consequence of that act, and your inquiries should be directed to other branches of the case." The jury returned a verdict for the defendant.

Brown, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Defendant is a physician and surgeon of standing and character, making disorders of the ear a specialty, and having an extensive practice in the city of St. Paul. He was consulted by plaintiff, who complained to him of trouble with her right ear, and, at her request, made an examination of that organ for the purpose of ascertaining its condition. He also at the same time examined her left ear, but, owing to foreign substances therein, was unable to make a full and complete diagnosis at that time. The examination of her right ear disclosed a large perforation in the lower portion of the drum membrane, and a large polyp in the middle ear, which indicated that some of the small bones of the middle ear (ossicles) were probably diseased. He informed plaintiff of the result of his examination and advised an operation for the purpose of removing the polyp and diseased ossicles. After consultation with her family physician, and one or two further consultations with defendant, plaintiff decided to submit to the proposed operation. She was not informed that her left ear was in any way diseased, and understood that the necessity for an operation applied to her right ear only. She repaired to the hospital, and was placed under the influence of anæsthetics; and after being made unconscious, defendant made a thorough examination of her left ear, and found it in a more serious condition than her right one. A small perforation was discovered high up in the drum membrane, hooded, and with granulated edges, and the bone of the inner wall of the middle ear was diseased and dead. He called this discovery to the attention of Dr. Davis,—plaintiff's family physician, who attended the operation at her request,—who also examined the ear, and confirmed defendant in his diagnosis. Defendant also further examined the right ear, and found its condition less serious than expected, and finally concluded that the left, instead of the right, should be operated upon; devoting to the right ear other treatment. He then performed the operation of ossiculectomy on plaintiff's left ear; removing a portion of the drum membrane, and scraping away the diseased portion of the inner wall of the ear. The operation was in every way successfully and skilfully performed. It is claimed by plaintiff that the operation greatly impaired her hearing, seriously injured her person, and, not having been consented to by her, was wrongful and unlawful, constituting an assault and battery; and she brought this action to recover damages therefor. The trial in the court below resulted in a verdict for plaintiff for $14,322.50. Defendant thereafter moved the court for judgment, notwithstanding the verdict, on the ground that, on the evidence presented, plaintiff was not entitled to recover, or, if that relief was denied, for a new trial on the ground, among others, that the verdict was excessive; appearing to have been given under the influence of passion and prejudice. The trial court denied the motion for judgment, but granted a new trial on the ground, as stated in the order, that the damages were excessive. Defendant appealed from the order denying the motion for judgment, and plaintiff appealed from the order granting a new trial.

1. It is contended on plaintiff's appeal that the trial court erred in granting a new trial of the action; that the order should be reversed and the verdict reinstated. The new trial was granted, as already stated, on the ground that the verdict was excessive, appearing to have been given under the influence of passion and prejudice; and the point made is that the evidence, as contained in the record, does not sustain this conclusion, within the limits of the rule applicable to motions for a new trial based upon that ground. Considerable confusion has existed with reference to the proper rule guiding this court in reviewing orders of this kind ever since the decision in Nelson v. West Duluth, 55 Minn. 497, 57 N. W. 149, wherein it was said that the rule of Hicks v. Stone, 13 Minn. 434, Gil. 398, did not apply. Several decisions involving the same question have since been filed, and the bar is apparently in some doubt as to the true rule upon the subject. We are not disposed to review the former decisions of the court, but, for future guidance, take this occasion to say (that there may be no further controversy in the matter) that in actions to recover unliquidated damages, such as actions for personal injuries, libel, and slander, and similar actions, where the plaintiff's damages cannot be computed by mathematical calculation, and are not susceptible to proof by opinion evidence, and are within the discretion of the jury, the motion for new trial on the ground of excessive or inadequate damages should be made under the fourth subdivision of § 5398, Gen. Stat. 1894; and in such cases the court will not interfere with the verdict unless the damages awarded appear clearly to be excessive or inadequate, as the case may be, and to have been given under the influence of passion or prejudice. On the other hand, in all actions, whether sounding in tort or contract, where the amount of damages depends upon opinion evidence, as the value of property converted or destroyed, the nature and extent of injuries to person or property, the motion for new trial should be made under the 5th subdivision of the statute referred to; and in cases of doubt, or where both elements of damages are involved, under both subdivisions. State v. Shevlin-Carpenter Co. 66 Minn. 217, 68 N. W. 973. But in any case, whether a new trial upon the ground of excessive or inadequate damages should be granted or refused, or whether the verdict should be reduced, rests in the sound judicial discretion of the trial court (Craig v. Cook, 28 Minn. 232, 9 N. W. 712; Pratt v. Pioneer Press Co. 32 Minn. 217, 18 N. W. 836, 20 N. W. 87), in reviewing which this court will be guided by the general rule applicable to other discretionary orders. We applied this rule at the present term in Epstein v. Chicago G. W. R. Co. 104 N. W. 12. Where the damages are susceptible of ascertainment by calculation, and the jury return either an inadequate or excessive amount, it is the duty of the court to grant unconditionally a new trial for the inadequacy of the verdict, or, if excessive, a new trial unless plaintiff will consent to a reduction of the amount given by the jury. Applying the rule stated to the case at bar, we are clear the trial court did not abuse its discretion in granting defendant's motion for a new trial, and its order on plaintiff's appeal is affirmed. We cannot adopt the suggestion of counsel for plaintiff that this court now reduce the verdict to a proper amount, for there is no verdict upon which such an order could act. It was set aside by the trial court.

2. We come, then, to a consideration of the questions presented by defendant's appeal from the order denying his motion for judgment notwithstanding the verdict. It is contended that final judgment should be ordered in his favor for the following reasons: (a) That it appears from the evidence received on the trial that plaintiff consented to the operation on her left ear. (b) If the court shall find that no such consent was given, that, under the circumstances disclosed by the record, no consent was necessary. (c) That, under the facts disclosed, an action for assault and battery will not lie; it appearing conclusively, as counsel urge, that there is a total lack of evidence showing, or tending to show, malice or an evil intent on the part of defendant, or that the operation was negligently performed.

We shall consider first the question whether, under the circumstances shown in the record, the consent of plaintiff to the operation was necessary. If, under the particular facts of this case, such consent was unnecessary, no recovery can be had, for the evidence fairly shows that the operation complained of was skilfully performed and of a generally beneficial nature. But if the consent of plaintiff was necessary, then the further questions presented become important. This particular question is new in this state. At least, no case has been called to our attention wherein it has been discussed or decided, and very few cases are cited from other courts. We have given it very deliberate consideration, and are unable to concur with counsel for defendant in their contention that the consent of plaintiff was unnecessary. The evidence tends to show that, upon the first examination of plaintiff, defendant pronounced the left ear in good condition, and that, at the time plaintiff repaired to the hospital to submit to the operation on her right ear, she was under the impression that no difficulty existed as to the left. In fact, she testified that she had not previously experienced any trouble with that organ. It cannot be doubted that ordinarily the patient must be consulted, and his consent given, before a physician may operate upon him. It was said in the case of Pratt v. Davis, 37 Chicago Legal News, 213, referred to and commented on in 60 Cent. L. J. 452: "Under a free government, at least, the free citizen's first and greatest right, which underlies all others,—the right to the inviolability of his person; in other words, the right to himself,—is the subject of universal acquiescence, and this right necessarily forbids a surgeon or physician, however skilful or eminent, who has been asked to examine, diagnose, advise, and prescribe (which are at least necessary first steps in treatment and care), to violate, without permission, the bodily integrity of his patient by a major or capital operation, placing him under an anæsthetic for that purpose, and operating upon him without his consent or knowledge." 1 Kinkead, Torts, § 375, states the general rule on this subject as follows: "The patient must be the final arbiter as to whether he shall take his chances with the operation, or take his chances of living without it. Such is the natural right of the individual, which the law recognizes as a legal one. Consent, therefore, of an individual, must be either expressly or impliedly given before a surgeon may have the right to operate." There is logic in the principle thus stated, for, in all other trades, professions, or occupations, contracts are entered into by the mutual agreement of the interested parties, and are required to be performed in accordance with their letter and spirit. No reason occurs to us why the same rule should not apply between physician and patient. If the physician advises his patient to submit to a particular operation, and the patient weighs the dangers and risks incident to its performance, and finally consents, he thereby, in effect, enters into a contract authorizing his physician to operate to the extent of the consent given, but no further. It is not, however, contended by defendant that under ordinary circumstances consent is unnecessary, but that, under the particular circumstances of this case, consent was implied; that it was an emergency case, such as to authorize the operation without express consent or permission. The medical profession has made signal progress in solving the problems of health and disease, and they may justly point with pride to the advancements made in supplementing nature and correcting deformities, and relieving pain and suffering. The physician impliedly contracts that he possesses, and will exercise in the treatment of patients, skill and learning, and that he will exercise reasonable care, and exert his best judgment to bring about favorable results. The methods of treatment are committed almost exclusively to his judgment, but we are aware of no rule or principle of law which would extend to him free license respecting surgical operations. Reasonable latitude must, however, be allowed the physician in a particular case; and we would not lay down any rule which would unreasonably interfere with the exercise of his discretion, or prevent him from taking such measures as his judgment dictated for the welfare of the patient in a case of emergency. If a person should be injured to the extent of rendering him unconscious, and his injuries were of such a nature as to require prompt surgical attention, a physician called to attend him would be justified in applying such medical or surgical treatment as might reasonably be necessary for the preservation of his life or limb, and consent on the part of the injured person would be implied. And again, if, in the course of an operation to which the patient consented, the physician should discover conditions not anticipated before the operation was commenced, and which, if not removed, would endanger the life or health of the patient, he would, though no express consent was obtained or given, be justified in extending the operation to remove and overcome them. But such is not the case at bar. The diseased condition of plaintiff's left ear was not discovered in the course of an operation on the right, which was authorized, but upon an independent examination of that organ, made after the authorized operation was found unnecessary. Nor is the evidence such as to justify the court in holding, as a matter of law, that it was such an affection as would result immediately in the serious injury of plaintiff, or such an emergency as to justify proceeding without her consent. She had experienced no particular difficulty with that ear, and the questions as to when its diseased condition would become alarming or fatal, and whether there was an immediate necessity for an operation, were, under the evidence, questions of fact for the jury.

3. The contention of defendant that the operation was consented to by plaintiff is not sustained by the evidence. At least, the evidence was such as to take the question to the jury. This contention is based upon the fact that she was represented on the occasion in question by her family physician; that the condition of her left ear was made known to him, and the propriety of an operation thereon suggested, to which he made no objection. It is urged that by his conduct he assented to it, and that plaintiff was bound thereby. It is not claimed that he gave his express consent. It is not disputed but that the family physician of plaintiff was present on the occasion of the operation, and at her request. But the purpose of his presence was not that he might participate in the operation, nor does it appear that he was authorized to consent to any change in the one originally proposed to be made. Plaintiff was naturally nervous and fearful of the consequences of being placed under the influence of anesthetics, and the presence of her family physician was requested under the impression that it would allay and calm her fears. The evidence made the question one of fact for the jury to determine.

4. The last contention of defendant is that the act complained of did not amount to an assault and battery. This is based upon the theory that, as plaintiff's left ear was in fact diseased, in a condition dangerous and threatening to her health, the operation was necessary, and, having been skilfully performed at a time when plaintiff had requested a like operation on the other ear, the charge of assault and battery cannot be sustained; that, in view of these conditions, and the claim that there was no negligence on the part of defendant, and an entire absence of any evidence tending to show an evil intent, the court should say, as a matter of law, that no assault and battery was committed, even though she did not consent to the operation. In other words, that the absence of a showing that defendant was actuated by a wrongful intent, or guilty of negligence, relieves the act of defendant from the charge of an unlawful assault and battery. We are unable to reach that conclusion, though the contention is not without merit. It would seem to follow from what has been said on the other features of the case that the act of defendant amounted at least to a technical assault and battery. If the operation was performed without plaintiff's consent, and the circumstances were not such as to justify its performance without, it was wrongful; and, if it was wrongful, it was unlawful. As remarked in 1 Jaggard on Torts, 437, every person has a right to complete immunity of his person from physical interference of others, except in so far as contact may be necessary under the general doctrine of privilege; and any unlawful or unauthorized touching of the person of another, except it be in the spirit of pleasantry, constitutes an assault and battery. In the case at bar, as we have already seen, the question whether defendant's act in performing the operation upon plaintiff was authorized was a question for the jury to determine. If it was unauthorized, then it was, within what we have said, unlawful. It was a violent assault, not a mere pleasantry; and, even though no negligence is shown, it was wrongful and unlawful. The case is unlike a criminal prosecution for assault and battery, for there an unlawful intent must be shown. But that rule does not apply to a civil action, to maintain which it is sufficient to show that the assault complained of was wrongful and unlawful or the result of negligence. 1 Addison, Torts, 689; Lander v. Seaver, 32 Vt. 114, 76 Am. Dec. 156; Vosburg v. Putney, 80 Wis. 523, 14 L. R. A. 226, 27 Am. St. Rep. 47, 50 N. W. 403.

The amount of plaintiff's recovery, if she is entitled to recover at all, must depend upon the character and extent of the injury inflicted upon her, in determining which the nature of the malady intended to be healed and the beneficial nature of the operation 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

should be taken into consideration, as well as the good faith of the defendant.

MINNESOTA SUPREME COURT.

CAREY EMERSON et al., Respts.,
v.

PACIFIC COAST & NORWAY PACKING COMPANY, Appt.

(.... Minn.)

1. Contract—mutuality.

A written contract, signed by both parties, whereby defendant appointed plaintiffs its exclusive agents for a definite term to sell 85 per cent of its pack of fish, at an agreed commission, and plaintiffs obligated themselves to use their best efforts to sell such pack, in pursuance of which plaintiffs in fact performed services and incurred expenses in introducing and vending such pack, is not invalid for want of mutuality of obligation. An action for damages will lie upon breach of that contract without cause.

2. Damages—loss of profits.

The damages recoverable upon such breach are not merely discretionary with the jury. They include such loss of profits, past and future, as are shown by the evidence to have proximately resulted from a Headnotes by JAGGARD, J.

Case Note.—In the above case of EMERSON v. PACIFIC COAST & N. PACKING CO. the court held that the facts of the case did not bring it within the rule declaring contracts not binding where they lack in mutuality. The difficulty in cases of this kind is in applying the rule to the facts. The existence of the general rule that contracts do not bind either party unless both parties are bound is unquestioned.

As said in 1 Parsons on Contracts, 9th ed. p. 486, note: "One party to a contract is not bound thereby when it does not bind the other party; when there is no liability there is no obligation."

In Page on Contracts, vol. 1, p. 452, we read: "Where the parties assume to make a contract in which a promise is the consideration for a promise, and analysis shows that one of the promises does not impose any legal duty upon the party making it, such promise is not a consideration for the other promise. This is what is often meant by saying that promises must be mutual."

And in Hammon on Contracts, p. 682, it says: "When the only consideration for a contract is that which arises from an exchange of promises, there must be mutuality of obligation, else the consideration is not sufficient. Both parties must be bound, so that, in case of breach by either, the other would have a right of action therefor."

breach of the contract, excluding from the award all uncertain and conjectural profits.

3. Evidence—damages—proof of sales.

Evidence of sales made subsequently to breach and during the pendency of the contract term, although made by the principal, through other agents than the plaintiffs, are admissible in evidence, and, under proper direction by the court, may be weighed by the jury in estimating prevented gains.

(September 22, 1905.)

APPPEAL by defendant from an order of the District Court for Hennepin County denying a motion for new trial after verdict in plaintiffs' favor in an action brought to recover damages for breach of contract. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Gjertson, Rand, & Lund, John Lind, and A. Ueland, for appellant:

Unless the evidence is such that the jury can compute the profits with reference to recognized values, they are too speculative and uncertain to justify a verdict.

Griffin v. Colver, 16 N. Y. 494, 69 Am. Dec. 718.

Where it appears that future profits depend upon elements of chance, such as the chances incident to trade, the damages are too speculative and uncertain.

The court, in support of its holding that there was a mutuality of obligation, cited the following cases: Ames-Brooks Co. v. Etna Ins. Co. 83 Minn. 346, 86 N. W. 344, and Fontaine v. Baxley, 90 Ga. 416, 17 S. E. 1015. An examination of these cases shows that the Ames-Brooks Co. Case involved a contract to insure, at stipulated rates, plaintiff's grain cargoes for the coming season. The defendant contended that the plaintiff did not bind itself to have any cargoes to be insured during the season involved, and was at liberty, if it did have any, to insure them or not, as it pleased. To this the court answered that the plaintiff absolutely promised the defendant that they should have such insurance for the year 1899 on all of its cargoes to specified places, and they in turn promised to write the insurance upon the terms of the 1898 contract, and that this presupposed the continuance of the plaintiff in the business for the year 1899, and included, by necessary intentment, a promise on its part not to give such insurance to any other party. In the Fontaine Case it was held that a contract was not lacking in mutuality which stipulated that one party should go to a distant city and open and conduct its business for the sale of a commodity which the other party agreed to sell and deliver to him at a specified price, in such monthly quantities as he should sell, where there had been a part performance by such party going to the city and opening business, pursuant to the contract.

As said above, the difficulty lies in determining whether, under the facts of the case, 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Messrs. Welch, Hayne, & Hubachek, for respondents:

Damages may be recovered in the form of lost profits of a business which is regular and established, or where the profits can be ascertained with reasonable (not absolute) certainty, and where the parties, when both parties are bound by its terms. The court in the EMERSON CASE places its decision on the ground that the plaintiffs accepted the contract, and obligated themselves during the whole period of the contract to comply with its terms, and did actually enter upon its performance, and incurred expenses thereunder.

The EMERSON CASE is closely resembled in its facts by the case of W. G. Taylor Co. v. Bannerman, 120 Wis. 189, 97 N. W. 918, where it was held that a contract signed by both parties, wherein one party appointed the other as its exclusive agent for a certain territory for the sale of its product at stipulated prices, was not void for want of mutuality on the ground that the agent did not bind itself to do anything under the contract. The court held that the signing of the contract by the agent raised a presumption of acceptance, and that an acceptance bound the agent to perform all acts necessarily implied, either from the things which the principal was bound to do, or from the situation created by the contract.

A similar case is that of Mueller v. Bethesda Mineral Spring Co. 88 Mich. 390, 50 N. W. 319, where it was held that a contract by which the plaintiff was made sole agent in a certain territory for the sale of mineral water was not void for want of mutuality. Defendant contended that by the terms of the contract the plaintiff had not agreed to do anything. The court disposed of this by saying that the plaintiff agreed to act, as sole agent of the company, and that by acceptance there was contracting, may reasonably be supposed to have contemplated the loss of profits as the probable result of a breach.

Goebel v. Hough, 26 Minn. 252, 2 N. W. 847; Mississippi & R. River Boom Co. v. Prince, 34 Minn. 71, 24 N. W. 344; Cargill v. Thompson, 57 Minn. 534, 59 N. W. 638.

The question is whether the profits sought to be recovered are such as may reasonably be supposed to have been in the contemplation of both parties at the time they made the contract, as the probable result of the breach of it.

App. 121, 38 Pac. 76; Cranmer v. Kohn, 7 S. D. 247, 64 N. W. 125.

Jaggard, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiffs and respondents were brokers in groceries, operating between the producers or manufacturers and the wholesale grocers. They had offices at various places, in this state and elsewhere, from which they sold goods, both by personal solicitation and correspondence. The defendant and appellant, a Minnesota corporation, with its principal office in Minneapolis, had just engaged in the business of catching and packing fish, especially salmon, on the coast of Alaska, and shipping the same into the United States to be sold. This product was handled exclusively by the grocery trade. The packers sold to the wholesale grocers solely, through the medium of brokers, in advance of the catch and subject to pack. According to the contention of the plaintiffs, they entered into a written contract with the defendant, whereby they were constituted its sole agents for the sale of at least 85 per cent of its entire pack of fish of all kinds, upon a brokerage of 5 per cent for a period of two years, at a selling price to be agreed upon between the parties. Thereafter plaintiffs designed labels, advertised the merchandise, and proceeded with the execution of the contract. At the end of the first year of defendant's experience, the plaintiffs had sold a considerable quantity of fish, but not the entire pack. Thereupon defendant repudiated the contract, and before the end of another year sold a large an implied agreement sufficient to support the promise and contract that he would hold out the goods to the public and further the interests of the principal.

In the following cases it was held that the facts of each case brought it within the rule, and that the contract involved was void:

In Benjamin v. Bruce, 87 Md. 240, 39 Atl. 810, it was held that a contract between a manufacturer and a general storekeeper, whereby the manufacturer agreed that all goods made by him should be sold through the storekeeper in a specified territory, the goods to be shipped upon the storekeeper's order, at bottom prices, the latter to receive a commission, was void for want of mutuality, since it imposed no obligation upon the storekeeper to order any goods. The court distinguished the case from another in the same jurisdiction,—that of Baltimore Breweries Co. v. Callahan, 82 Md. 106, 33 Atl. 460,—on the ground that there a definite employment of the appellee as salesman, at a fixed salary, for a specified term, existed, and, though there were no formal words imposing the obligation to discharge the duties of a salesman, the necessary implication to that effect arose. It will be noted that the storekeeper was a general storekeeper; the acceptance of the contract did not change the nature of his business, or impose any duties or obligations upon him; which is clearly distinguishable from a general agency for a specified period, as in the EMERSON CASE.

tiffs had agreed that the defendants, who were general dealers in the commodity involved, should have the exclusive right to sell their goods in a particular territory, and that they would fill all orders by the defendants therefor, the contract was held lacking in mutuality, on the ground that it did not bind the defendants to do anything.

In Fallon v. Chronicle Pub. Co. 1 Mac-Arth. 485, it was held that an agreement by the defendant to give the plaintiff the exclusive right to sell and deliver the defendant's paper on a certain route, in consideration of a specified sum, and the further consideration that the plaintiff would faithfully deliver the papers and solicit subscribers, was void for want of mutuality.

A contract under which the defendant agreed, in consideration of the plaintiff's purchase and sale of a certain cigarette manufactured by it, to pay him a compensation or commission, was held to be wanting in mutuality, on the ground that there was no promise on the part of the plaintiff to purchase cigarettes, which was enforceable by defendant. Rafolovitz v. American Tobacco Co. 73 Hun, 87, 25 N. Y. Supp. 1036.

A contract by which one of the parties agrees to sell the goods of the other on commission is not mutual and binding on either of the parties where it contains a provision relieving the party who is to furnish the goods from liability for failure to do so, although the contract becomes binding upon such party actually furnishing the goods on the order of the other party. Harvester King Co. v. Mitchell, L. & S. Co. 89 Fed. 173.

quantity of fish through a broker in Chicago. This action was brought to recover damages for the alleged breach of contract, including future profits. The jury returned a verdict of $3,000 for plaintiffs.

1. Whether or not the defendant ever entered into the contract with the plaintiffs for the breach of which this action was brought, was fairly a question for the jury upon the testimony. The written agreement produced in evidence was under the corporate seal of the defendant, and was therefore prima facie its contract. Emerson v. Pacific Coast & N. Packing Co. 92 Minn. 523, 100 N. W. 305. Moreover, the record discloses conflict in the testimony as to whether or not its execution was in fact without previous authority by its board of directors; and there was considerable evidence as to the ratification of the agreement by the defendant. Upon the record the trial court also properly submitted to the jury the question of the breach of contract by the defendant.

2. The contract was not so peculiar in its nature as to deprive the plaintiffs of all damages upon proof of its breach. The facts in this case do not bring it within the rule that where a contract is optional on one side, and not mutual, it wants of sufficient consideration, and is not binding. Bailey v. Austrian, 19 Minn. 535, Gil. 465; Tarbox v. Gotzian, 20 Minn. 139, Gil. 122; Stensgaard v. Smith, 43 Minn. 11, 19 Am. St. Rep. 205, 44 N. W. 669. The contract at bar was not, properly speaking, unilateral. It was signed by both parties. Defendant agreed to pay a commission to the plaintiffs on sales. The plaintiffs accepted the contract, and obligated themselves, during the whole period named, to use their best efforts to sell defendant's merchandise, and actually performed services in introducing and vending defendant's stock, and incurred and defrayed expenses thereunder. The promises were therefore not all on one side,—there was mutuality of obligation; and an action for damages would lie upon its breach without cause. Ames Brooks Co. v. Aetna Ins. Co. 83 Minn. 346, 86 N. W. 344; Fontaine v. Baxley, 90 Ga. 416, 17 S. E. 1015. The cases which will be hereinafter referred to also fully sustain the trial court on this point.

3. The real question in this case concerns the rulings of the trial court upon profits as damages. The defendant's principal contentions in this connection are, first, that profits are not recoverable as damages upon a breach of a contract to sell upon commission; and, second, that evidence of sales made by the principal after the breach of the contract by its repudiation or the discharge of the salesman is not admissible to show the extent of gains prevented. The subject of profits as damages is a vexed and confused one in the current law. The decisions and text-books abound in loose generalizations that, as a rule, future profits are not proper basis for a judgment in damages for an admitted legal wrong, but that in certain cases there are exceptions to the rule, and profits may be recovered as damages. Even a casual examination of the authorities as a whole satisfies that it is exceedingly difficult to determine as between the allowance and denial of profits as damages, which is the rule and which is the exception. Nor is it especially significant which conclusion on this point be reached. No presumption for or against the award has been established. It is also doubtful whether the current general formula of the courts is not too indefinite and uncertain to be of much practical avail. A frequently quoted statement of the rule is that of Mr. Justice Lamar, in Howard v. Stillwell & B. Mfg. Co. 139 U. S. 199, 206, 35 L. ed. 147, 150, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 501, 503; "Profits which would have been realized had the contract been performed, and which have been prevented by its breach, are included in the damages to be recovered in every case where such profits are not open to the objection of uncertainty or of remoteness, or where, from the express or implied terms of the contract itself, or the special circumstances under which it was made, it may be reasonably presumed that they were within the intent and mutual understanding of both parties at the time it was entered into."

Four principal considerations have been recognized and applied by the courts in determining when future profits are to be allowed as damages and when they are to be denied, namely: First, how far the contract under consideration specifically provides for the award of damages for prevented gains upon its breach, or reasonably implies such an award as a necessary effect of a natural construction of its terms; second, the degree of certainty with which the harm can be traced to the wrongful conduct complained of as its legal cause; third, the extent to which the inherent difficulties and uncertainties of calculation of amount of prevented gains render the measure of damages speculative and untrustworthy; fourth, the possibility of applying to the controversy some more satisfactory standard of compensation. In the light of these considerations, the courts have weighed the evidence adduced in fact and possible in the nature of things to be proved. A fruitful source of at least apparent judicial inconsistency on this subject is the failure to note and apply the obvious distinction between cases of torts and cases of contracts. In the former the damages are not the results of a violation of an agreement. They are, logically, irrespective of any actual or of any implied contemplation of the parties. In the latter they are in a measure based upon mutual consent, expressed or implied. Moreover, there is often a radical difference in the remedies which are available to parties to an agreement, as distinguished from parties to a tort. There may be instances in which the actual damages may be substantially the same in both cases. Cincinnati Siemens-Lungren Gas Illuminating Co. v. Western Siemens-Lungren Co. 152 U. S. 200, 38 L. ed. 411, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 523. But the difficulty is as conspicuous as it is important in legal effect, when profits are the very object of the contract itself, and are clearly within the necessary purview of the parties making the agreement. A number of the cases cited by appellant denying the right to recover profits involve such actions ex delicto as to have little bearing on the present controversy. It would be naturally consistent to allow damages for prevented gains in this case, as the trial court has done here, and deny them, as this court did, in cases of wrongful seizure by an attachment (Casper v. Klippen, 61 Minn. 353, 52 Am. St. Rep. 604, 63 N. W. 737; Lowenstein v. Monroe, 55 Iowa, 82, 7 N. W. 406), or by replevin (Williams v. Wood, 55 Minn. 323, 56 N. W. 1066), or in cases of conversion generally (Cushing v. Seymour & S. Co. 30 Minn. 301, 15 N. W. 249), or in cases of actionable negligence (Simmer v. St. Paul, 23 Minn. 408). Confusion has arisen also because, in the early discussions of the subject, before the multiplication of authorities upon particular classes of cases, decisions just as applied to the state of facts presented by the respective records became unjust when distorted by application to different circumstances involving different issues and considerations. Adjudications that no sufficient evidence of profits was in point of fact adduced have been treated as cases holding that there could be no recovery upon any state of proof. In view of the superabundance of specific cases applying admitted general principles to particular and similar states of facts, it would seem to be a work of supererogation, as well as a source of misconception, to undertake to consider or reconcile or deduce much from the enormous number of cases on the general subject of profits as damages. An excellent collection and classification of authorities on the general subject will be found in a note to Wells v. National Life Asso. 53 L. R. A. 33.

The leading cases denying the right to recover as damages profits on sales made after the discharge of an agent selling upon commission, or after repudiation of the contract and before expiration of the term of employment, are to be found in the Alabama Reports. In Union Ref. Co. v. Barton, 77 Ala. 156, Stone, Ch. J., said: "In fact, the success of such enterprise (the sale of refined cotton seed oil) depends on so many contingencies that we can conceive of no means of making the necessary proof on which to found a verdict. No rule for such ascertainment can be predicated. Past successes in the same or a similar enterprise will not do. Conditions may not always remain the same." And see Brigham v. Carlisle, 78 Ala. 243, 56 Am. Rep. 28; Beck v. West, 87 Ala. 213, 219, 6 So. 70; Hair v. Barnes, 26 Ill. App. 580; Stern v. Rosenheim, 67 Md. 503, 10 Atl. 221, 307. And there is authority to the effect that where the employer discontinues his business, and thereby loses his agent profit of sales upon commission, there can be no recovery, because it was within contemplation of the parties that "the employee took the chances of his employer finding his business profitable and carrying it on." Re English & S. Marine Ins. Co. L. R. 5 Ch. 737; Pellet v. Manufacturers' & M. Ins. Co. 43 C. C. A. 669, 104 Fed. 502. But see Re Patent Floor Cloth Co. 41 L. J. Ch. N. S. 476. There can be no doubt, however, that the trend of authority and the weight of reason have established that an agent selling on commission, upon breach of his contract by his employer without just cause, is entitled to the profits, past and future, he would have realized if the defendant had performed his contract, and that evidence of sales made by the defendant within the unexpired period is admissible, and should be considered by the jury, upon proper caution by the court to avoid excess or speculation, to show the proper extent of plaintiff's recovery.

The transition of opinion on this subject from the Alabama and some of the earlier cases in other courts to the present rule is well illustrated in Iowa. In Howe Mach. Co. v. Bryson, 44 Iowa, 159, 24 Am. Rep. 735, the measure of damages was determined to be, not loss of profits, but the loss of time. The majority of the court held that few cases could be found in which profits have been disallowed as speculative in which the uncertainty is greater than in such a case. There were, however, two dissenting opinions. In Hichborn v. Bradley, 117 Iowa, 130, 90 N. W. 592, a manufacturer revoked a contract of a jobber which had been appointed its agent for the introduction of a particular brand of cigars in certain territory before the expiration of the contract term. In course of a learned review of the specific and related authorities, McClain, J., said: "If the question considered in Howe Mach. Co. v. Bryson were now before us for the first time, we might, in view of the later authorities, incline to the view expressed in the dissenting opinion." It was accordingly held that there was no other measure of damages than the loss of profits, and that the evidence of the amount of sales of such cigars made after the breach was not objectionable on the ground that it authorized uncertain and speculative damages. In New York (Washburn v. Hubbard, 6 Lans. 11) estimates of probable sales during the unexpired term were held inadmissible as evidence of future profits. The case did not lay down the rule, as seems to have been thought in Union Ref. Co. v. Barton, 77 Ala. 148, 156, that under no circumstances could future profits be recovered. The leading case of Wakeman v. Wheeler & W. Mfg. Co. 101 N. Y. 205, 54 Am. Rep. 676, 4 N. E. 264, held that the gains prevented by sales on commission are proper elements of damage, and that sales made by the employer after breach of the contract to sell on commission are admissible in evidence as evidence of the damages recoverable. And see Beeman v. Banta, 118 N. Y. 542, 16 Am. St. Rep. 779, 23 N. E. 887; Warren Chemical & Mfg. Co. v. Holbrook, 118 N. Y. 594, 16 Am. St. Rep. 788, 23 N. E. 908; Bannatyne v. Florence Mill & Min. Co. 77 Hun, 289, 28 N. Y. Supp. 334. The rule in the Federal court corresponds. In Wells v. National Life Asso. 53 L. R. A. 33, 39 C. C. A. 476, 99 Fed. 222, it was held that a life insurance agent, discharged before the expiration of his term without just cause, was entitled to have the jury consider, as an element of his damages, his commissions upon the amount of new business written by the defendant within this period through a new agent for the unexpired term. And see Taylor Mfg. Co. v. Hatcher, 3 L. R. A. 587, 39 Fed. 440; Moore v. Lawrence, 16 Fed. 87; Anvil Min. Co. v. Humble, 153 U. S. 540, 38 L. ed. 814, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 876. The letter and spirit of many other authorities are to the same effect. Mueller v. Bethesda Mineral Spring Co. 88 Mich. 390, 50 N. W. 319; Loud v. Campbell, 26 Mich. 239; Leonard v. Beaudry, 68 Mich. 312, 36 N. W. 88; Pittsburg Gauge Co. v. Ashton Valve Co. 184 Pa. 36, 39 Atl. 223; Dennis v. Maxfield, 10 Allen, 138; Blair v. Laffin, 127 Mass. 518; Martin v. Minnekahta State Bank, 7 S. D. 263, 64 N. W. 127; Haven v. Hudson, 12 La. Ann. 660; Stevenson v. Morris Mach. Works. 69 Miss. 232, 13 So. 834; Green v. Cole, 127 Mo. 587, 30 S. W. 135; Russell v. Horn, B. & F. Mfg. Co. 41 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Neb. 567, 59 N. W. 901 (approving Mueller v. Bethesda Mineral Spring Co.); Wiley v. California Hosiery Co. (Cal.) 32 Pac. 522; Treat v. Hiles, 81 Wis. 280, 50 N. W. 896; Schumaker v. Heinemann, 99 Wis. 251, 74 N. W. 785. This rule, allowing future profits upon proper proof, accords alike with the general spirit of the earlier decisions in this state. Fairchild v. Rogers, 32 Minn. 269, 20 N. W. 191. And see Goebel v. Hough, 26 Minn. 252, 2 N. W. 847, and the express holding of this court on the former appeal of this case in 92 Minn. 526, 100 N. W. 365.

The reasoning by which this conclusion is reached is sound. The measure of damages must have relation to the contract itself. Such a contract as the one here under consideration furnishes the measure of damages; namely, profits. Profits were necessarily within the actual contemplation of the parties. They are, therefore, proper basis for the award of damages. 8 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 622, subdiv. b. No question has been raised, nor, it would seem, could well be raised, as to the connection of the loss of profits as the proximate result of defendant's breach. The principal contention of the defendant is that the damages are conjectural and speculative. The uncertainty does not reside in the nature of the business. Deep sea fishing is not more speculative than mining, for breach of contract with respect to which future profits have been allowed as damages. Anvil Min. Co. v. Humble, 153 U. S. 540, 38 L. ed. 814, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 876. And see Dennis v. Maxfield, 10 Allen, 138. Nor is there any uncertainty as to the existence, but only as to the extent, of the profits. See Taylor v. Bradley, 39 N. Y. 129, 100 Am. Dec. 415, and brief of counsel in Treat v. Hiles, 81 Wis. 283, 50 N. W. 896. It is no exoneration to defendant that his misconduct, which has made inquiry as to the quantum of harm necessary, renders that inquiry difficult. Simpson v. London & N. W. R. Co. L. R. 1 Q. B. Div. 274; Dart v. Laimbeer, 107 N. Y. 669, 14 N. E. 291. The best the law can do is to award approximate compensation. Its failure to do even and exact justice in such cases is not more conspicuous than in many others. No other remedy is available. To allow only for loss of time and expenses would put a premium upon breaking contracts, and deny substantial justice.

The precise question as to the admissibility of evidence of sales made by the defendant through another agent subsequent to the breach of the contract, and within the period covered by agreement with the plaintiffs, has not been before fully decided by this court. It is the rule of this court that the damages are not a mere matter of discretion of the jury. Emerson v. Pacific Coast & N. Packing Co. 92 Minn. 526, 100 N. W. 365. The decisions of other courts, which have been discussed, determine that evidence of such sales should be received and considered by the jury. In this case the trial court very properly cautioned the jury to avoid speculation and excess, and to be careful not to give undue weight to the conjectural features of the case. When the jury was put in possession of all the facts as to the business transacted before and after the breach and within the term of the contract, it was given the best and natural means of forming as sound a judgment as could be predicated under the very difficult conditions. The plaintiff was entitled to the profit he would have made on his contract, had he been permitted to perform the same, including the profits both before and after the breach.

4. There were other assignments of error in the admission of evidence, the merits of which it is unnecessary to determine. We do not regard them as being of sufficient importance to invalidate the verdict, if it be conceded that they involve erroneous rulings.

Order appealed from is affirmed.

MAINE SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT.

CHARLES C. BURRILL

v.

HOWARD F. WHITCOMB.

(... Me.)

1. Chattel mortgage—after-acquired property—possession.

Taking possession of after-acquired stock in trade covered by a chattel mortgage, according to its provisions, will give the mortgagee precedence on a subsequent attachment, although the property was not purchased with the proceeds of stock sold, and the mortgagor did not expressly assent to such possession after acquiring the property.

2. Same—effect of statute.

The doctrine that taking possession of after-acquired chattels according to the provisions of a mortgage covering them gives precedence of liens over a subsequent attachment is not affected by a statute providing that no mortgage of chattels is valid against strangers, unless possession of such property is delivered to and retained by the mortgagee, or the mortgage is recorded.

(June 27, 1905.)

EXCEPTIONS by plaintiff to rulings of the Supreme Judicial Court for Hancock County made during the trial of an action brought to recover the value of certain teas attached by defendant as sheriff, which resulted in a judgment in defendant's favor. Sustained.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. F. C. Burrill and L. B. Deasy, for plaintiff:

The executory agreement of the owner is a continuing agreement, so that, when the creditor does take possession under it, he acts lawfully under the agreement of one then having the disposing power; and this makes the lien good.

W. 514; Tennis v. Midkiff, 55 Ill. App. 642;

Case Note.—The general rule in relation to the validity of chattel mortgages covering property thereafter to be acquired is stated in Jones, Chattel Mortgages, § 170, as follows: "A mortgage of future property is void, at law, as against others acquiring an interest in it, except in case the mortgagee takes possession of such property before any adverse interests have been acquired. A different rule, however, prevails in equity. There, while such mortgage itself does not pass the title to such property, it creates in the mortgagee an equitable interest in it, which will prevail against judgment creditors and others, although the mortgagee has not taken possession of the property, and the mortgagor has done no new act to confirm the mortgage. The ground of the doctrine is that the mortgage, though inoperative as a conveyance, is operative as an executory agreement, which attaches to the property when acquired, and, in equity, transfers the beneficial interest to the mortgagee, the mortgagor being regarded as a trustee for him, in accordance with the familiar maxim that equity considers that done which ought to be done." See also Pingrey, Chat. Mortg. §§ 213, 248; 6 Cyc. Law & Proc. pp. 1041, 1052.

Such a mortgage creates no lien as against judgment creditors of the mortgagor. Steele v. Ashenfelter, 40 Neb. 770, 42 Am. St. Rep. 694, 59 N. W. 361; Patterson v. Louisville Trust Co. 17 Ky. L. Rep. 234, 30 S. W. 872.

That possession is necessary to make such mortgage effectual as against third parties is held, among others, by the following cases: New England Nat. Bank v. Northwestern Nat. Bank, 171 Mo. 307, 60 L. R. A.

Francisco v. Ryan, 54 Ohio St. 307, 56 Am. St. Rep. 711, 43 N. E. 1045.

The equitable title to after-acquired property passes to the vendee when the vendor acquires it.

Holroyd v. Marshall, 10 H. L. Cas. 191; McCaffrey v. Woodin, 65 N. Y. 466, 22 Am. Rep. 644; Smithurst v. Edmunds, 14 N. J. Eq. 417.

Mr. A. W. King for defendant.

Whitehouse, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action of trover, brought against the defendant, as sheriff of Hancock county, to recover the value of a quantity of tea attached by him on a writ in favor of M. Gallert and against M. M. & E. E. Davis.

The plaintiff claims title to the attached property by virtue of a mortgage from the Davises to him, duly recorded, in which the property is described as follows:

"All the stock in trade, consisting principally of teas, coffees, spices, crockery, and small wares, store furnishings and fixtures, present and future book accounts, now contained in the store situated on the north side of Main street, in Ellsworth, Maine, occupied by us and where we now carry on business, and also all stock in trade, furniture, and fixtures that may be hereafter acquired."

The mortgage also contains the following provisions and agreements:

"Provided, however, that it shall and may be lawful for the said grantors, said M. M. & E. E. Davis, to continue in possession of the property herein mortgaged until such time as said Burrill . . . shall consider it for his or their interest to take possession under this mortgage for the enforcement of 256, 71 S. W. 191; Stowell v. Bair, 5 Ill. App. 104; Rochester Distilling Co. v. Rasey, 142 N. Y. 570, 40 Am. St. Rep. 635, 37 N. E. 632; Re Allen, 65 Vt. 392, 26 Atl. 591; American Surety Co. v. Worcester Cycle Mfg. Co. 100 Fed. 40. But this is not the case where a mortgage of a stock of merchandise covering goods bought to replace sales is authorized by statute. See McCord v. Albany County Nat. Bank, 6 Wyo. 507, 46 Pac. 1093.

In Cameron v. Marvin, 26 Kan. 612, it is said: "When a mortgagee takes possession of the future-acquired property under such a stipulation in the mortgage, he then holds the property by way of pledge, but in the same manner as though the mortgage had been executed at the time he takes possession of the property, and in the same manner as though he had taken the property under and by virtue of a chattel mortgage covering the property."

The principle that such a mortgage is good in equity has considerably modified the application of the rule above stated. Thus, it has been held in Parker v. Jacobs, 14 S. C. 112, 37 Am. Rep. 724, that the equitable lien of a mortgage of after-acquired property will prevail against an execution issued on the judgment of an antecedent creditor, though the mortgagee has never taken possession.

And a lien retained upon a stock of goods sold, and on additions thereto, is good as to antecedent creditors, in the absence of fraud. Zaring v. Cox, 78 Ky. 527.

A lien acquired by levy is subordinate to the lien of a mortgage covering after-acquired chattels. Stoll v. Sibson, 65 N. J. Eq. 552, 66 Atl. 710.

Equity will protect, by injunction, the rights of a lessor under a lease providing for collateral security for rent upon furniture thereafter to be purchased, as against a subsequent execution creditor of the lessee. Smithurst v. Edmunds, 14 N. J. Eq. 415.

But equity will not, to protect the mortgagee of property thereafter to be acquired, enjoin the enforcement against such property of a judgment for its purchase price. Farmers' Loan & T. Co. v. Long Beach Improv. Co. 27 Hun, 89.

The title of the mortgagee is perfected where the mortgagor gives him possession of the after-acquired chattels. Rowley v. Rice, 11 Met. 333; Chapman v. Weimer, 4 Ohio St. 481.

That possession taken by the mortgagee, by virtue of a power given in the mortgage, without further act by the mortgagor, is equally effective, as held in BURRILL v. WHITCOMB, is fully sustained by the authorities. See, in addition to the cases cited and discussed in the BURRILL CASE, Jones, Chat. Mortg. § 164a; Cobbe, Chat. Mortg. § 358; Gregg v. Sanford, 24 Ill. 17, 76 Am. Dec. 719; Allen v. Windham Cotton Mfg. Co. 87 Fed. 786; Ayers, W. & R. Co. v. Sundback, 5 S. D. 31, 58 N.W. 4; Perkins v. Batterson, 66 Hun, 583, 21 N. Y. Supp. 815.

In Harriman v. Woburn Electric Light Co. 163 Mass. 85, 39 N. E. 1004, it was said, regarding a covenant in a mortgage in regard to after-acquired property: "Formerly it was thought that such a covenant would take effect only if the mortgagor, as well as the mortgagee, acted under it. Under the more liberal doctrine of later cases, which does not require the delivery of the property by the mortgagor, it is well settled that, as against attaching creditors or assignees in insolvency, the title does not pass nor the mortgage take effect, upon the after-acquired property, either at law or in equity, unless possession is taken under it."

The taking possession of after-acquired property by a receiver appointed in a suit to foreclose does not constitute a reduction to possession by the mortgagee which will defeat the claims of general creditors. Central Trust Co. v. Worcester Cycle Mfg. Co. 110 Fed. 491.

any and all rights given to said Burrill under this mortgage; the said grantee, said Burrill, by the acceptance of this conveyance, hereby expressly constituting the said grantors, said M. M. & E. E. Davis, his trustees to continue in possession of the property herein mortgaged until such time as said grantee shall deem it for his interest to take possession of the same for any of the purposes in this mortgage specified, or for the purpose of enforcing his legal or equitable rights hereunder.

"And the said grantors, said M. M. & E. E. Davis, further hereby agree and declare that all stock in trade, general merchandise, book accounts, and debts due, of every name and description, which they may from time to time hereafter during the continuance of this mortgage add, or supplement, or incorporate, with stock in trade, general merchandise, book accounts, and debts due, and personal property herein mortgaged, for the purpose of carrying on the said business, shall be subject to and included in this mortgage, and the provisions herein contained to be applicable to them also.

"And the said grantors hereby further agree that if at any time during the continuance of this mortgage the said Charles C. Burrill, his executors, administrators, or assigns, shall deem it for their interest to take possession of the property herein mortgaged, or of any additions thereto that may be made, the said Burrill, his executors, administrators, or assigns, shall thereupon have the right to take such possession peaceably and quietly; and that thereupon and so soon as said Burrill, his executors, administrators, and assigns, take such possession, the whole debt secured by this mortgage shall be due and payable, whether the time for its payment has elapsed or not, anything in this mortgage to the contrary notwithstanding, and the said Burrill, his executors, administrators, or assigns, shall thereupon have the right to foreclose this mortgage by any of the methods provided by the law of the state of Maine for the foreclosure of mortgage of personal property. . . . Said Burrill may also have the right to move the goods to any place that he may deem for his best interest."

At the time of the execution and delivery of the mortgage, the tea, for the conversion of which this suit is brought, had not been bought by the mortgagors, and was not in their possession. Between the date of the mortgage and February 19, 1904, the tea was bought by the mortgagors and placed in their store as a part of their stock for the purpose of carrying on their business. It was not paid for by the proceeds of any of the mortgaged stock.

ing it for his interest to do so, took possession of all the stock in the store, including the tea, for the purpose of enforcing his rights under the mortgage, and removed the same to another store, and retained possession of it until February 20, 1904, when the tea was attached and taken away by the defendant, as sheriff of Hancock county, as above stated.

There was no act of delivery of the tea in question on the part of the mortgagors at any time after it was purchased by them, and the taking possession of the tea by the plaintiff with the rest of the stock was without any other consent of the mortgagors than that contained in the agreement found in the mortgage.

By agreement of the parties the case was heard by the presiding judge, without the aid of a jury, with leave to except in matters of law. The court found as matters of fact, that the mortgage had been foreclosed, and the foreclosure completed, more than forty-eight hours before the bringing of this action, and also that the written notice provided by Rev. Stat. chap. 83, § 45, had been seasonably given by the plaintiff to the defendant.

But the presiding judge also ruled, as a matter of law, that the mortgage of future-acquired chattels was void against attaching creditors without some new act on the part of the mortgagor; and that possession taken without the consent of the mortgagor, and retained by the mortgagee before and until the attachment, was not sufficient to make the mortgage good. Judgment was accordingly rendered for the defendant, and the case comes to this court on exceptions to this ruling.

The case thus stated presents for the determination of the court the single question of law whether a mortgagee in a chattel mortgage duly recorded, who has taken and retained possession of after-acquired stock in trade as a part of the property described in the mortgage, by virtue of an explicit agreement in the mortgage authorizing him so to do, is entitled to hold such after-acquired property, not purchased with the proceeds of any of the stock sold, as against a creditor who attaches it after possession taken by the mortgagee.

The defendant contends that, inasmuch as the tea in question was not owned or possessed by the mortgagors at the date of the mortgage, the mortgage itself was not operative to transfer the title to the plaintiff; and, as there was no subsequent act of delivery on their part, and no voluntary transfer of it to the plaintiff, or consent that the plaintiff should take possession of it, given after they acquired title to it, the possession taken and retained by the plaintiff by virtue of the consent in the mortgage was not sufficient to entitle him to hold it against a creditor who did not attach it until after possession taken by the mortgagee.

The plaintiff does not controvert the well-settled general rule that a mortgagee of after-acquired chattels obtains no title or right to them as against a creditor of the mortgagor who attaches them in the hands of a mortgagor before the mortgagee has taken possession. The exceptions to this rule respecting chattels of which the mortgagor had potential ownership, at the time the mortgage was given, and chattels purchased with the proceeds of those sold and substituted for them in accordance with the terms of the mortgage, as already seen, are not involved in the present case. It is not questioned that the defendant's attachment would have been good if it had been made while the tea was in possession of the mortgagor. But the plaintiff contends that, in case of mortgages like the one at bar, the executory agreement of the mortgagor is a continuing agreement, and that the taking of possession, by the mortgagee, of after-acquired property by virtue of the previous consent of the mortgagor, given in the mortgage, is equivalent to a delivery of possession by the mortgagor; and that the mortgagee's equitable lien is thereby made good, without any new act or consent on the part of the mortgagor.

The respective rights of mortgagee and attaching creditors or other third parties in regard to after-acquired property claimed under chattel mortgages upon facts analogous to those at bar have frequently received the attention of this court, and obiter dicta may be found, and some early authorities are cited in several Maine cases, tending to support the defendant's position, and, on the other hand, recent decisions from other states have been cited with approval tending to support the plaintiff's contention; but the precise question now presented does not appear to have been necessarily involved and directly determined in any reported case in this state. It has often been decided, however, in other jurisdictions, by courts of great respectability and high authority; and this court is now at liberty to adopt the view which is most in accord with the principles of equity and sound reason, and at the time best supported by the weight of judicial opinion in other American states.

It is a well-settled principle in equity, requiring no citation of authorities in its support, that "an agreement to . . . give security upon . . . property not yet in existence or in the ownership of the party making the contract, or property to be acquired by him in the future, although, with the exception of . . . [chattels having 'potential existence'] it creates no legal estate . . . in the things when they afterwards come into existence or are acquired by the promisor, does constitute an equitable lien upon the property so existing or acquired at a subsequent time, which is enforced in the same manner and against the same parties as a lien upon specific things existing and owned by the contracting party at the date of the contract." 3 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 1236. So in Mitchell v. Winslow, 2 Story, 630, Fed. Cas. No. 9,673, it is said by Judge Story "that wherever the parties by their contract intended to create a positive lien or charge, either upon real or upon personal property, whether then owned by the assignor or contractor or not, or, if personal property, whether it is then in esse or not, it attaches in equity as a lien or charge upon the particular property as soon as the assignor or contractor acquires a title thereto, against the latter and all persons asserting a claim thereto under him, either voluntarily or with notice or in bankruptcy."

In Griffith v. Douglass, 73 Me. 532, 40 Am. Rep. 395, relied upon by the defendant as an authority to support his contention, this doctrine of equitable lien is recognized by our court. In the opinion the court says: "While, at common law, the mortgage covers the existent property of the mortgagor, and does not transfer any right to after-acquired property, it is otherwise in equity. Though that court recognizes the rule of the common law, yet it holds such conveyance operative as an executory agreement, binding on the property when acquired. The mortgagor holds the property as trustee, and equity enforces the trust. In some cases the decision rests upon the grounds of an equitable lien." And Mitchell v. Winslow, supra, is cited in support of this principle.

In Griffith v. Douglass, supra, the mortgaged property consisted of hotel furniture, and the mortgage contained a provision that it should be lawful for the mortgagors to continue in the possession of the property, "without denial or interruption" by the mortgagee, until condition broken. There was a formal delivery of the subsequently purchased goods to the mortgagee, but possession of them was not retained by him. The mortgagee's possession was only instantaneous. It was immediately resumed by the mortgagor. This was the decisive fact in that case. The court says: "The authorities are uniform in requiring, not merely delivery, but retention of the property delivered, as indispensable to the perfection of the mortgagee's title."

The question now before the court was not raised by the facts disclosed in that case, and consequently it was not there adjudicated. The elaborate discussion in the opinion of the rights of mortgagees in chattel mortgages covering after-acquired property must be understood to apply only to the facts of that case. The early cases of Head v. Goodwin, 37 Me. 181, and Jones v. Richardson, 10 Met. 481, cited by the defendant, are there adopted by the court as leading authorities upon the question discussed in the opinion. In Jones v. Richardson, it is true, evidence that the mortgagee had taken possession of after-acquired property for the purpose of foreclosure was said to be immaterial, and some new act on the part of the mortgagor was held to be necessary; thus apparently supporting the defendant's contention. But in that case the mortgage contained no express agreement that the mortgagee should take possession. Furthermore, the doctrine in that case has been repudiated in four subsequent cases in that state, and thus the authority upon which the decision in Head v. Goodwin, supra, is founded, is seen to have been denied by the court from which it emanated. Besides, the facts in Head v. Goodwin differ toto cælo from those in the case at bar, and the decision is in no respect an authority for the defendant. There a vendor sold one half of a chaise to which he had no title, and afterwards purchased the chaise and delivered it at a certain stable into the custody of the person to whom he had sold one half of it; but the court found no satisfactory evidence that this delivery was made for the purpose of effectuating the former sale, and held that it was not such a new act as to transfer the property.

In Sawyer v. Long, 86 Me. 542, 30 Atl. 111, possession of the stock was not taken by the mortgagee, but was retained by the mortgagor, and the property passed to the assignee, who transferred it to the defendant as purchaser of the assignee's interest. In Dexter v. Curtis, 81 Me. 505, 64 Am. St. Rep. 266, 40 Atl. 549, it was held that, while the mortgagor, by the terms of the mortgage, had the right to sell or exchange any portion of his stock, he did not have the right to sell those goods to his creditors in payment of part indebtedness. The question now before the court was not involved in either of these cases.

On the other hand, in Deering v. Cobb, 74 Me. 332, 43 Am. Rep. 596, the facts more clearly resemble those in the case at bar, except that the rights of an attaching creditor were not involved. In the opinion the court says: "It seems, also, that when, as in this case, a mortgage is effective between the parties as a transfer of title to property to be subsequently acquired by the use of the proceeds of the original stock, and the mortgage contains a power to the mortgagee to enter and take possession of such future property when acquired, possession taken and retained in the exercise of that power makes the mortgage effective, without any new act of the mortgagor, against third persons claiming under him by later attachment or conveyance. A proposition at least as strong as this is sustained in Jones, Chat. Mortg. §§ 160, 167, by a full citation of authorities, English and American, which there is no occasion here to examine more minutely. Hope v. Hayley, 5 El. & Bl. 830; Moody v. Wright, 13 Met. 17, 32, 46 Am. Dec. 706; Cook v. Cortbell, 11 R. I. 483, 23 Am. Rep. 518; Walker v. Vaughn, 33 Conn. 577, 583."

But in a more recent case in Massachusetts, which has been one of the states to hold most closely to common-law doctrine in regard to mortgages of this kind, it has been held that "if, however, the after-acquired property is taken by the mortgagee into his possession before the intervention of any rights of third persons, he holds it under a valid lien by the operation of the provision of the mortgage in regard to it. . . . Such taking of possession, though effected immediately before insolvency proceedings were instituted, and with full knowledge of the insolvency of the mortgagor, would not be the acceptance of a preference, but the assertion of a right which had been previously acquired by the mortgagee under an instrument in writing made when the parties to it were both competent to contract, and when there was no qualification of the right of either to deal with the other." Chase v. Denny, 130 Mass. 566.

In this case the court plainly recognizes the progressive development of the law upon this subject, although the precise question under discussion was not then presented for decision. It shows a strong tendency to reject the narrow interpretation of the common-law rule found in some of the earlier decisions, and a readiness to adopt the more reasonable and equitable doctrine, which simply requires the mortgagor to observe the obligation of his express agreement in the mortgage. The common-law dogma, which is said to require some new act on the part of the mortgagor to protect the mortgagee's lien, appears to have been founded mainly upon one of Lord Bacon's Latin maxims, which declares that, "though the grant of a future interest is invalid, yet a declaration may be made which will take effect on the intervention of some new act—interveniente novo actu." As one of the first instances stated by Lord Bacon to illustrate the maxim had reference to a "new act" on the part of a grantor, it appears to have been assumed by some of the courts that no other act would suffice to effectuate the prior agreement. But such a restricted meaning was not required by the text of the maxim, and it was expressly repudiated in subsequent cases. In the bill of sale in that case it was agreed that the plaintiff might take possession of the crops and other effects which might from time to time be substituted in lieu of the crops, or which should be found on the farm. The plaintiffs seized and took possession of some of the crops which had been sown after the indenture was made. In delivering the judgment of the court, Parke, B., said: "If the authority given by the bill of sale had not been executed, it would have been of no avail against the execution; . . . but, when executed to the extent of taking possession of the growing crops, it is the same in our judgment as if the debtor himself had put the plaintiff in actual possession of those crops." See also Carr v. Allatt, 3 Hurlst. & N. 964. It is uniformly conceded that, if the mortgagee takes possession of after-acquired property, in accordance with an express agreement in the mortgage, with the consent of the mortgagor, given after he acquired title, it will be sufficient to perfect the mortgagee's lien. But a stipulation in the mortgage authorizing the mortgagee to take possession at any time is not a mere license, revocable at the pleasure of the mortgagor, but a valid and binding contract, which continues in force until performed. It is therefore difficult to understand upon what principle of justice or conception of common right a mortgagor can be permitted to defeat the acknowledged equitable rights of the mortgagee by simply withholding his consent, in violation of his express stipulation in the mortgage. According to this doctrine, if the mortgagee seeks to exercise his right to take possession of the property under the mortgage, and the mortgagor gives an express assent, not required by the terms of the mortgage, the mortgagee's equitable rights are preserved. On the other hand, if the mortgagor objects, in violation of his agreement, or stands mute, the mortgagee's possession, though expressly authorized by the contract of the parties, will not suffice, and his rights are lost. Such a rule cannot be founded on principles of right and justice.

And it will now be seen that such a rule has no stronger support in authority than it has in reason and equity.

In Moody v. Wright, 13 Met. 32, 46 Am. Dec. 708, the reasons for the contrary rule are thus stated: "A stipulation that future-acquired property shall be holden as security for some present engagement is an executory agreement, of such a character that the creditor with whom it is made may, under it, take the property into his possession, when it comes into existence, and is the subject of transfer by his debtor, and hold it for his security; and whenever he does so take it into his possession, before any attachment has been made of the same, or any alienation thereof, such creditor, under his executory agreement, may hold the same; but, until such an act done by him, he has no title to the same, and that, such act being done and the possession thus acquired, the executory agreement of the debtor authorizing it, it will then become holden by virtue of a valid lien or pledge. The executory agreement of the owner, in such case, is a continuing agreement, so that, when the creditor does take possession under it, he acts lawfully under the agreement of one then having the disposing power, and this makes the lien good."

Although this reasoning was not essential to the conclusion in that case, it has been accepted by that court as the law of that state, and applied in all subsequent cases. A copious extract from the opinion in Chase v. Denny, 130 Mass. 568, was made by this court in Deering v. Cobb, supra.

In Blanchard v. Cooke, 144 Mass. 207, 11 N. E. 83, the court says: "The only apparent change in our decisions is that by the recent cases possession of after-acquired chattels rightfully taken by a mortgagee under the power contained in the mortgage, if the possession is retained, vests the title in the mortgagee as against third persons; and a delivery by the mortgagor is no longer held to be essential. . . . Our recent decisions have therefore proceeded upon the theory, which, by a dictum in Jones v. Richardson, 10 Met. 481, was denied, that when the chattels are acquired, and are identified by the terms of the mortgage, the title passes as between the parties, and a possession rightfully obtained by the mortgagee, and retained by him, vests the title in him as against third persons whose rights have not attached before the possession is taken, and that delivery by the mortgagor is not necessary." In Bennett v. Bailey, 150 Mass. 259, 22 N. E. 916, it was ruled at the trial that the taking of possession of such after-acquired property by the defendant without any delivery to him by the plaintiff was insufficient, but exceptions to this ruling were sustained. In the opinion the court says: "It was settled in Blanchard v. Cooke, supra, after a careful review and a full consideration of the authorities, that possession of after-acquired personal property, rightfully taken and maintained by a mortgagee under a mortgage purporting to cover it, gives him a title good, not only against the mortgagor, but even against an assignee in insolvency or an attaching creditor. That principle is applicable to the present case."

In Rowan v. Sharps' Rifle Mfg. Co. 29 Conn. 283, where a mortgage of a factory and its equipments embraced in its terms such machinery and stock as should be afterwards purchased and placed upon the premises, and the mortgagee had afterwards taken possession of the factory with such after-acquired property, it was held that, whatever effect was to be given to the provision in itself, it became operative upon possession being taken by the mortgagee. This was reaffirmed in Walker v. Vaughn, 33 Conn. 577. See also Williams v. Briggs, 11 R. I. 476, 23 Am. Rep. 518; McLoud v. Wakefield, 70 Vt. 560. 43 Atl. 179; McCaffrey v. Woodin, 65 N. Y. 459, 22 Am. Rep. 644; Lamson v. Moffat, 61 Wis. 153, 21 N. W. 62; and Fisher v. Syfers, 109 Ind. 514, 10 N. E. 306.

It may be deemed worthy of observation that the rights of attaching creditors were not directly involved in any of the cases hereinbefore cited from other states; and, if any authority is required to establish the proposition that an attaching creditor cannot acquire any rights, either statutory or equitable, superior to those of a mortgagee who has taken and retained possession of the property by virtue of an express contract in the mortgage authorizing him so to do, it will be furnished by the following well-reasoned decisions from courts of eminent respectability:

In Francisco v. Ryan, 54 Ohio St. 307, 56 Am. St. Rep. 711, 43 N. E. 1045, the mortgage contained a stipulation like that in the case at bar, authorizing the mortgagee to take possession of the property; and the court thus discussed the question in the opinion: "The contention of the plaintiffs in error on this point is that it is essential to the acquisition of a valid lien on the after-acquired property under such a mortgage that the mortgagor voluntarily deliver the property to the mortgagee, or give his consent to the mortgagee's possession when taken; and that the lien does not arise if, as in this case, the mortgagee of his own accord take the possession. . . . Acting under this contractual authority in obtaining the possession of the property, the consent of the mortgagor thereto at the time can neither be necessary to the legality of the possession, nor can it in any way add to the rights of the mortgagee. Certainly, after possession so taken, the mortgagor could not successfully assert any claim to the property, for his contract would prevent him; and, as whatever title he theretofore had to the property is thereby extinguished, nothing remains to be reached by his attaching or other creditors, unless it be such surplus as should remain after satisfying the mortgagee's debt."

W. 514, a chattel mortgage contained an agreement that it should cover all merchandise that might subsequently be added to the mortgagor's stock, and it was held that the mortgagee acquired a valid lien by taking possession under the mortgage before the rights of other creditors intervened. In the opinion the court says: "By the express terms of the mortgages it was provided that, . . . if the mortgagees should consider themselves unsecured, they might take possession of any part or all of said merchandise, and the taking possession under an order of delivery, issued in the action of replevin instituted by the plaintiffs to obtain possession under the mortgages, was but a taking by and with an agreement entered into by the mortgagor, and was all that was necessary. . . . The taking of possession of such property by the mortgagees under the authority given in the mortgages before the rights of other creditors had intervened created a valid lien on such property. Jones, Chat. Mortg. §§ 164-168; Keating v. Hanenkamp, 100 Mo. 161, 13 S. W. 89; Moody v. Wright, 13 Met. 17, 46 Am. Dec. 706."

So, also, in Tennis v. Midkiff, 55 Ill. App. 642, and Quirique v. Dennis, 24 Cal. 154, it was held that, where a mortgage provides that it shall cover after-acquired property and the mortgagee takes possession of such property, his claim is prior to that of a subsequent attaching creditor.

In 6 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 1051, the result of all the authorities is stated as a settled and unquestioned rule that, with respect to after-acquired property, "an actual transfer of possession to the mortgagee, either by voluntary delivery from the mortgagor, or by the exercise of a power to take possession, contained in the mortgage, is such a new act as will constitute a ratification of the mortgage." To the same effect is the rule formulated in 5 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 980.

But it is suggested that, by § 1, chap. 91, Rev. Stat., "no mortgage of personal property is valid against any other person than the parties thereto, unless possession of such property is delivered to and retained by the mortgagee, or the mortgage is recorded," etc. In this case it has been seen the mortgage was duly recorded, and possession of the goods therein described, including the after-acquired property, was rightfully taken and retained by the mortgagee by virtue of the consent of the mortgagor previously granted on the stipulation of the mortgage. It is universally conceded, as before stated, that possession taken by the mortgagee, by virtue of the mortgagor's consent given after the property is acquired, is to be deemed equivalent to a voluntary delivery by the mortgagor, and such a "new act" as will effectuate the previous agreement. It has now been shown by a uniform current of modern decisions that the law has advanced another step, and now holds that actual possession of such property, taken by the mortgagee in the exercise of an authority expressly granted in the mortgage, is also equivalent to a voluntary delivery by the mortgagor; and, if such possession is retained, it makes the mortgagee's lien as against an attaching creditor. Statutory provisions for the registration of chattel mortgages, in effect precisely like our own, existed in all the states from which the foregoing decisions have been cited; but in no case directly involving the question now before the court have they been held to be in conflict with the equitable doctrine above stated.

Nor is it apparent that such a contract respecting after-acquired property is a contravention of any established rules of public policy. Indeed, it would seem to be more in obedience to the principles of sound morality and consideration of public duty to sanction the act of the mortgagee in taking and holding the property in accordance with the express terms of the contract, rather than the act of the mortgagor or an attaching creditor in taking it away from him in violation of the agreement.

It is accordingly the opinion of the court that the action is maintainable, and the entry must be:

MASSACHUSETTS SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT.

CITY OF LOWELL

v.

AMEDEE ARCHAMBAULT, Appt.

(.... Mass.)

Stable—license—revocation.

A license granted by the board of health, under statutory authority, for the erection of a stable without any limit as to time, cannot be revoked by such board in the absence of statutory authority, existing regulations of the board, or some provision in the license itself for its revocation.

(September 8, 1905.)

A PPEAL by defendant from a decree of the Superior Court for Middlesex County enjoining him from occupying and using a stable. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. F. W. Qua and S. E. Qua, for appellant:

Authority to grant licenses does not include, by implication, a power of revocation.

State ex rel. Heise v. Columbia, 6 Rich. L. 404.

Without express power to revoke, or express reservation in the license itself, the license would not be revocable.

Mr. James Gilbert Hill, for appellee:

A license from the board of health is not a contract.

It can be revoked at any time by the authority which granted it, in the exercise of the police power.

The final determination of the question of what will be the natural and probable effect of the erection and use of a building for a stable rests with the board of health.

White v. Kenney, 157 Mass. 12, 31 N. E. 654.

Case Note.—The holding in the above case is supported by the following authorities:

Buffalo v. Chadeayne, 134 N. Y. 163, 31 N. E. 443, holds that one who obtains from the common council permission to erect wooden buildings within the fire limits of a city whose charter prohibits the erection of such buildings without such permission, and enters upon their construction thereunder, acquires a vested right to proceed with their construction and enjoyment, which the common council cannot deprive him of by rescinding their permission. This case affirms 7 N. Y. Supp. 501, which is cited in McQuillin on Municipal Ordinances, § 420, as authority for the statement that, after a permit to erect a frame building has been duly granted, and the work of construction has begun, and material therefor has been purchased, a revocation of the permit without notice and public necessity will not be sustained.

And Dainese v. Cooke (Dainese v. Public Works) 91 U. S. 580, 23 L. ed. 251, holds that, where the proper officer gives a permit for the erection of a building contemplated by a contract shown him, a clear case of departure from the permit, or of danger to the

Braley, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a bill in equity, brought under Rev. Laws, chap. 102, § 71, to enjoin the defendant from occupying and using a stable, in violation of the provisions of § 69 of the same chapter. In the superior court the case was submitted on agreed facts, and, after a decree had been entered in favor of the plaintiff, it comes before us on the defendant's appeal.

It appears that the defendant, who is engaged in the business of an undertaker, desiring to erect on his land a stable to be used in connection therewith, applied to the board of health for a license to permit him to occupy and use the building, when completed, for the stabling of eight horses. This petition was granted, and a license duly issued to him, permitting the exercise of this privilege. Upon receiving it, he at once had plans prepared, and began the erection of a stable on a site from which he had, at a pecuniary loss, removed another building. After the work had been begun, but before its completion, the board of health, acting on the petition of residents in the immediate vicinity, rescinded their former vote, and canceled the license. Since the completion of the building the defendant has used it for the keeping of two horses, claiming this right under the license, which he contends never has been legally annulled. If the revocation was invalid, such use was not in violation of the statutory provision on which the plaintiff relies, and the bill cannot be maintained. The license granted under the police power of the commonwealth, as administered through the agency of the board of health, did not constitute a contract between him and the city, or confer upon him any vested right of property. Neither did its abrogation, if lawful, deprive him of any immunity or privilege conferred upon him by our Constitution. Calder v. Kurby, 5 Gray, 597; Newton v. Joyce, 166 Mass. 83, 55 Am. St. Rep. 385, 44 N. E. 116; Young v. Blaisdell, 138 Mass. 344. The Statutes of 1895 (chap. 213, p. 219), now Rev. Laws, chap. 102, §§ 69, 71, under the authority of which the board acted and the license was issued, contained no provisions for its recall when once granted. It evidently was the purpose of § 1 of the original act that the license itself should specify the extent of the right conferred, by setting out the conditions under which the building could be built and used; for, by § 2 the board may make regulations respecting the occupation and use of stables in existence at the date of its passage; while the last section provided a penalty for the violation of the act itself, or of any order or regulation made pursuant to its requirements. Whether a stable was in existence and its use was to be continued, or permission was to be given to erect a stable and then use it, the right in each instance was subject to such reasonable regulations as might be made by the board of health. It undoubtedly was presumed that the board would make proper inquiries before judicially determining whether a license should or should not be refused, and, if granted, to prescribe by its terms how far the privilege public interests, must be shown before the one obtaining it can be arrested midway in the construction of the building, and required to remove it.

And St. Louis v. Dorr, 136 Mo. 370, 37 S. W. 1108, holds that, where a permit for the erection of a brick building in St. Louis, "to be used as a dwelling house," has been granted, a part of which is used for a business house during the process of its erection, in accordance with specifications submitted to the commissioner of public buildings, whereupon the commissioner revokes his license, after which the owner continues work on the building, an action against him for a penalty on a charge that he has erected a building without having first obtained written permission cannot be sustained. This case is cited in McQuillin on Municipal Ordinances, § 471, as authority for the statement that, under the St. Louis charter and ordinances, the commissioner of public buildings has not the power to restrict the use of a building for which a permit has been issued.

And Gallagher v. Flury, 99 Md. 181, 57 Atl. 672, holds that a permit for the erection of a stable, granted by the proper officer in accordance with an ordinance generally applicable, authorizing the granting of such a permit, cannot be canceled by the city council by a resolution; as it would deprive him of rights given to all other property holders.

But Brooklyn v. Furey, 9 Misc. 193, 30 N. Y. Supp. 349, holds that a permit for the erection of a wooden building within the fire limits of a city, which the common council had no authority under the city charter to grant, can be revoked, and the removal of the building ordered, at any time; as no rights can vest under an invalid permit.

And Harper v. Jonesboro, 94 Ga. 801, 22 S. E. 138, cited in McQuillin on Municipal Ordinances, § 420, as authority for the statement that a permit for the erection of a wooden building may usually be legally revoked on breach of condition by the contractor, holds that one who, after the establishment of fire limits, obtains from the municipal authorities, by mere resolution, a permit to tear down an existing wooden building and erect a new one within the fire limits, cannot complain of the revocation of his permit on his failure, without sufficient reason, to subscribe, as required by the permit, to a condition therein against obstructing the sidewalk.

might be exercised. In any instance, if the granting of a license would be detrimental to the public health, or contrary to regulations already established, then it would not be issued. If the statute had given to the boards of health of cities a general authority similar to that conferred by Pub. Stat. 1882, chap. 80, § 10, it might be that they lawfully could make the violation of their regulations a sufficient ground for revoking the privilege, and could issue it upon such a condition. Young v. Blaisdell, supra; Grand Rapids v. Brady, 105 Mich. 670, 677, 678, 32 L. R. A. 116, 55 Am. St. Rep. 472, 64 N. W. 29. At least, it could be said that the licensee then would take it subject to this reservation; and, having agreed to its terms, no injustice would be done by a subsequent cancellation. Generally, under statutes regulating the conduct of certain kinds of employment or of business which require the protection of a license before they can be lawfully prosecuted, the penalty of forfeiture is dealt with either by conferring express authority to revoke for violations upon the licensing board or some other tribunal, or else a general power is delegated, under which such a clause may be inserted in the license itself. Rev. Laws, chap. 100, §§ 15, 47, 89, chap. 102, §§ 9, 28, 29, 33, 58, 72; Grand Rapids v. Brady, supra. Upon application for permission to erect a stable, which, in the absence of a restricting statute, would be a legitimate improvement in the enjoyment of his property, the applicant is entitled to know the full measure of immunity that can be granted to him before making the expenditure of money required to carry out his purpose. A resort to the general laws relating to the subject, or to ordinances or regulations made pursuant to them, should furnish him with the required information. When this has been obtained, he has a right to infer that he can safely act, with the assurance that, so long as he complies with the requirements under which it is proposed to grant the privilege, he has a constitutional claim to protection, until the legislature further restricts, or entirely abolishes, the right bestowed. Com. v. Brennan, 103 Mass. 70; Com. v. Kinsley, 133 Mass. 578, 579; Hirn v. State, 1 Ohio St. 20, 21; Schwuchow v. Chicago, 68 Ill. 444; State, Lantz, Prosecutor, v. Hightstown, 46 N. J. L. 102, 107; Grand Rapids v. Brady, supra. Independently of this statute, while the board of health, under Pub. Stat. 1882, chap. 80, §§ 8, 12, after a hearing and on proper evidence, might have adjudged the defendant's building, when erected and occupied as a stable, detrimental to the public health, and therefore a nuisance, it had no jurisdiction to issue a license to him permitting and regulating such use except as authorized.

Com. v. Stodder, 2 Cush. 562, 48 Am. Dec. 679; Cambridge v. Munroe, 126 Mass. 496, 502; Com. v. Plaisted, 148 Mass. 375, 383, 2 L. R. A. 142, 12 Am. St. Rep. 566, 19 N. E. 224. It is the legislature alone that primarily can impose, or give authority to impose, conditions and exact forfeitures (State, Lantz, Prosecutor, v. Hightstown, supra; Dill. Mun. Corp. 3d ed. § 345, note 4, and cases cited); and the authority of the board as a governmental agent is commensurate with the provisions of the statute clothing it with this power. Abbott v. Frost, 185 Mass. 398, 400, 70 N. E. 478.

A licensee should not be subjected to the uncertainties that constantly would arise if unauthorized limitations, of which he can have no knowledge, are subsequently and without notice to be read into his license at the pleasure of the licensing board. Besides, all reasonable police regulations, enacted for the preservation of the public health or morality, where a penalty is provided for their violation, while they may limit or prevent the use or enjoyment of property except under certain restrictions, and are constitutional, create statutory misdemeanors, which are not to be extended by implication. Com. v. Beck, 187 Mass. 15, 72 N. E. 357.

The license issued to the defendant contained no limit of time for its exercise, nor was it made subject to an existing regulation which so provided. It stated that permission was given to keep eight horses, and purported to and did set out in full the statute under which it was granted, but contained no further recitals. Thus, neither by its terms, nor by the statute itself, was it made revocable; nor does it appear that any regulations had been adopted or promulgated the violation of which would cause a forfeiture. Originally it may have been improvidently issued, but upon being informed that citizens in the vicinity of the defendant's premises objected to the erection of the building for its proposed use, it was not within the power of the board of health, even after a hearing, in the absence of authority conferred upon them by legislative sanction, to deprive him of the privilege they had unreservedly granted. Com. v. Moylan, 119 Mass. 109, 111; Com. v. Kinsley, supra; New York v. Third Ave. R. Co. 33 N. Y. 42; Shuman v. Ft. Wayne, 127 Ind. 109, 11 L. R. A. 378, 26 N. E. 560; Hirn v. State; Grand Rapids v. Brady; and State, Lantz, Prosecutor, v. Hightstown, supra.

In the opinion of a majority of the court, the decree must be reversed, and a decree entered dismissing the bill, with costs.

So ordered.

MISSISSIPPI SUPREME COURT.

W. S. GORDON et al., Exrs., etc., of D. A. James, Deceased, Appts.,
v.

MARY E. JAMES et al.

(.... Miss.)

1. Dower—renunciation—right of widow.

The renunciation, by the widow, of the provision made for her in her husband's will, entitles her to her share of the estate after the debts are paid from the entire estate, under a statute providing that she shall be entitled to such part of the estate as she would have been entitled to if he had died intestate; and it does not make only the property going to her intestate, so as to throw the entire debts upon it.

2. Same—right to land.

A statutory provision that, in case a widow renounces the provision made for her in her husband's will, she may have the difference between her separate estate and what she would be entitled to in case of intestacy made up to her notwithstanding the will, does not deprive her of her rights in the separate parcels of property, and require her portion to be made up to her in money, where the further provision for the distribution of the estate declares that she shall have her lawful portions of the lands and her distributive share of the personality.

Case Note.—In determining whether specific legacies must be wholly applied to the payment of the testator's debts before resorting to lands specifically devised, the intent of the testator, where it can be ascertained, must govern. As is said by Chief Justice Marshall, in Finlay v. King, 3 Pet. 346, 7 L. ed. 701: "The intent of the testator is the cardinal rule in the construction of wills; and, if that intent can be clearly perceived, and is not contrary to some positive rule of law, it must prevail."

An intention that devisees and legatees shall contribute ratably to the payment of debts has been held to exist where the testator makes the debts a charge upon his real, as well as his personal, estate, or upon his estate generally; as is the case where he commences his will with a direction to pay debts. Shreve v. Shreve, 10 N. J. Eq. 385; Brant v. Brant, 40 Mo. 266. Contra, as to the latter portion of the foregoing statement, Miller v. Cooch, 5 Del. Ch. 161.

But, where the property not specifically disposed of, or expressly devoted to the payment of debts, proves inadequate, a case arises where the intention of the testator ceases to be a guide, since a situation presents itself which was manifestly not within his contemplation. Whether, in such a case, specific devisees should contribute, along with specific legacies, to make up the deficiency, is a question on which there is some conflict of authority. Those cases which are in accord with GORDON v. JAMES (for some of which, see citations therein) rest their decisions on the general rule that the personal estate is the primary fund for the payment of debts. See Shaw v. McBride, 56 N. C. (3 Jones, Eq.) 173; Baptist Female University v. Borden, 132 N. C. 476, 44 S. E. 47; Shreve v. Shreve, supra.

A contrary conclusion has been reached in a number of cases, among which are Maybury v. Grady, 67 Ala. 147, in which the authorities are elaborately reviewed, and Manlove v. Gaut, 2 Tenn. Ch. App. 410, in which it is said: "While the rule of law is general, that personality must be subjected before realty, it is clearly, also, a rule of law that the testator may, if he choose, entirely exonerate the personality, and subject the realty by the terms of his will. So, at 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

last, it is not so much a question of the application of the abstract rule of law above referred to, as an ascertainment of the testator's intention. That intention, as above stated, we think, is evidenced by his making specific bequests and specific devisees. He, in this manner, indicates a purpose on his part that both should be exonerated from debts. When that becomes impossible because of a deficiency of assets, it does not seem logical that we should resort to the dry rule of law above referred to; but, on the contrary, it does seem that we should sustain the testator's intention as far as possible. This can only be done by subjecting the specific legacies and specific devisees pro rata. In this manner, the testator's purpose of exoneration is as little interfered with as possible. On the other hand, if the personality covered by the specific bequest is wholly subjected to debts, the testator's purpose with regard thereto is entirely superseded. We are, therefore, of opinion that the specific devisees and specific bequests should contribute pro rata."

Another class of cases, reaching the same conclusion, is seemingly based on the equity principle that, where a person may resort to two funds, persons interested in the one to which he resorts may enforce contribution by the other. Of this class is Armstrong's Appeal, 63 Pa. 312, in which the court says: "It was settled in England, by Long v. Short, 1 P. Wms. 403, that specific devisees of land and specific bequests of personality must abate ratably in case of a deficiency of assets for the payment of the bond debts of the testator, because both lands and chattels were liable in law for those debts, and it was equally the intention of the testator that the legatee should have the chattel, and the devisee the land. 1 Roper, Legacies, 254. In this state, where lands have always been assets for the payment of debts by simple contract, as well as by specialty, the rule is general, that, wherever there is a deficiency of assets to pay both debts and legacies, specific devisees and specific legatees shall contribute proportionably."

This principle is, of course, inapplicable in cases where, as in GORDON v. JAMES, the law requires an exhaustion of the personal, before resort to the real, assets.

3. Decedent's estate—crops as assets.

Crops on the land at the time of the owner's death are assets for payment of debts, under a statute directing the executor to sell for cash such crops, and account for the proceeds as assets, notwithstanding his will may imply that they shall belong to the devisee; nothing short of an express direction will avoid the application of the statute.

4. Same—testamentary direction.

A testamentary direction as to the disposition of crops growing on the land in case testator's death shall occur within a specified year will cease to have any effect at the expiration of the year; and after that time the matter will be governed by the statute.

5. Same—dividends on securities.

Dividends on stocks and bonds, declared after the death of the owner, belong to the specific devisee of the stocks and bonds, and are not assets for the payment of the debts of the estate, in the absence of statutory direction to the contrary.

6. Same—contribution toward debts.

Specific devisees of land do not share with specific bequests of personalty, in contribution towards payment of the debts of the estate, where the statutes plainly indicate that the land is to stand charged only for such debts as the personalty may not be sufficient to pay.

7. Dower—renunciation—right of specific devisee of land.

A devisee of land, who, before the renunciation by the widow of the provisions of the will, has accepted the devise with the condition that he pay the encumbrance on the property, cannot compel the widow to share in the satisfaction of such encumbrance, but she will recover her share of the property free from the encumbrance; the doctrine of purchase for value not applying in favor of the devisee.

APPEAL by the executors of the will of D. A. James, deceased, from a decree of the Chancery Court for Yazoo County in a proceeding asking for the construction of the will and instructions as to distribution of the assets. Modified.

In addition to the facts set out in the opinion, it appeared that a provision of the will devised a plantation to T. W. James, "with the distinct understanding that the said T. W. James is to pay and assume any and all indebtedness due by me on account of purchase money of said place." This indebtedness was assumed by the devisee before the widow renounced the will, and he contended that that constituted him a purchaser for value of the plantation, so that the widow was not entitled to share in the portion so purchased.

Further facts appear in the opinion.

Messrs. Barnett & Perrin and Noel, Pepper, & Elmore for appellants.

Messrs. Campbell & Campbell for appellees.

Truly, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a proceeding instituted by appellants, as executors of the last will and testament of D. A. James, seeking a construction of that testament, and asking instructions from the chancery court as to the proper method to be adopted in distributing the assets of the estate. All devisees and legatees, and other parties in interest, were cited, and duly appeared as parties defendant.

The facts which rendered the action of the executors advisable and seemingly necessary are these: D. A. James, the testator, died on the 14th day of December, 1903, leaving a last will and testament, in which the appellants herein were nominated as executors. James left surviving him a widow and an only child, an infant of tender years, born since the date of the execution of the testament, but dealt with and provided for in a codicil thereto. At the date of his death the testator was seized and possessed of a large estate, consisting of three valuable plantations stocked with farming implements and work stock, one or more houses and lots, about 1,500 bales of cotton, a large amount of insurance on his life, stock in several banks and in many other enterprises, interests in mercantile establishments, jewelry, and other personalty. All of his property, without exception, was dealt with by the will, there being a general residuary clause. Most of it, and all of the more valuable portion, was either specifically devised or the subject of specific or demonstrative legacies. The will, executed over three years before the death of the testator, made no adequate provision for the payment of the debts. Hence, in entering upon the administration of the estate, it was evident to the executors that the property not specifically devised or bequeathed would be insufficient to pay in full the debts due by the testator. The widow, being dissatisfied with the provision made in her favor by the will in due time and in the manner pointed out by the statute, filed her formal renunciation of the will, and demanded the allotment of the portion granted her by the law. The agreed statement of facts admits that the separate estate of the widow did not amount in value to one fifth of what she would lawfully have been entitled to, and, as there was only one child, she claimed to be entitled to a one-half interest in the real and personal estate of her deceased husband. Upon final hearing the chancellor rendered a decree giving specific directions with regard to the distribution of the estate. Some of the provisions of the decree are not excepted to, and we will recite only such portions as are directly challenged by this appeal, and shall deal with them, not in the order of their presentation, but according to the magnitude of the property interests and the importance of the legal principle involved.

The first ground of error which we shall consider arises from the second paragraph of the decree, which is as follows:

"Second. It appearing that Mrs. Carrie W. James, the widow of said D. A. James, deceased, had renounced the provisions made for her under said will, and that the separate estate of said Carrie W. James was less than one fifth of what her legal portion of the estate of said D. A. James, deceased, would amount to, it is ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the said Carrie W. James be, and she is, entitled to receive one half of said estate after the payment of the debts and costs aforesaid, and said executors be, and they are hereby, ordered to turn the same over to said Carrie W. James in kind so far as the same can be done."

The facts disclosed by the record upon which this portion of the decree is based are uncontradicted. The widow, in pursuance of the provisions of § 4496 of the Revised Code of 1892, within six months of the probating of the will filed her renunciation thereof in the form indicated by the statute. It is admitted that the entire separate estate owned by the widow, which consisted exclusively of portions of the proceeds of certain insurance policies upon the life of her husband, taken out by him for her benefit, and collected by her after his death, and therefore, under the decision of this court in Osburn v. Sims, 62 Miss. 429, constituting a portion of her separate property, amounted in value to less than one fifth of what she would be entitled to by law in her husband's estate. It is conceded that D. A. James had only one child, and therefore the widow's lawful portion of her husband's property would be one half of the real and personal estate. It is contended by counsel for appellants that, inasmuch as the widow in this case renounced the provision made for her by the will of her husband, by operation of law her share of the property descends to her as heir, and coupled with all the burdens imposed by law as if her husband had died intestate as to this portion; and that the one half of the estate as to which the decedent died intestate is first liable to all the debts of the decedent, by operation of the general principle of law which renders property undisposed of by will, and which descends to the heir in cases of partial intestacy, primarily subject to sale for the satisfaction of the debts of the decedent before any of the property which has been disposed of by the testator can be devoted to that purpose. The argument is perfectly sound, but the existence of the premises is erroneously assumed. Section 4496 does not say, upon the renunciation of the will by the widow the decedent becomes "partially intestate," or "intestate as to a portion of his estate," but expressly recites that upon the filing of such renunciation the widow "shall be entitled to such part of his estate, real and personal, as she would have been entitled to if he had died intestate." If the decedent had died intestate in the instant case,—and by operation of the statute quoted so he did, so far as regards the rights of his widow,—the widow would have been entitled to one half of his real and personal estate under certain well-understood conditions and limitations. And they are not difficult of understanding. Upon the death of an intestate the estate, both real and personal, stands charged with the debts of the decedent,—the personal estate primarily; secondarily, when the personalty is exhausted, the real estate. After the payment of debts, an heir's lawful portion of the residue vests in the widow. This is the right of the appellee in this case. The widow's lawful portion of the residue under the facts of this record is an undivided one half. To adopt the argument of appellants that, by renouncing the provision made in the will, and demanding, in lieu thereof, her lawful portion in the estate of her husband, that thereby her share became chargeable with all of the debts of the decedent, might defeat the very end sought by the statute. In many instances, especially where the decedent leaves several children surviving him, the lawful portion of the widow in the estate would be entirely consumed in the payment of the debts due by the decedent, and thereby the widow either practically disinherited by the inadequate provision of the will, or absolutely so by having her portion devoted to the satisfaction of the creditors. Appellants endeavor to avoid the result of this consideration by the observation that it is not compulsory upon the widow to renounce the provision made for her, but that she is granted six months after the probating of the will to investigate the condition of the estate, and decide advisedly whether she will abide by the wish of her husband as expressed in his last will and testament, or, renouncing that, place herself under the protection of the law. Counsel evidently overlooked the fact that, while the renunciation is required to be made within six months after the probating of the will, debts due by the testator are not required to be registered or filed for probate until twelve months after publication for creditors; so that it might often be that an estate apparently solvent six months after the probate of the will would subsequently be shown to be deeply involved, and thus the widow be left destitute through a mere error of business judgment into which she had been entrapped by a misleading appearance of solvency. But a far weightier and more potential consideration is that the manifest intent of the legislature, as gleaned from all the statutory enactments bearing on this question, shows beyond peradventure that this privilege of renunciation was granted the widow so that she might be protected from possible injustice or misjudgment, and her proportionate interest in the residue of his estate not be at all dependent upon the whim or caprice of her husband. So, Rev. Code 1892, § 4497, provides that, if the will of the husband or wife shall not make any provision for the other, the survivor shall have the right to share in the estate of the deceased husband or wife as in case of unsatisfactory provision in the will; and in such case a renunciation of the will shall not be necessary, but the rights of the survivor shall be as if the will had contained a provision that was unsatisfactory, and it had been renounced. In such case, if the argument of counsel for appellants were sound, by the simple device of omitting all mention of his wife in his will any husband, if financially involved, could effectually disinherit his wife, or force her lawful portion of his estate to assume the entire burden of his indebtedness. For this reason, there being no provision made for her, and no renunciation of the will under such circumstances being required (because the law does not demand the doing of an idle thing), when the wife made a demand for her lawful share, and it was allotted to her, it would be consumed in the payment of the debts, under the principle already adverted to that it had not been dealt with, and was, therefore, liable to the debts of the decedent; thus bringing about, without the chance of escape or remedy by the disinherited wife, the very condition of affairs which the legislature wisely sought to prevent. We see nothing complex or involved in the beneficent legislative plan developed by the sections under review. It is this: The wife for whom in her husband's will an unsatisfactory provision is made, or for whom no provision is made, and who does not own separate property at the time of the death of her husband equal in value to what would be her lawful portion of her husband's real and personal estate, is at liberty to signify her dissent to the will; and, when she has done this, in the eyes of the law the decedent, so far as her rights are concerned, becomes an intestate, and her rights are fixed by the law, which would control if he had died in a state of total intestacy. Hence, after the debts are paid, she is entitled to her lawful portion in the residue of the estate, both real and personal, subject to the deduction which must be made therefrom, provided she owned at the date of the death, any separate property exceeding in value one fifth of her lawful portion in her husband's entire estate.

In the instant case, Mrs. Carrie W. James, by her act of renunciation, became entitled to a one-half interest in the real and personal estate of her deceased husband as if he had been an intestate. Therefore, when all of the debts of the estate have been fully paid, she will be entitled to her distributive share of one half of all the residue of the personal property, and will become a cotenant with each devisee, and own a half interest in each and every parcel of real estate specifically devised by her deceased husband. The contention that Rev. Code, § 4499, by making use of the expression that the widow may signify her dissent to the will and "claim to have the deficiency made up to her, notwithstanding the will," intends to convey the meaning that this deficiency between the value of her separate estate and her lawful portion in her husband's estate has to be "made up to her" in money, and that to this extent she becomes, not a tenant in common of the property, but a creditor of the estate, is manifestly unsound. The contrary intention is plainly disclosed by the clause of the section immediately following, which announces the rule whereby the court shall be governed in proceeding to make up the deficiency. That rule provides that she is to have a certain proportion of her "lawful portion of the lands" and her "distributive share of the personalty;" such interest being arrived at by a calculation based upon the relative value of her lawful portion of the estate as compared with the previously ascertained value of her own separate property. This is the interpretation which has been placed upon similar provisions in other states in the few cases which our research has disclosed. In Doyle v. Doyle, 50 Ohio St. 330, 34 N. E. 166, the view which we have above announced, after full discussion, is approved, and the court in that case quotes from Hartshorne v. Ross, 2 Disney (Ohio) 15, where it is said: "If he [the husband] die intestate, there is manifest propriety that she [the widow] should receive a liberal allowance; and, should he devise his estate without providing as generously for his widow as did the statutes, she should have the option to abide by the will or take her portion at law. The election to receive less than her legal allowance should be hers. . . . The husband executes his will subject to the law in force when it shall take effect; and, therefore, his devisees cannot complain. He might have cut off his heirs without any token of remembrance. Not so with his wife. Her right is paramount. It depends not upon his kindness, much less his caprice." And in Gupton v. Gupton, 3 Head, 490, speaking of a similar statute permitting renunciation of, or dissent from, the will, the court says: "It was intended to secure to her an election between the provision made for her by the will of her husband and the law of the land. It was intended that he should not have the power to deprive her of a just and proper share of an estate which she may have aided in building up. She has a right to stand upon the law and participate in his estate, whether he is willing or not. We will not defeat that right, and render this provision nugatory, unless we are compelled to do so." Re Taylor, 55 Ill. 252; Stokes v. O'Fallon, 2 Mo. 32; Arrington v. Dortch, 77 N. C. 387. We hold, therefore, that the decree of the chancellor was correct in deciding that appellee, Mrs. Carrie W. James, the widow, after the payment of all the debts of the estate, is a cotenant of the lands of the estate, and also entitled to her lawful portion and distributive share, —one half of the residue of the personalty.

The extent of the widow's interest as fixed by law being ascertained, it is next necessary to determine to what property her right is, by law, affixed. An answer to this inquiry requires, first, an ascertainment of what will constitute the residue of the estate of D. A. James. And this, in turn, necessitates a determination of the manner in which, under the law and the will of the testator, the different species of property and classes of legacies and devises forming the corpus of the estate are to be dealt with in the due administration of the estate, and the order in which they are to be applied to the payment of debts. And this brings us to the consideration of the next assignment of error. This assignment challenges the correctness of the propositions of law contained in the third and portions of the first and fifth paragraphs of the final decree herein. By the first paragraph, the executors were directed, in the payment of the debts and cost of administration of said estate, to "first exhaust all moneys which have come into their hands as the proceeds of notes, accounts, or moneys due the said D. A. James, deceased, individually, or due Peter James & Company; and, if the proceeds from this source shall be insufficient to pay said debts and cost of administration, said executors shall next use the proceeds of all property not specifically bequeathed or devised, including all bequests or devises made to Carrie W. James, the widow of said D. A. James, deceased, who has renounced the provision made for her under said will, and including any rents or shares of crops for the year 1903 which have come into the executors' hands; and, if the proceeds arising from the above two sources be insufficient to pay said debts and costs of administration, and it shall be necessary for the specific legacies and specific devises to abate, it is ordered that the said specific legacies and the said specific devises shall be abated proportionately to their actual value." The third paragraph of the decree recited "that the legatees who were left stocks or bonds upon which dividends have been paid to said executors are entitled to said dividends, to be distributed in accordance with the terms of this decree." And by the concluding clause of the fifth paragraph of the decree it was ordered that "the rents and shares of crops from said Stonewall plantation for the year 1903 shall go to the said executors as assets of said estate, to be used in the payment of debts in the manner provided in the first paragraph of this decree." The soundness of the ruling of the chancellor embodied in the first paragraph above recited, which undertakes to fix the character of assets upon the crops and rents of the year 1903, especially those flowing from the Stonewall plantation, is first assailed. It is contended by the devisees that the rents and crops pass with the land to the specific devisee, and do not become assets in the hands of the executors. It is further urged by T. W. James, to whom the Stonewall plantation was specifically devised, that, regardless of the general rule, the rents remaining uncollected, and the growing crops which were on that plantation ungathered at the date of the death of the testator, amounting, as the record shows, to 78 bales of cotton, passed absolutely with the devise of the plantation, for the reason that, by item 2 of the will, it is expressly recited that, "in case my death occurs before the 1st day of January, 1901, then and in that event the rents due from the said place for the year 1900 are to be paid to my executors." In this connection, we may also consider the next assignment of error, based upon the alleged error of law in the ruling of the chancellor in the third paragraph of the decree directing the dividends collected by the executors on the stocks and bonds specifically bequeathed to be paid to the legatees and distributed according to the terms of the decree. It is urged that such dividends are properly assets of the estate, and should have been appropriated by the executors to the payment of debts of the testator. In passing upon the questions presented by the recitals of the decree now under review, it becomes necessary to determine what, under our law, constitutes assets of a decedent. And this inquiry involves the necessity of an interpretation of the sections of the Code applicable to the subject. Rev. Code 1892, § 1881, provides: "The goods, chattels, personal estate, choses in action, and money of the deceased, or which may have accrued to his estate after his death from the sale of property, real or personal, or otherwise, and the rent of lands accruing during the year of his death, whether he died testate or intestate, shall be assets, and shall stand chargeable with all the just debts and funeral expenses of the deceased, and the expenses of settling the estate." And in § 1882 it is further provided that "the court or chancellor may, on the application of an executor or administrator, decree the sale of the crop growing at the time of the death of the testator or intestate, upon such terms and in such manner as may be deemed best." Section 1892 gives the executor authority to "sell for cash the cotton raised on the farm of the deceased, or any other commodity raised for market, and to account for the proceeds thereof as assets." Regardless of the rule which might have formerly prevailed, or which may now control in jurisdictions in which there has been neither modification nor regulation by express statute, either as to the mode to be followed in the distribution of estate, or as to what were formerly considered as assets, we now are governed by statutory provisions, and must first seek in them a definite and certain rule for our guidance. If the lawmaking power has spoken, the courts must obey, and confine themselves to a simple endeavor to effectuate the legislative intent as made manifest. Giving to the sections quoted their natural and usually accepted meaning, it is evident to our minds that the rents flowing from the lands of the testator, accruing during the year of his death, and the crops, remaining on the lands at the date of his death, whether gathered or still in the field, matured or unmatured, are alike considered assets of the decedent, whether testate or intestate, and, as such, pass into the hands of his legal representative, and constitute a portion of the primary fund which is liable for the payment of the debts of the decedent and the expenses of the administration of the estate. In the instant case we are of the opinion that the rents and the growing crops on all of the lands of the testator are to be considered as assets, and dealt with accordingly. Nor do we think any intention on the part of the testator to make a difference with reference to the rents or growing crops upon the Stonewall plantation definitely appears from the item quoted. The expression in that item referred solely and specially to the year 1900, and was only to control in the event of a certain contingency, namely, the death of the testator before January 1, 1901. What special reason the testator had for this provision nowhere distinctly appears. But probably, in view of the season of the year in which the will was executed, after the crops had all been planted, and were then growing, and the expenses of the year's planting operations already in a large manner incurred, it was inserted to prevent the possibility of a dispute or misunderstanding over the rents and crops for that year between his devisee and his executors. But, whatever the purpose, that expression was restricted in its application to the year 1900, and dependent for its operation upon the happening of an event which never in fact transpired. After the end of the year 1900, the will being silent, the statute law applied as well to the rents and crops grown upon the Stonewall plantation as to the other lands of the testator. Nothing short of the positive, unequivocal expression of the testator can avoid the application of the statute. There is no such expression in this will. We hold, therefore, that the chancellor was correct in ordering the rents and crops, including the 78 bales of cotton, gathered after the death of the testator upon the Stonewall plantation, to be delivered to the executors as assets of the estate. We also uphold as announcing the true rule the third paragraph of the decree, directing the dividends upon the stocks and bonds to be delivered to the specific legatees. This provision must, of course, under the facts of the instant case, have read into it the modifications that, first, these and all other specific legacies must suffer proportionate abatement, if necessary, as herein-after indicated; and, second, that the widow is entitled to one half the remainder of each specific legacy after the payment of debts; and this necessarily includes an equal proportional interest and share in the dividends. Of course, if any of the dividends had been earned and declared, but simply remained unpaid, prior to the death of the testator, they would have passed to the executors as assets of the estate. But we do not understand that the decree in this regard contravenes the rule announced; the inference being, from the language employed, that the dividends were not declared or fully earned until after the death of the testator. In such state of case, the rule is clearly and concisely stated in 1 Underhill on Wills, § 409: "A specific legacy of securities, as of shares, notes, or bonds, carries with it all accessions to it, or incidents of it, which have been created prior to the death of the testator. . . . The specific legatee of shares of stock is entitled to all dividends which have accrued down to the death of the testator as well as to those which subsequently accrue." See, as sustaining the text. Re Hodgman, 140 N. Y. 428, 35 N. E. 660; Bristow v. Bristow, 5 Beav. 289. A specific legacy is a gift, not only of the thing or fund itself, but of all its produce, from the time of the testator's death. Barrington v. Tristram, 6 Ves. Jr. 345, and note. A specific legacy is "a gift by will of a specific article or part of the testator's estate, which is identified and distinguished from all other things of the same kind, and which may be satisfied only by the delivery of the particular thing." Such legacies "carry any accessions that may accrue by way of increase or interest after the death of the testator." 18 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 714, and many citations. This being the generally approved rule, and not having been changed or modified by the express terms of plain intentment of the statute, we accept and adopt it as stated.

The next ruling of the chancellor, set forth in the concluding clause of the first paragraph of the decree above recited, assigned for error, is the requirement that, in the event the proceeds of all property not specifically devised or bequeathed should prove insufficient to pay the debts and costs of administration, so that it should become necessary for the specific legacies or the specific devises, or both, to be abated, so that the debts should be paid in full, "the said specific legacies and said specific devises shall abate proportionately to their actual value." This presents for our consideration the question, never before expressly adjudicated by the courts of this state, whether a specific devise of land stands upon the same plane, and is to be controlled by the same principle, as a specific bequest of chattels. Again referring for our guidance to the statutory provision as contained in the Code, we find there plain recognition of the general principle that the personal estate of the decedent is the primary fund to which creditors must first look for the satisfaction of their debts. The last clause of § 1881 provides: "The lands of the testator or intestate shall also stand chargeable for the debts and such expenses over and above what the personal estate may be sufficient to pay, and may be subjected thereto in the manner hereinafter directed." By § 1893 an executor is granted authority, when he shall discover that the personal property will not be sufficient to pay the debts and expenses, to "file a petition in the chancery court for the sale of the land of the deceased, or so much of it as may be necessary; and exhibit to the court a true account of the personal estate and debts due from the deceased, and the expenses and description of the land to be sold." And even then, after the insufficiency of the personal estate has become apparent to the executor, no valid final action can be taken on the petition until the heirs and devisees and all other parties in interest are duly cited to appear and contest, if they so desire. Upon the hearing, it is only in the event the court is "satisfied that the personal estate is insufficient to pay the debts of the deceased, and that the lands ought to be sold for that purpose," that it is lawful to render a decree for a sale of a part or the whole of the lands. And in such case, where a portion of the lands have been sold after due observance of all the statutory requirements, "the heir or devisee whose lands shall be sold may compel all others holding or claiming under such intestate or testator to contribute in proportion to their respective interest so as to equalize the burden of the loss;" thus recognizing the doctrine of forced contribution among devisees. The personal estate of the testator is first liable for sale for the payment of his debts. When the decedent dies intestate, it must be conceded that, except in special cases, provided for by § 1900, where the interest of all parties make it advisable, the entire personal estate must be exhausted before, even by recourse to the courts, any portion of the lands can be sold and the proceeds devoted to that purpose. The reason for this distinction between personalty and land is obvious, and is still recognized in our jurisprudence. The personalty, upon the death of the owner, passes to the administrator; the title to the land vests at once in his heir. If this be the rule, and the order in which property must be applied to the liquidation of the debts of an intestate, we see nothing in the statute to warrant the conclusion that the legislature intended to adopt a different order in the case of a man dying testate. If the testator devise and bequeath, by general terms, his entire estate unless the will contains evidence of a manifest intent on his part to commingle land and personalty, the personal estate must, as in case of intestacy, be first exhausted, before any portion of the lands can be used. In the case of Cady v. Cady, 67 Miss. 425, 7 So. 216, speaking of pecuniary legacies which were chargeable upon the estate of the testator, this court, advertent to the diversity of opinion which exists in this and other instances where courts seek to discover the intention of the testator from the language he employs, and recognizing that the sole difficulty is in discovering that intent, which, when once ascertained, must be strictly followed, says: "Ordinarily, pecuniary legacies are payable by the executor, and out of the personal estate. The claim of the heir at law, or of the devisee, is ordinarily as much in the mind of the testator as that of the legatee, and, unless a contrary purpose appears from the will, it will be assumed that the testator intended that legacies are to be paid only out of his personal estate, and, that, upon that being insufficient, the legacies must abate in whole or in part." See Knotts v. Bailey, 54 Miss. 238, 28 Am. Rep. 348; Heatherington v. Lewenberg, 61 Miss. 376.

Is there any valid distinction on which to base a logical differentiation between a case of a general legacy not charged on the land and one where the entire estate is disposed of by specific legacies and specific devises? We can see no logical ground on which to base a distinction or a difference. In the case of a general legacy or bequest not charged on the realty, in an estate in which the land and personalty were not commingled by the testator, if necessary for the payment of debts, the general legacy would have to abate, even to the extent of obliteration, before any deduction could be made from the devise. And, unless we expect to overrule and repeal by silently ignoring the provision of our statute, which provides that no part of the landed estate shall be sold for the payment of debts except upon the insufficiency of the personal estate, we must adhere to the same rule. To uphold this portion of the decree of the chancellor, and to require in the instant case that the specific devises shall abate proportionately with the specific bequests, would be tantamount to ordering a sale of a portion of the land, not on account of the insufficiency of, but in order to protect, the personal estate from sale, because it is evident that every dollar which the devisees are required to pay in order to protect the lands specifically devised to them is simply the levying of a tribute upon the real estate before the personalty has been exhausted. This would be accomplishing by indirection that which the plain letter of the law forbids the court to do directly. If the executors filed a petition asking a decree for the sale of any portion of the lands as a condition precedent to the lawful rendering of such decree, it would be necessary for them to aver, and show to the satisfaction of the court, that the personalty had either been exhausted, or was insufficient to pay the debts. Yet in the instant case we are asked to apply a portion of the value of the lands to the payment of the debts, not because there is no personalty out of which the debts can be collected, but in order to protect and preserve the personalty itself. We announce our conclusion on 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

this point while duly mindful of the fact that the courts of many jurisdictions have adopted the contrary view, and require a proportionate abatement of specific legacies and specific devises as if they were all of the same class. We are constrained to adhere to what seems inescapably to be the manifest legislative plan for the distribution of estates, leaving the wisdom and justice of the scheme to the consideration of the legislative department, which alone had authority to inaugurate it, and is alone, in the absence of an expressed intent on the part of the testator, vested with power to change or modify it. We are strengthened in our view by the consideration that in the instant case, as to the widow, the decedent died wholly intestate. Her rights, therefore, are fixed by the letter of the law, which requires the personal estate to be first exhausted before any part of the land can be sold for the satisfaction of debts. The widow is entitled to one half the residue of the personalty. That residue can only be known after all debts and costs of administration have been paid. Nor are her rights to, or the extent of her interest in, the lands of the estate complicated by any consideration of the legal rights of devisees and specific legatees. She is neither, but inherits as the forced heir of an intestate. As such, under no conceivable view of the law, can she be forced to abate or reduce her share of, or interest in, the lands. If the decree undertakes to deal with her legal rights, it is palpably violative of the statute. If her interest in the estate be exempted from its operation, the decree affords no definite rule by which any computation of the rights of the various parties can be accurately made, as it involves two contradictory methods of raising money to liquidate the debts of the estate,—one the statutory method of devoting the personalty to that purpose, the other requiring the devisees of the realty to contribute proportionately to that end.

In our judgment, the view we have indicated, that, in every instance, save, only, when a contrary desire on the part of the testator is plainly evinced by his will, the personalty constitutes the primary fund for the payment of debts, and must be first exhausted, can alone preserve in its fullness and integrity the legislative scheme devised for the administration and distribution of estates, and at the same time harmonize with the previous adjudications of this court. Any other rule would result in endless confusion, wrought alone by the proportion which the debts of the testator might bear to the value of his estate. The will of the testator is the supreme law. That being silent, or not showing a contrary desire, the statute will control.

But, aside from these deductions drawn from, and in our opinion warranted by, the language of our statutes, the conclusion we have reached that the doctrine of forced contribution does not apply against specific devisees in favor of specific legatees (as by the statute it does among devisees), but that specific legacies must be first obliterated before specific devises can be abated, is not, as a general proposition of law, without the support of eminent authority. Says the court in Elliott v. Carter, 9 Gratt. 548: "That the devisee of real estate not charged with the payment of debts is entitled to have the assets marshaled against the claimants of the other funds of the estate in the order stated, including specific legatees, is well settled by the authorities. 2 Jarman, Wills, 601; Clifton v. Burt, 1 P. Wms. 678; Forrester v. Leigh, 1 Ambl. 171; Scott v. Scott, 1 Eden, 458; Keeling v. Brown, 5 Ves. Jr. 359; Mirehouse v. Scaife, 2 Myl. & C. 695. . . . This exemption of real estate devised extends as well to the case of a deficiency of personal assets for the payment of legacies as of debts; the legatees having no right to call upon the devisee to contribute to the payment of their legacies unless the real estate be expressly charged. Hayes v. Seaver, 7 Me. 2; Jarman, Wills, 547, note." In Rogers v. Rogers, 1 Paige, 188, it is said: "Where the will of the testator contains no directions as to the payment of debts, chattels specifically bequeathed must be applied to the payment of a judgment against a testator before resort is had to the real estate devised." In a case where, as in the instant case, the payment of debts is charged by the testator, or, by operation of law, upon the personalty, the order of application is thus stated: "The personal property at large is first to be applied to the payment of debts, and when legacies are to be used to pay debts the first liable is the residuary legacy (2 Lomax, Exrs. 126), and the next are the general pecuniary legacies, then the specific legacies, and lastly the real estate devised by the will. Edmunds v. Scott, 78 Va. 729." See also 19 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 1316, and citations; 4 Kent Com. §§ 420 et seq.; 1 Story, Eq. Jur. § 577; Shreve v. Shreve, 10 N. J. Eq. 385; Shaw v. McBride, 56 N. C. (3 Jones, Eq.) 173; Magruder v. Carroll, 4 Md. 351; Brill v. Wright, 112 N. Y. 129, 8 Am. St. Rep. 717, and note, 19 N. E. 628. We hold, therefore, that it was error in the chancellor to decree that the specific devises of lands should abate proportionately to their value in the same manner as specific legacies. The true rule is that, upon an insufficiency of the personal estate, which is primarily liable to the debts, the specific bequests must abate proportionately, even to the extent of complete destruction, before the devisees to whom lands have been specifically devised can be called upon to contribute.

The conclusion reached upon these points renders consideration of other minor assignments of error unnecessary.

To prevent all possibility of misunderstanding upon a remand of this case, we recapitulate: The estate should be dealt with as follows: All of the assets in the hands of the executors, including the proceeds of the rents of all the lands for the year 1903 and the 78 bales of cotton gathered after the death of the testator on the Stonewall plantation, together with the other assets mentioned in paragraph 1 of the decree of the chancellor, are to be devoted to the payment of the debts of the decedent and the expenses of the administration of the estate. Should these be insufficient to a complete liquidation of all the debts of the estate, the specific legacies should abate proportionately, and, in the event these be exhausted, and there still remain any debts unpaid, the specific devises of land must contribute proportionately to the payment of the debts remaining. After all debts have been fully paid, the widow, Mrs. Carrie W. James, will be entitled to receive one half the residue of the personalty of the estate, and will be cotenant to the extent of an undivided one-half interest in all the lands of the estate. In ascertaining the interest of the widow in the Stonewall plantation, no account is to be taken of the unpaid purchase money due thereon. That debt constitutes no part of the indebtedness due by the D. A. James estate, having been by the express terms of the will affixed as a burden to the devise to T. W. James, and having been by him assumed before the renunciation by the widow, Mrs. Carrie W. James is the owner of an undivided one-half interest in the Stonewall plantation, with work stock, farming implements, etc., thereon, free of any encumbrance by reason of the unpaid purchase money due thereon. T. W. James, as to the Stonewall plantation, with the work, stock, farming implements, etc., thereon, in no sense occupies the position of a purchaser for value. The doctrine invoked applies only to cases where bequests or devises are made in lieu of lawful debts or demands which the recipient holds against the decedent, and which he releases by reason thereof. Pom. Eq. Jur. § 1142. The language of the clause of the will carrying the devise clearly evinces the intention and desire of the testator that the specific devisee shall take cum onere. This exonerates the personalty from its primary liability. 1 Underhill, Wills, § 384. T. W. James occupies no higher or better position than other specific devisees and legatees. All are alike mere recipients of the testator's bounty.

Decree modified and cause remanded to be proceeded with in accordance with the views herein expressed. Costs of this appeal to be taxed against the executors, appellants.

MISSISSIPPI SUPREME COURT.

SIDNEY JOHNSON, Appt.,

v.

KITTY LOU WALKER.

(.... Miss.)

1. Bastardy—dismissal—res judicata.

A dismissal, without prejudice, of a bastardy proceeding instituted before a justice of the peace, is no bar to a subsequent proceeding before another justice upon the same charge.

2. Same—venue.

A defendant may be tried in a bastardy proceeding by a justice of the peace in a district other than that of his residence, upon an affidavit made before still another justice, under a statute providing that the mother may make complaint before any justice of the peace of the county.

3. Same—pleading—closing issue.

The issue in a bastardy proceeding is properly made up when the affidavit and declaration charging defendant with being the father of the child are traversed by an affidavit filed by him.

4. Same—child in court.

Merely bringing the child into the court room in a bastardy proceeding is not reversible error, if it is immediately removed without the attention of the jury being called to it, or any reference to it being made in the presence of the jury.

5. Evidence—declarations during travail.

Declarations of the mother of a child, made during travail, as to its paternity, are admissible in support of her testimony in a bastardy proceeding.

6. Same—denial of pregnancy.

The exclusion, in a bastardy proceeding,

Case Note.—That the rule that a former judgment will not operate as a bar to a subsequent suit, unless it was upon the merits, is applicable to bastardy proceedings, as held in JOHNSON v. WALKER, seems to be uncontroverted.

A dismissal on account of the failure of the relator to appear is not a bar. State ex rel. Sumpter v. Barbour, 17 Ind. 526.

Nor is a dismissal for want of jurisdiction. State v. Giles, 103 N. C. 391, 9 S. E. 433; Lynn v. State, 84 Md. 67, 35 Atl. 21.

Nor the quashing of an indictment based on the former proceedings. Neff v. State, 57 Md. 385.

of evidence that complainant denied, up to the date of her confinement, that she was pregnant, is not error.

7. Same—cumulative.

Exclusion of testimony which is but a repetition of what has previously been admitted without objection is not reversible error.

8. Same—elicited by complainant.

A party cannot complain of the admission of evidence in response to his own questions.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Tate County in plaintiff's favor in a bastardy proceeding. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. W. J. East for appellant.

Mr. J. F. Dean, for appellee:

Accusations of the defendant during the travail of the mother may be shown in corroboration of her evidence.

Houston, Special Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a proceeding under chapter 15, Code 1892, by appellee against appellant. On August 16, 1904, appellee, a single woman, resident in Tate county, was delivered of a child therein. The next day she made affidavit before J. H. Wallace, a justice of the peace of district No. 5 of said county, under § 249, Code 1892, alleging that appellant was its father. On the return day she appeared before Wallace, withdrew the affidavit, and dismissed her suit; the judgment reciting that the dismissal was "without prejudice." On the same day she made another affidavit before McKinnon, justice of the peace of district No. 3, taken before to determining whether or not there is probable cause for holding the defendant to appear before another court, a discharge by him is no bar to a subsequent proceeding. Marston v. Jenness, 11 N. W. 571; Re Parker, 44 Kan. 279, 24 Pac. 338. Contra, State ex rel. Dilworth v. Braun, 31 Wis. 600; which is criticized and disapproved in State ex rel. Ortloff v. Linton, supra.

C. P. Varner, another justice of the peace of district No. 4 of said county, and he issued his warrant upon it. On the return day thereof, appellant made a motion to dismiss the case because of the above facts, alleging and proving, also, that defendant below was a householder and resident of district No. 5. This motion being overruled, Varner, after trial, required him to give bond for his appearance in the circuit court. In the circuit court, plaintiff below filed her declaration. Defendant renewed his motion, which being overruled, he traversed the allegations of said declaration. Trial being had upon the merits, the jury returned a verdict for $1,000. Judgment was entered thereon, ordering defendant to pay said sum at once, or to execute his bond for $1,000 payable to the state, to pay on the 1st day of January, 1905, and annually thereafter, for nine years, the sum of $100 for the support and education of said child, etc. After motion for new trial was overruled, defendant prosecuted this appeal.

We think the motion to dismiss was properly overruled. That the dismissal "without prejudice," before Wallace, justice of the peace, did not bar the appellee from instituting another suit, and was not res judicata, is settled by Wilson v. May Pants Co. (Miss.) 37 So. 813. Counsel for appellant cites 3 Enc. Pl. & Pr. p. 300, to the effect that an adjudication in this proceeding is a bar to a subsequent prosecution on the same charge; but the very authority adds this. "But it seems that, unless the judgment is on the merits, it cannot be pleaded in bar,"—and cites decisions of several states, and they and the footnotes fully sustain the proposition that it is not a bar unless the case is tried on its merits. See also footnotes to 5 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 674; Mooney v. People, 96 Ill. App. 622; and Weatherford v. Weatherford, 56 Am. Dec. 221, note (20 Ala. 548).

Justice of the Peace Varner had authority to issue the warrant and jurisdiction to try the case, even though the affidavit was made before the justice of the peace of another district, and the defendant was a householder and resident in neither of their districts. Section 2395, Code 1892, has no application to this character of proceedings. Chapter 15, Code 1892, is sui generis. Section 249 thereof provides that the mother can make complaint before any justice of the peace of the county where she may be delivered, etc. No affidavit and no written complaint is expressly required by the statute. But, even if an affidavit were required, it can be made before a justice of the peace other than the one who issues the warrant and tries the case. Code 1892, § 934; 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Mooney v. People, 96 Ill. App. 622; 3 Enc. Pl. & Pr. pp. 296-298.

As to an issue not being made up, even if there is any necessity for a formal issue or formal pleadings, other than the denial by defendant of the charge (as it is said there is not in the last two authorities cited), the issue was properly made up in the instant case, within the contemplation of § 252, Code 1892. The affidavit and declaration of the plaintiff were filed, alleging that the defendant was the father of the child, and the defendant filed his affidavit in the circuit court, traversing this allegation. Besides, defendant went to trial on this issue, without making objection until after judgment in his motion for a new trial.

The assignment of error as to the child being brought into court is untenable. There is diversity of opinion as to whether the child may not be exhibited before the jury for their inspection as evidence in the case to show its resemblance to defendant, by comparing the features and appearance of the two, and as to whether counsel may not draw attention to and comment on this resemblance. Among others, the states of Iowa, North Carolina, and Massachusetts permit this to be done. See Hanawalt v. State, 64 Wis. 84, 54 Am. Rep. 589, 24 N. W. 489; Scott v. Donovan, 153 Mass. 379, 26 N. E. 871. We are not called upon in this case to express any opinion as to which is the better and sounder doctrine, as this record shows affirmatively that, as soon as the mother brought the child into the court room, plaintiff's counsel directed plaintiff's father, in an undertone, to have it removed, which was done by plaintiff's sister, who was only about 30 feet away; that the child was in the presence of the jury for only about two minutes; that no protest of the child was made to the jury, and none offered to be made; nor was any reference to the baby made by counsel in the presence and hearing of the jury, and no attention called to it in any way. The authorities are uniform on the proposition that this does not constitute error,—certainly not reversible error. In Hutchinson v. State, 19 Neb. 266, 27 N. W. 114, the mother held the child in her arms in plain view of the jury during the entire time that she was testifying as a witness, to which due objection and exception was taken. The court said, inter alia: "It must be apparent to any mind that the mere presence of the child could have no prejudicial effect upon the rights of plaintiff in error."

Nor do we think that the admission of the evidence as to the declaration made by complainant during travail, relative to the paternity of the child, constituted reversible error. This question has never been adjudicated by this court. The decisions are not uniform as to the admissibility of such declarations; but the better doctrine seems to be that they are admissible for the purpose of corroborating her evidence. 5 Cyc. Law & Proc. pp. 660, 661, while saying that "declarations of prosecutrix tending to corroborate her testimony are generally inadmissible," immediately adds "accusation of defendant during her travail may, however, be shown in corroboration of her evidence;" citing cases. See also Benton v. Starr, 58 Conn. 285, 20 Atl. 450; Harty v. Malloy, 67 Conn. 339, 35 Atl. 259; Scott v. Donovan, 153 Mass. 378, 26 N. E. 871; Robbins v. Smith, 47 Conn. 182; Reed v. Haskins, 116 Mass. 199. Wigmore, who is recognized as one of the highest authorities on the subject of Evidence, in his valuable new book says: "There is no reason why this should not be the general rule." And this, on common-law principles. 2 Wigmore, Ev. § 1141, p. 1340. While the text of 2 Encyclopedia of Evidence, p. 244, cited in the able and exhaustive brief of counsel for appellant, seems to deny the competence of such evidence, yet, in the note thereto (pp. 245, 246), it uses this language: "The mother is a competent witness to show, in corroboration of her testimony, that in the time of her travail she accused the defendant of being the father of the child." Also, that "declarations of the complainant, made during travail, as to the paternity of the child, are admissible in corroboration of her testimony." Counsel in his brief says: "The doctor could not tell what she said;" and cites Weatherford v. Weatherford, 56 Am. Dec. 219, note (20 Ala. 548), and Eddy v. Gray, 4 Allen, 435. These cases only hold that the declarations which the attending physician made to her during travail relative to her condition or peril are inadmissible. They do not apply to what she might have said to him. In the instant case the record does not show that Dr. Orr said anything whatever to her about her condition or peril. He asked her how long she was going to stick to the fact that it was Sidney Johnson. She replied, "Until I die."

It follows that instruction No. 4, given the plaintiff, was not error. It only tells the jury that it may consider the declaration of plaintiff, that defendant was the father of the child, in connection with all the other testimony in the case, and give it such weight as they may deem proper. Nor do we think that § 257, Code 1892, militates against, or excludes, the conclusion that such declarations are admissible. By its express language that section purports to deal with, and as a matter of fact only and merely deals with, the admissibility, after or "when the mother is dead," of her declarations in her travail, and was simply intended to extend the doctrine of admissibility to the period after her death, and, in the contingency that she should die, and to provide that, in the event of such a contingency, they might, if proved to be her dying declarations, be received in evidence, not as corroborative merely, but as original substantive evidence, when the trial of the case occurred after her death. It left the question as to their admissibility when she was living at the time the case was tried, just as it was before its passage. Without this statute, the mother's deathbed declarations as to the paternity of the child were generally held to be inadmissible. 5 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 661, note. The sole and only object of the statute was to extend the doctrine as to dying declarations to such declarations of the mother in bastardy proceedings, and to place beyond controversy their admissibility, not merely as corroborative, but as original and substantive evidence.

In our opinion the testimony of Mrs. Perkins that appellee, during her travail, told witness that appellant was the father of her child, was admissible. This being so, the jury already having before it this competent evidence as to that statement, we are unable to see from this record how the subsequent testimony of Dr. Orr and Mrs. Florence Walker, the mother of appellee, relative to this same matter and only cumulative, could operate so prejudicially upon the rights of defendant with the jury as to warrant us in reversing this case. The court expressly instructed the jury, at defendant's request, that they should carefully weigh and consider with great caution these statements, made by the plaintiff, as to who was the father of the child, and that such statements and declarations, made by the plaintiff, in the absence of the defendant and without his knowledge or sanction, are not binding upon him, and cannot affect his interest; and further instructed them "that they should also carefully weigh the plaintiff's evidence," as "this is a case where the charge is easy to fabricate and difficult to defend." By these instructions the declarations complained of became almost as "fangless serpents and shorn Sampsons," so far as being able to work harm to defendant was concerned. At least these cautionary instructions, with others, were quite as liberal to the defendant as he was entitled to, and must have minimized the effect of this corroborative evidence.

We find no reversible error in the other exceptions to the ruling of the court on the evidence. Even if appellee did deny, up to the date of her confinement, that she was enceinte, or that she had ever had criminal conversation with any man, this was but natural, and what every young girl of eighteen years would have done, as every juror of any intelligence would know; and its exclusion could not be prejudicial error. The evidence fails to show any such criminal relations, and the verdict of the jury settles that there were none at the period of conception. Nor was the exclusion of the testimony of defendant that he and plaintiff never renewed their engagement to marry after it was canceled during Christmas of 1902. He had previously sworn to this before the jury without objection, and also afterwards, and thereby secured the benefit of it. Besides, he expressly admits that they were engaged about two or three years before October, 1904, and that he visited her often for several years, and still continued to visit her "about like he had before this engagement was canceled." He further admits that he was with the appellee alone at night, at the very times, places, and under the circumstances detailed by her as being the times and places when he, after having previously failed to subdue her chastity, as she swears, under promise of marriage, persuaded her to yield to him, polluted her prior chastity, blasted her honor and hope, and blighted her future happiness and life. As is so often the case, her love for him seemed too strong for her virtue, as it is often too strong for law and morality. And these times were at, or very near, the proper period of conception according to the ordinary course of nature with respect to the birth of the child; and there was no evidence that the period of her gestation was extraordinary or unusual. In fact he admits nearly every material fact and circumstance testified to by her, except the actual acts of intercourse. McClellan v. State. 66 Wis. 335, 28 N. W. 347, was a strikingly similar case to the instant one. The court there said that the defendant had been alone with her on occasions which he admitted, and had driven home with her several times late at night. This evidence and these circumstances corroborate the testimony of complainant, and we cannot say that the jury were not warranted in finding defendant guilty beyond a reasonable doubt. It was only material that defendant had intercourse with her at or near the proper time which, in the course of nature, might have made him the father of the child. The complainant was only eighteen years old, and she would not at all likely become a willing or swift witness against an innocent man. Cold, wilful, and corrupt perjury would not be likely to reside in the tender and untutored nature of such a young girl.

fact that she had appellant arrested, charging him with seduction, and that the jury must have considered this in determining upon their verdict, this record shows that appellant's counsel himself asked appellee this very question on cross-examination; and, although appellee's counsel objected, and the court sustained the objection, appellant's counsel, without reserving an exception, continued to question her in regard to it without further objection from counsel for appellee or further ruling by the court. Under such circumstances we fail to see how appellant can now successfully or consistently complain of this.

As to the other exceptions to the evidence respecting the conduct of this once spotless and stainless, but now sorrow-stricken, disgraced, and deflowered young girl, the "glass of whose virginity" was broken by this appellant (as she swears, and as the jury has found) before the bud of girlhood could bloom or blossom into the beautiful flower of Southern womanhood, and whose honor and happiness are ruined and wrecked and lost forever, we content ourselves with quoting and commending the language of that great jurist (Wm. L. Harris), in his opinion found in Anonymous, 37 Miss. 58: "The interests of justice do not require it, nor is the good of society promoted, by permitting the errors of a woman's whole life (perhaps sorely repented of by her, though never forgiven by the community) to be dragged from her own lips, and perpetuated in judicial history, for the mere gratification of her seducer. It is a sufficient stigma upon the age that, while it consigns to unattonable infamy the inexperienced victim who has yielded herself to his gratification, he bears no part in public estimation, or at least a very inconsiderable one, in the degradation, ruin, and lifelong wretchedness he has produced. The state has a deep interest in the equality of punishments, as well as the inducements to reformation, in cases of this character; and the disparity of suffering and inequality in social position, already existing, should neither be augmented nor countenanced by tribunals established to administer justice." We think that the court was sufficiently liberal to the appellant in regard to permitting evidence as to the conduct and character of appellee in this case.

We find no reversible error in the action of the learned lower court, in the modification of the instructions asked by defendant, or in granting those requested by the plaintiff. Instruction No. 6, granted the plaintiff, was in the very language of § 258, Code 1892, and was correct. Even if instruction No. 3, given for the plaintiff, was error (as we do not think it was), it was cured by the very liberal charges given for the defendant, especially charge No. 1, relating to the same phase of the case. Scarver v. State, 53 Miss. 406; Skates v. State, 64 Miss. 644, 60 Am. Rep. 70, 1 So. 843. Even in a murder charge an erroneous instruction for the prosecution will not cause the reversal of a death sentence, if the instructions for the accused so clearly explain the law that the jury cannot be misled. Nelson v. State, 61 Miss. 212.

On account of the commendable zeal and earnestness displayed by counsel for appellant in behalf of his client, and the importance of our decision to all parties concerned, we have given an even and unusually careful consideration to this case; but the consideration has not resulted in our being able to affirm that the right result has not been reached by the jury, and that the same result would not inevitably be reached on a new trial, which would necessitate a rehearing and a rehashing of the harrowing and not morally healthy details of this most unfortunate case, without any corresponding good, so far as we are able to judge, after looking back over a completed trial and carefully scanning and conning this record. The testimony is conflicting, the jury has passed upon these controverted questions of fact, and, in view of our inability to say that it was unwarranted in arriving at the conclusion evidenced by its verdict, or that it is manifest from the whole record that its finding is clearly wrong, we feel constrained to let the verdict and judgment stand. Kansas City, M. & B. R. Co. v. Cantrell, 70 Miss. 329, 12 So. 344; Yazoo & M. Valley R. Co. v. Williams, 67 Miss. 18, 7 So. 279; McAlexander v. Puryear, 48 Miss. 420; Mississippi C. R. Co. v. Mason, 51 Miss. 234; Buckingham v. Walker, 48 Miss. 609.

NEBRASKA SUPREME COURT.

THOMAS BAKER, Plff. in Err.,

v.

PETER A. McDONALD.

(.... Neb.)

1. Sale—change of title.

The general rule is that, when the terms Headnotes by DUFFIE, C.

Case Note.—The question as to the right of the seller to property which has been taken out of his possession by fraud under color of purchase was involved in Sisson v. Hill, 18 R. I. 212, 21 L. R. A. 206, 26 Atl. 196, where it was held that, if the sale was induced by fraud, replevin might be brought by the seller to recover back the property without first returning the money which had been received on the contract; and that the 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

of sale of personal property have been agreed on, and the bargain is struck, and everything the seller has to do with the goods is complete, the contract of sale becomes absolute as between the parties without actual payment or delivery, and the property and the risk of accident to the goods vest in the buyer.

2. Same—payment of price.

Where the time of payment is not fixed by the contract of the sale, the law presumes a cash sale; and, while title may have passed to the buyer, he is not entitled to possession until the full purchase price has been paid or tendered.

3. Same—measurement—fraud.

Where the amount to be paid is to be determined by measurement of the property, to be made by the parties, a measurement which is grossly unfair, as the result of fraud or mistake, is not binding, and a tender based thereon does not entitle the purchaser to possession.

4. Same—replevin.

Where the property has been set apart and identified, and title has been vested in the purchaser, who has paid part of the purchase price; but, because of fraud or mistake in the measurement, his tender of the balance due is not sufficient in amount,—the seller may recover possession of the property from the purchaser by an action in replevin, on the ground of special ownership and right of possession; but he cannot maintain such action under the claim of absolute ownership without rescinding the contract of sale and tendering back the amount paid.

ERROR to the District Court for Dodge County to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover possession of certain hay. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the Commissioner's opinion.

Messrs. John P. Breen and C. E. Abbott, for plaintiff in error:

Where the vendor brings an action for the rescission of the sale, he must return, or offer to return, whatever of consideration he has received upon the sale.

Tootle v. First Nat. Bank, 34 Neb. 863, 52 N.W. 396; Phenix Iron Works Co. v. McEvony, 47 Neb. 228, 53 Am. St. Rep. 527, 66 N. W. 290.

If the vendor delivers without getting the cash, he cannot replevin the property.

Question as to what, if anything, should be returned, could be determined on the trial of the case. On this question of the necessity of returning consideration before bringing replevin for property obtained by fraudulent purchase, the note to this case reviews the authorities, and states that most of the prior cases had held that a return of all that had been received on the contract of sale must be made, and the contract rescind-

Weighing or measuring in order to ascertain the amount to be paid at the price fixed in the bill of sale is not a part of the bill of sale at all, but is an independent agreement, and does not affect the passing of the title under the bill of sale eo instanti.

Duffie, C., filed the following opinion:

McDonald brought this action in replevin to recover from Baker certain hay, of which he claims to be the absolute owner. On a trial to the court without a jury, judgment went in his favor, and Baker has brought the case here on error. The parties entered into a contract relating to the hay in question, and signed the following memorandum:

Fremont, Neb., Oct. 9th, 1902.

This day I have sold to Thomas Baker thirty stacks of hay at $2.75 per ton in the stack, for which I have received $100.00. The hay is to be measured in the stack. This hay is to be moved off the ground before March 1st, 1903.

Thomas Baker.
P. A. McDonald.

There were more than 30 stacks in the field at the time the contract was made, and the particular stacks which Baker was to have were not set apart or designated; but it was understood that Baker might select them from the whole number in the field. Some time after the contract was made, and before the hay was measured, Baker, at the request of McDonald, made a further payment of $200, making $300 paid on the contract price. Baker was unable to be present in person when the hay was measured, but was represented by a man of his own selection, who participated in that part of the transaction. The measurement was made of 31 stacks, instead of 30; but of this no complaint is made by Baker. Baker took the figures of the measurements with him to Omaha, and after some delay made a computation, and found, as he claims, that the stacks contained 112 tons and a fraction. He then wrote the plaintiff, giving the measurements and result of his computation, and inclosing his check for $8.40, as the balance due on the hay according to his measurements and computation. McDonald immediately returned the check, with a letter to the effect that he was not satisfied with the measurements. On receipt of this letter Baker answered, saying that, if McDonald was not satisfied with the measurements, he could return the $300 and have the hay. In the meantime Baker had commenced to bale the hay, and had shipped about 14 tons of it to Omaha. On receipt of Baker's last letter, McDonald went to the field where the hay was stacked, notified Baker's men not to press or ship any more of it, and then brought this action to recover possession of the hay, alleging that he was the absolute owner thereof.

The case was brought and tried on the theory that there was fraud or mistake in the measurement of the hay, and that, instead of 112 tons, as claimed by Baker, there was in fact 140 tons. As the evidence supports the claim of McDonald that the stacks contained about 140 tons, the questions involved will have to be considered upon the theory that McDonald's claim of fraud or mistake in the measurement has been established. That McDonald was entitled to the possession of the hay until paid the purchase price is not a question open to dispute. The written memorandum of contract, as well as the contract itself, so far ed, before replevin could be brought by the seller. As a limitation on this, it is held in some of the cases that, if possession of the property is taken by the purchaser before the vender intends to deliver it, replevin will lie without a return of the consideration. Among the cases to this effect are Jennings v. Gage, 13 Ill. 611, 56 Am. Dec. 476, and Bush v. Bender, 113 Pa. 94, 4 Atl. 213. Some of the other cases have inclined to treat the question in an equitable manner, and, as far as possible, administer relief similar as appears from the oral evidence in the record, are silent as to the time of payment of the price of the hay. The law, therefore, presumes a cash sale; that is, that payment and delivery were to be concurrent. Consequently Baker was entitled to possession only upon payment in full or tender of the agreed price, unless there was a waiver of such payment by McDonald, and such waiver is not to be presumed by Baker's selection of the stacks that were to become his under the contract. McDonald replevied upon the ground of absolute ownership; and his right to recover depends upon the question of whether he had title to the hay when the action was commenced, or whether such title was in Baker. As before stated, McDonald undoubtedly had the right of possession until paid for the hay; but such right of possession, if title had passed to Baker, could not support his claim of absolute ownership, and would not allow evidence in support of his petition. An allegation of general ownership in an action of replevin is not supported by proof of a mere lien or other special ownership. Sharp v. Johnson, 44 Neb. 165, 62 N. W. 466, and cases cited in Page's Digest, p. 1815.

The material question to be determined, then, is, Who held title to the hay at the time this action was commenced? The modern doctrine undoubtedly is that neither delivery nor payment of the purchase money is generally requisite for vesting title to personal property in the buyer under a contract of sale; it being necessary only that the identical goods which are the subject of the contract should be ascertained and the price fixed. Newmark on Sales, § 159, gives the rule in the following language: "When the terms of sale are agreed on, and the bargain struck, and everything that the seller has to do with the goods is complete, the contract of sale becomes absolute as between the parties without actual payment or delivery, and the property and the risk of accident to the goods vest in the buyer." Schouler's Personal Property, vol. 2, § 243, is as follows: "Where specific chattels are embraced under a contract of immediate sale, and nothing remains to be done to them, the presumed intent of the parties is that the right of property shall become transferred to the buyer, and vest in him immediately upon the completion of the bargain by mutual assent; and, even though the seller subsequently continue in possession of the goods, the presumption remains the same as between the parties, his possession being that of a bailee with a right to recover his price." 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

When the contract for the sale of this hay was made between the parties, title did not then vest in Baker, because the stacks were thereafter to be selected by him; but when his selection was made, and the hay definitely ascertained and measured, then he became vested with the title, and took all the risk of ownership. Had the hay been burned or otherwise destroyed, Baker, instead of McDonald, would have sustained the loss; and there can be no question that McDonald, immediately after the selection and measurement, might have sustained an action against Baker to recover the balance of the purchase price, and this on the theory that the title had passed. Allen v. Rushfort (Neb.) 101 N. W. 1028; Barker v. Davies, 47 Neb. 78, 81, 66 N. W. 11.

Had McDonald brought this action, claiming a special interest in the hay, there is no doubt that; upon proof of fraud or mistake in the measurement made, he would be entitled to a judgment giving him possession and determining the extent of his interest. His claim is that, by a fraudulent or mistaken measurement, it is sought to deprive him of about 28 tons of hay, of the value of $77. Had his action been brought upon this theory, Baker could have tendered the amount, with costs, and retained possession of the hay, or, after the trial, could have paid the judgment given by the court, and both parties would have their full due; Baker the hay, and McDonald his money. Under the judgment appealed from, McDonald has $300 of Baker's money, and is found to be the absolute owner of the hay, in part payment of which that money was given him. We have no doubt that, under the circumstances of this case, McDonald could not recover as absolute owner without rescinding the contract of sale and tendering back the $300 received on the purchase. His action, if he desired to replevy the hay, instead of suing for the amount due him, should have been for possession as the owner of a special interest in the hay, and not as the unqualified owner.

We recommend that the judgment be reversed, and the case remanded.

Albert and Jackson, CC., concur.

Per Curiam:

For the reasons stated in the foregoing opinion, the judgment of the District Court is reversed, and the cause remanded.

Petition for rehearing overruled.

ROBERT A. FERGUSON, Resp't.,
v.
CHARLES R. RAY, Appt.

(44 Or. 557.)

1. Treasure trove.

Gold-bearing quartz found hidden in the earth, where it has been placed by some person not discovered, is not treasure trove, so that the title to it will vest in the state.

2. Same—title to.

Property hidden in the earth near a marked tree is not regarded as lost, so that the title will vest in the finder as against the owner of the soil, although it has remained there so long as to indicate that the owner is dead or has forgotten it.

(July 18, 1904.)

APPPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Jackson County in favor of plaintiff, in an action brought Case Note.—Property long hidden, and found after all traces of its ownership are gone and the owner is probably dead, gives rise to a question on which there are not many precedents. The decision in FERGUSON v. RAY, and that in Danielson v. Roberts, 44 Or. 108, 65 L. R. A. 526, 102 Am. St. Rep. 627, 74 Pac. 913, were rendered on facts that were very similar. The FERGUSON CASE denies that the finder has any title, as against the owner of the soil, to gold-bearing quartz that had been buried in some kind of a bag under or near marked trees and found long afterward, when the bag had almost entirely rotted away, while the Danielson Case holds that the finder is entitled, as against the owner of the soil, to gold coin found in a half-gallon, rust-eaten, tin can and in partially decayed sacks, where they had been hidden under dirt and debris in an old henhouse which apparently had no floor.

The court, in the FERGUSON CASE, cites the Danielson Case, and that of Sovern v. Yaran, 16 Or. 269, 8 Am. St. Rep. 293, 20 Pac. 100, and says that, since those cases were decided, "it has been very well understood in this jurisdiction . . . what is meant by lost or abandoned property;" but the court does not very clearly show how the Danielson Case constitutes a precedent for its decision in the FERGUSON CASE. The facts in the two cases are closely similar, while the decision in one sustains the right of the finder, and in the other denies it.

In the Danielson Case the court clearly declared its position as follows: "The reason of the rule giving the finder of lost property the right to retain it against all persons except the true owner applies with equal force and reason to money found hidden or secreted in the earth as to property found on the surface." But in the later FERGUSON CASE the court seems to disagree. 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

to recover possession of certain gold-bearing quartz which defendant was alleged to have wrongfully compelled plaintiff to deliver to him. Reversed.

Statement by Wolverton, J.:

The plaintiff, being in possession of defendant's premises under a lease, while cutting wood thereon in the afternoon of November 14, 1901, discovered a rich specimen of gold-bearing quartz lying on top of the ground. He at once secured a pick and shovel, and on scraping the leaves away he found one or two other small pieces "on top," as he testified, "or almost on top, of the ground, sticking through the ground." On digging through the surface he found others extending to the depth of 10 or 12 inches, in all weighing, approximately, 17½ pounds. There were no indications present of any natural ledge or lode of gold-bearing or other quartz in place, or of any pocket or placer or other natural deposit, the formation in which the specimens with that rule, and says the presumption or inference of abandonment "does not obtain as to property intentionally left or deposited in a designated place and possibly forgotten for the time being, as the loss depends upon something more than knowledge or ignorance, or the memory, or want of memory of the owner as to the locality at any given moment." Coming to the facts of the specific case in hand, and reciting the circumstances and conditions of the finding of the buried quartz rock, with the decayed remnants of a sack that had once contained it, imbedded in the ground near marked trees, the court says: "The presumption that it was lost, which attends property found on the surface of the earth, is wanting; so that there was no inference for the jury, deducible from the place of finding and the conditions of the property, that it was lost property. Indeed, the evidence, it would seem, refutes any such presumption or inference." This, being the latest decision, must be deemed to control that of the same court in the Danielson Case if they are not consistent; though it would have been helpful if the court in the later case had pointed out clearly the distinction, if any, which it found between the two cases. The language of the court, just quoted, does, however, suggest that it means to make the distinction consist of the fact that in one case the property was "found upon the surface of the earth," and, in the other, was embedded in it. But, so far as an inference that the property was lost or abandoned is concerned, it would not seem to be any greater in the case of a large, half-gallon, tin can containing $7,000 of gold coin in sacks, when discovered under an old building, than in the case of gold-bearing quartz found in a rotted sack under or near marked trees. Hiding wealth under a building does not seem to indicate an intention to abandon it any were imbedded being described as "a loose surface soil." Plaintiff disposed of a part of the quartz, estimated as being half of it in value, and delivered the remainder, 8¾ pounds in weight, to defendant, Ray. He now brings trover for the quartz thus delivered to the defendant, alleging that it was obtained from him through duress and threats of arrest and imprisonment and false and fraudulent representations. The defendant answers (1) that the specimens were his property by reason of having been extracted from his land, and (2) by virtue of an agreement entered into between him and the plaintiff, whereby, upon an ascertainment of values and an accounting, defendant was to pay plaintiff one half of the excess value, if any should appear, between the rock delivered to defendant and that disposed of by plaintiff. The evidence shows that two trees standing nearest the place of discovery bear some old marks, consisting of one or more blazes, as if made with an ax, and indentations having the appearance of being struck with a hammer or some blunt instrument; that another has been partially peeled, apparently at a more recent date; that many trees and shrubs more than does hiding it under the ground near a marked tree. Notwithstanding the fact, therefore, that the court, in the later case, speaks of the rule as to lost or abandoned property as "very well understood" in that jurisdiction, the cases, taken together, do not seem to leave it entirely beyond doubt.

The Sovern Case, which is also referred to, was one in which the question did not arise between the finder of property and the owner of the soil as such, but as between the administrator of the original owner of money, who had hidden it under the floor of a barn upon her own premises, and a subsequent owner of the premises, upon which the money was found after the death of the original owner.

A boat which had probably been buried two thousand years, and presumably had been abandoned or left derelict by its original owners on what is now the bank of the River Ancholme, with the result that it eventually became buried in the earth by the operation of natural causes, such as by sinking in the ooze and the deposit of alluvial soil, was discovered, a few years since, and excavated, by a gas company, which was in possession of the premises under a lease of ninety-nine years. Suit was brought by the lessor claiming that the boat was his property, and the court held that the boat, whether regarded as a mineral which was included within a reservation of minerals to the lessor, or as part of the soil in which it was embedded when discovered, or as a chattel, did not pass to the lessees by the demise, but was the property of the lessor, even though he was ignorant of its existence at the time of granting the lease. But this, though it was a case of property embedded in the soil, involved nothing which suggested that the buried boat had been hidden or left where it was with any intent to assert ownership thereof subsequently. The case is, therefore, of little importance on the question of rights in property that has been hidden. Elwes v. Brigg Gas Co. L. R. 33 (Ch. Div. 562, 55 L. J. Ch. N. S. 734).

Valuable earthenware, which was discovered and taken out of the soil of a farm in which it had long been buried, without anything to show under what circumstances it was deposited there, or who was the original owner, was claimed by the executor L.R.A. (N.S.)

utors of the owner of the farm, in an action against the person who was charged to have unlawfully taken the property out of the soil and retained it. But the court held that the action would not lie, because the plaintiffs could not recover as executors, since whatever title the testator had had passed to devisees, and that the plaintiffs, in their individual capacity, were only tenants in common with others who were not joined. Burdick v. Chesebrough, 94 App. Div. 532, 88 N. Y. Supp. 13. But the court also laid down the law of the subject as follows: "If personal property is deposited beneath the surface of the soil, and so left until the place where it is so deposited is forgotten, and the owner thereof, if living, or his personal representatives, if he is dead, cannot be found, such personal property, so in the possession of the owner of the soil, becomes, as a part of the soil, the property of the owner of the real property; and such personal property passes by gift, sale, or descent of said real property as a part thereof. When it is discovered and removed from the soil, as against everyone but the owner it becomes the personal property of the owners of such real property, and not the property of the finder thereof." The doctrine of the decision in this case is in substantial agreement with the conclusions of the court in Ferguson v. Ray and the English case of the buried boat, just referred to above. It would also permit a distinction between these cases and the Danielson Case, if, in that case, the hidden money had not become embedded in the soil; but as to this fact, the report says it was dug up from about 3 or 4 inches below the surface, and that the ground around it was quite solid.

On the general question of the right of the true owner of property to claim it from the finder on proof of his ownership, the authorities are many. As stated in an extensive discussion of this question in a note in 37 L. R. A., page 117, "there seems to have never been any question that an action would lie in favor of the owner in case the finder refused to deliver the property to him. In fact the word 'trover,' which was applied to actions to recover for the conversion of property, is from a word meaning 'to find' (Bouvier, Law Dict. Trover), and the fiction of the action is that defendant found and converted the property to his own use."

in the vicinity contain the marks of an ax, and that many more have been cut away and made into wood. The plaintiff testified, touching the ore, that "it had the appearance of having been placed there at some time long ago." Another witness testified that the quartz had at one time been connected with the vein, and had been broken out; that there were indications of the marks of a pick or a hammer upon portions of it, as it had the appearance of having been bruised, and that the break was evidently very old; and still another (using his language): "I found evidence of some kind of old cloth there,—duck cloth. The ground was stained around a small place there, of a dark brown stain. I even found a few old duck ravelings—their impression—on the dirt I dug up. They were decayed through until they would not hold together, and the ground about it for a space of 4 or 5 feet was stained with this dark brown stain, or about the color of it, and parts of it showed prints of old cloth of some kind, and a few old ravelings that were perfectly rotten. I tried to pick them up, and they would not hold together." No evidence was adduced of a different trend or tendency relative to the finding or the place thereof, or of the circumstances and conditions attending either. Upon this condition of the record, defendant moved for a nonsuit, which being denied, and judgment having been rendered adverse to him, he brings this appeal.

Bellinger & C. Code (Or.) § 1777.

Wolverton, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The theory upon which the cause is sought to be maintained is that the quartz, the subject of the dispute, was either lost or abandoned property, and that in either event plaintiff is entitled to its possession or value as against the defendant and all others except the true owner. As the property was found beneath the surface of the earth, not upon it, the question has been presented whether or not it is treasure trove. We are firmly impressed that it cannot be so considered. Treasure trove, and its legal status, according to Blackstone, "is where any money, or coin, gold, silver, plate, or bullion is found hidden in the earth, or other private place, the owner thereof being unknown: in which case the treasure belongs to the King; but if he that hid it be known, or afterwards found out, the owner, and not the King, is entitled to it. Also if it be found in the sea, or upon the earth, it doth not belong to the King, but the finder, if no owner appears. . . . Formerly all treasure trove belonged to the finder, as was also the rule of the civil law. Afterwards it was judged expedient for the purposes of the state, and particularly for the coinage, to allow part of what was so found to the King; which part was assigned to be all hidden treasure; such as is casually lost and unclaimed, and also such as is designedly abandoned, still remaining the right of the fortunate finder." 1 Bl. Com. Lewis's ed. chap. 8, *295, 296. Bouvier gives the same definition, except that he adds that it includes not only gold and silver, but whatever may constitute riches, as vases, urns, statues, etc. Bouvier, Dict. Mr. Chief Justice Appleton declares that "nothing is treasure trove except gold or silver." Livermore v. White, 74 Me. 452, 456, 43 Am. Rep. 600. So, according to an article found in the Law Times (vol. 81, p. 21), the prerogative of treasure trove is strictly limited, and touches only gold and silver plate and bullion, discarding the baser metals; and in Elwes v. Brigg Gas Co. L. R. 33 Ch. Div. 562, it is said that Roman coins, not being gold or silver coins, did not fall within the royal prerogative of treasure trove. A case has come to our notice where it seems 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

to have been conceded that certain cups, a chalice, pyxes, and a paten, all of silver, were treasure trove (Atty. Gen. v. Moore, [1893] 1 Ch. 676), and another where solid gold rings and ornaments were so classed (Queen v. Thomas, 33 L. J. Mag. Cas. N. S. 22). In a case from Pennsylvania (Huthmacher v. Harris, 38 Pa. 491, 80 Am. Dec. 502) the court says, however, of treasure trove: "Though commonly defined as gold or silver hidden in the ground, may, in our commercial day, be taken to include the paper representatives of gold and silver,—especially when they are found hidden with both of these precious metals." This is manifestly an enlargement of the common-law idea of the term, and we have been unable to find any cases that go beyond it. We find expressions by Chancellors Walworth and Kent, however, that would seem to give it further scope, even to the extent of comprising all chattels or goods hidden. We quote from the former in McLaughlin v. Waite, 5 Wend. 405, 21 Am. Dec. 232: "If chattels are found secreted in the earth or elsewhere, the common law presumes the owner placed them there for safety, intending to reclaim them. If the owner cannot be found, he is presumed to be dead, and that the secret died with him. In such cases the property belongs to the sovereign of the country as the heir to him who was the owner; but if they are found upon the surface of the earth, or in the sea, if no owner appears to claim them, it is presumed they have been intentionally abandoned by the former proprietor; and as such they are returned into the common mass of things, as in a state of nature." And from the latter in his Commentaries (2 Kent, Com. *357): "Nor does this right of acquisition [by finding] extend to goods found hidden in the earth, and which go under the denomination of treasure trove. Such goods, in England, belonged to the King." It is at once apparent, however, that neither of these distinguished jurists was attempting to define treasure trove, but was distinguishing it, as it respects the rights of the finder, from goods found upon the surface of the earth; hence that they intended no innovation upon the common-law idea of the term. Indeed, Chancellor Walworth cites as his sole authority from volumes 1 and 2 of Blackstone's Commentaries, the substance of which, as it relates to the subject in hand, we have quoted above; and it is only upon the principle indicated that the citation supports him at all. But without further reference to the authorities, or attempting to define more precisely the scope and meaning of the term "treasure trove," we may very safely conclude that, in view of the nature of the property in controversy, it does not fall within the classification. It is neither gold nor bullion. It is simply what may be correctly denominated gold-bearing quartz. The testimony varies touching the relative weight of the gold as compared with the rock in which it is carried, the estimates ranging from one fourth to three fourths; but it is manifest that in either extreme it cannot be fitly or properly styled bullion, and there is clearly nothing else that will give it the stamp of treasure trove.

This brings us back to the real controversy: Was it lost or abandoned property, or, rather, does the evidence suffice to carry the case to the jury upon that contention? The novelty of the affair is such as to induce hesitation, and to involve us in some doubt, but a careful survey of the authorities impresses us that it cannot be characterized as either lost or abandoned in the sense that the finder is entitled to its possession or ownership as against the owner of the soil. Nor do we think that any reasonable inference that such is its nature and character can be deduced from the evidence, and the case therefore is not one proper for the jury to pass upon. It has been very well understood in this jurisdiction, since the case of Sovern v. Yoran, 16 Or. 269, 8 Am. St. Rep. 293, 20 Pac. 100, and the more recent one of Danielson v. Roberts, 44 Or. 108, 65 L. R. A. 528, 102 Am. St. Rep. 627, 74 Pac. 913, what is meant by lost or abandoned property. To lose is casually and involuntarily to part with the possession, so that the mind has no impress of, and can have no recourse to, the event; and, if the property is found on the surface of the earth, the conditions suggest that it has been intentionally abandoned, and as such has returned to the common mass of things, in a state of nature, which belongs to the first occupant or finder, the owner not appearing (1 Bl. Com. Lewis's ed. chap. 8, *295, 296; 2 Bl. Com. Lewis's ed. chap. 26, *402; 2 Kent, Com. *356; McLaughlin v. Waite, 5 Wend. 405, 21 Am. Dec. 232), the distinction between losing and abandonment being that one is involuntary, while the other is by intent or design. But the result, as it relates to the property, is practically the same, the owner not appearing to lay claim to it. In the one case the finder has the right to the possession against all except the true owner. In the other he acquires the absolute property by right of his occupancy. It is the presumption of abandonment that obtains until the owner appears and claims the property that gives the right as legal possessor to the first occupier, the presumption being disputable by the rightful owner. Such presumption or inference does not obtain as to property intentionally left or deposited in a designated place, and possibly forgotten for the time being, as the loss depends upon something more than knowledge or ignorance, or the memory, or want of memory, of the owner as to the locality at any given moment. "In such case," says Baron Parke, "the taker is not justified in concluding that the goods were lost, because there is little doubt he must have believed that the owner would know where to find them again, and he had no pretense to consider them abandoned or derelict." The principle is amply illustrated in the cases. In Lawrence v. State, 1 Humph. 228, 34 Am. Dec. 644, a customer placed his pocketbook on a table in a barber shop, and, his attention being attracted to the outside, went out, forgetting it. The barber discovered the pocketbook and attempted to appropriate it, and it was held that it was not lost property. In McAvoy v. Medina, 11 Allen, 548, 87 Am. Dec. 733, the plaintiff picked up a pocketbook in a barber shop, and handed it to the barber, but, the owner not appearing to claim it, sued to recover it. In disposing of the case Mr. Justice Dewey says: "This property is not, under the circumstances, to be treated as lost property in that sense in which a finder has a valid claim to hold the same until called for by the true owner. This property was voluntarily placed upon a table in the defendant's shop by a customer of his, who accidentally left the same there, and has never called for it. The plaintiff also came there as a customer, and first saw the same, and took it from the table. The plaintiff did not, by this, acquire the right to take the property from the shop, but it was rather the duty of the defendant . . . to use reasonable care for the safe-keeping of the same until the owner should call for it." See also, Kincaid v. Eaton, 98 Mass. 139, 93 Am. Dec. 142; State v. McCann, 19 Mo. 249; People v. McGarren, 17 Wend. 460. The circumstances must be such, considering the place and the conditions under which the property was found, as to lead to the inference that the property was casually or involuntarily left where found, or there can be no losing. This is well illustrated by the case of Durfee v. Jones, 11 R. I. 588, 23 Am. Rep. 528. Plaintiff bought an old safe, and left it with his agent to sell, who in turn left it with defendant for a like purpose. The defendant, in looking through it, found a roll of bills, amounting to $165, between the wooden lining and the sheet-iron exterior, which could only have gotten or been placed there through a large crack in the lining. The court said: "We think the money here, though designedly left in the safe, was probably not designedly put in the crevice or interspace where it was found, but that, being left in the safe, it probably slipped, or was accidentally shoved, into the place where it was found without the knowledge of the owner, and so was lost, in the stricter sense of the word. The money was not simply deposited and forgotten, but deposited and lost by reason of a defect or insecurity in the place of deposit." The circumstances and conditions of the place where found afforded the indicia from which the inference of a losing was deduced. Now, in the case at bar, the quartz was not found on the surface of the earth. True, a small piece or so was picked up from the surface, but, if this were all, there would have been no controversy. The remainder was found imbedded in the earth, and the presumption that it was lost, which attends property found on the surface of the earth, is wanting, so that there was no inference for the jury, deducible from the place of finding and the conditions of the property, that it was lost property. Indeed, the evidence, it would seem, refutes any such presumption or inference. The property was valuable. It had certainly at some time previous been detached by human agency from a ledge, its natural place of deposit; and the evidence that it was once contained in a bag of some kind of cloth, and that trees nearest the place of finding bore some old marks, apparently made by design to aid in locating the property, would indicate that it was voluntarily deposited where found. What effect the elements have had upon the conditions and position in which it was left could only be the merest conjecture. In any event, there could be no inference of a losing or abandonment from the conditions present at the finding, and this is all the knowledge we have respecting the matter; so that the case was not such as was proper to be left to the jury for their determination upon the theory that the property was lost or abandoned. The case, to our minds, falls within the principle of a class of cases which we will now notice, and which counsel for defendant rely upon as controlling. The one most nearly illustrative is South Staffordshire Waterworks v. Sharman, 65 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 460. The subject of the controversy there was two gold rings found by a laborer in a pool upon the premises of his employers. He was engaged in cleaning out the pool, and, after throwing out large quantities of mud, came across the rings and some other articles of interest. Lord Russell, in announcing his opinion, quotes from Pollock and Wright on Possession in the Common Law, pp. 40, 41, as follows: "The possession of land carries with it in general, by our law, possession of everything which is attached to or under that land, and, in the absence of a better title elsewhere, the right to possess it also. And it makes no difference that the possessor is not aware of the thing's existence." "It is free to anyone who requires a specific intention: a part of de facto possession to treat this as a positive rule of law. But it seems preferable to say that the legal possession rests on a real de facto possession, constituted by the occupier's general power and intent to exclude unauthorized interference." And then says: "It is upon the principle, expressed in this [the latter] passage, that I base my judgment, for it shows the broad distinction between the present case and the case contemplated in the passage cited to us in course of the argument from Blackstone's Commentaries, showing that a jewel cast into the sea or on the public highway could not be said to be in the possession of anyone, because no one had a right to exclude another from the public place;" and concludes as follows: "The general principle is that where anyone is in possession of house or land which he occupies, and over which he manifests an intention of exercising a control and preventing unauthorized interference, and something is found in that house or on that land by a stranger or a servant, the presumption is that the possession of the article found is in the owner of the locus in quo." Another case is noted in Law Notes (vol. 7, No. 8, p. 160), decided by Supreme Court Justice Forbes, of New York; not so authoritative as the preceding one, as it does not come from a court of appeals, but the principle is recognized. Some ancient dishes, supposed to have been buried by Col. Edmeston, an officer in the French-Indian war, one hundred and fifty years ago, at a time when he was obliged to flee from the Indians, were recently plowed up, and it was held as to them to be well established that where a thing is imbedded in the soil the right to it is in the owner of the land, unless it is of such a character as to constitute treasure trove. Other cases announcing the same principle are Elwes v. Brigg Gas Co. L. R. 33 Ch. Div. 562; Reg. v. Rowe, Bell, C. C. 93. Now, we have here property not treasure trove, found imbedded in the soil under circumstances repelling the idea that it has been lost. How long a time it had been in the place where found is conjectural, of course, but it had probably been there many years,—long enough, at least, that only a trace of the cloth bag that once contained it was left; and the ownership of the land where found is in the defendant. Being in the possession of the land, and exercising ownership over it, thus manifesting an intention to prevent unauthorized interference, we must conclude, as was announced by Lord Russell in South Staffordshire Wa- terworks v. Sharman 65 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 480, that "the presumption is that the possession of the article found is in the owner of the locus in quo."

There was error, therefore, in denying the nonsuit, and the judgment appealed from will be reversed, and the cause remanded for such other proceedings as may seem proper, not inconsistent with this opinion.

Petition for rehearing denied.

OREGON SUPREME COURT.

P. F. FOUTS, Resp't.,

v.

HOOD RIVER, Appt.

(..... Or.)

1. Constitutional law—local option—taking effect.

The taking effect of a law cannot be made to depend upon the vote of the people under a constitutional provision that the taking effect of no law shall be made to depend upon any authority, except as provided by the Constitution, which merely authorizes the ratification by the people of the bill adopted by the legislature.

2. Same.

A statute providing the machinery by which the suspension of the law providing for the issuing of licenses for the sale of intoxicating liquor in cities and in incorporated towns may be secured, so that a majority of the voters of the precinct, ward, or district involved may determine that such sale shall be absolutely prohibited in the district, becomes effective by the act of the legislature, and not by the vote of the people, and is not, therefore, prohibited by a constitutional provision that no law shall be passed the taking effect of which shall be made to depend upon any authority except as provided by the Constitution.

3. Same.

The intentional omission of prohibitory liquor laws from the list of laws the taking effect of which the Constitution permits to depend upon the vote of the people does not prevent the legislature from passing a statute providing the machinery by which license laws may be suspended by vote of the people.

(July 3, 1905.)

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Wasco County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover the unearned license tax upon the termination of a license by the adoption of the local-option law. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. John McCourt, for appellant:

Laws proposed and enacted by the people under the initiative clause of the amendment are subject to the same constitutional limitations as statutes enacted by the legislature.

Kadlerly v. Portland, 44 Or. 146, 74 Pac. 710, 75 Pac. 222.

The local-option law is a general law.

Mathis v. Jones, 84 Ga. 812, 11 S. E. 1018; Blackwell v. State, 36 Ark. 178; State

Case Note.—The question whether a local-option law takes effect upon its enactment by the legislature, or whether its taking effect is contingent on its adoption by popular vote, has been largely discussed in passing upon the objection to the constitutionality of such legislation as a delegation of legislative power.

Upon this point, Black on Intoxicating Liquors, § 45, says: "The ground of objection most frequently urged against such laws is that they amount to an unlawful delegation of legislative power to the people. This, however, is based upon a misconception of the legal effect of the popular vote. If the law is complete in itself, it is the legislature which enacts it, not the people, although the people are permitted to determine the contingency on which its going into effect in a particular locality may depend. . . . But the law, to escape the charge of unconstitutionally delegating legislative power, must be a complete and perfect enactment as it leaves the hands of the legislature. It must not depend upon the expression of the popular will in respect either to its validity or its terms. Certainly the lawmaking body would have no power to authorize the people of a district to decide what kind of a liquor law they will have. 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)."

Nothing can be referred to the voters but the question whether they will adopt the particular law which the legislature enacts."

It may be remarked, in passing, that local-option laws have been sometimes sustained upon the ground that, admitting them to be a delegation of legislative power, the subject is within the class of police regulations, in respect to which it is proper that the local judgment should control. See Cooley, Const. Lim. 7th ed. p. 174; Anderson v. Com. 13 Bush, 485; State v. King, 37 Iowa, 462; State, Paul. Prosecutor v. Circuit Judge. 50 N. J. L. 585, 1 L. R. A. 86, 15 Atl. 272; Territory ex rel. McMahon v. O'Connor, 5 Dak. 397, 3 L. R. A. 355, 41 N. W. 746.

The reasoning of those cases which hold that local-option legislation is made effectual by act of the legislature, and not by the vote of the people, is fully set forth by the quotations in the opinion in Fouts v. Hood River.

The language of the court in Gordon v. State, 46 Ohio St. 607, 6 L. R. A. 749, 23 N. E. 63, is also in point: "It is evident, we think, that the act whose constitutional validity is called in question was a complete law when it had passed through the several stages of legislative enactment, and derived Section 21, art. 1, of our Constitution was designed to prohibit the taking effect of prohibitory liquor laws upon the authority of a popular vote.

Where the sovereign power of the state has located the authority, there it must remain until the Constitution itself is changed.

Cooley, Const. Lim. p. 137.

Mr. W. H. Wilson, for respondent:

The proper construction of § 21, art. 1, of the Constitution of Oregon is the same that is given to state Constitutions generally, to the effect that legislative authority cannot be delegated.

The local-option law became a law and took effect when the same was adopted by a majority of the voters at the June, 1904, election, and the result thereof was ascertained and determined.

Sutherland, Stat. Constr. 68; Locke's Ap-

none of its validity from a vote of the people. In all its parts it is an expression of the will of the legislature, and its execution is made dependent upon a condition prescribed by the legislative department of the state. By its terms, it was made to take effect from and after its passage. . . . So far from the vote of the electors breathing life into the statute, it is only through the statute that the electors are entitled to vote at the special election. While they are free to cast their votes, the consequence or their aggregate vote is fixed and declared by the act of the legislature. The penal sanction of the act is subject to no modification by the action of the electors; and it is an elementary principle that 'the main strength and force of law consists in the penalty annexed to it. Herein is to be found the principal obligation of human laws.' 1 Bl. Com. 57."

A leading case on the opposite side of the question is Ex parte Wall, 48 Cal. 279, 17 Am. Rep. 425, where the statute under consideration provided that, if a majority of ballots should be cast "against license" at a special election called upon petition of one fourth the voters of any township, incorporated city, or town then no license to retail liquor should be there granted; and that it should thereafter be unlawful for any person to sell, etc., until at a subsequent election a majority should vote in favor of license; and established a penalty for such unlawful sale. The court said: "It is urged, however, that for the legislature to enact that a law shall take effect, provided the people of the state, or of a district, shall vote in favor of it, is not to delegate the lawmaking power. This position has been upheld by courts of high character, but I think the decisions in which it has been denied are sustained by the better reasons. It is true, a statute may be conditional; its taking effect may sometimes be made to depend upon a subsequent event. . . . But it does not follow that a statute may be made to take effect upon the happening of any subsequent event which may be named in it. The event must be one which shall produce such a change of circumstances as that the lawmakers, in the exercise of their own judgment, can declare it to be wise and expedient that the law shall take effect when the event shall occur. The legislature cannot transfer to others the responsibility of deciding what legislation is expedient and proper, with reference either to present conditions or future contingencies. To say that the legislators may deem a law to be expedient, provided the people shall deem it expedient, is to suggest an abandonment of the legislative function by those to whose wisdom and patriotism the Constitution has intrusted the prerogative of determining whether a law is or is not expedient. Can it be said in such case that any member of the legislature declares the prohibition or enactment to be expedient?"

Another case is Thornton v. Territory, 3 Wash. Terr. 482, 17 Pac. 896, in which the argument is that the vote under the local-option law operates to repeal the general license law. And the court further says: "It has been said that the law is in force from the date of its passage, but takes effect only upon the happening of the contingency of a petition and election resulting in a certain way. If this be the contingency, then a law can be made to go into effect at the option of those subject thereto. If a law goes into effect only at the option of those subject thereto, then it is not mandatory. Can that be law which is not mandatory, and from the terms of which it cannot be discovered whether the rule of action exists, or whether there exists a penalty for the violation of this rule?"

But that the great weight of authority is unquestionably in favor of the validity of such statutes is expressly stated in Savage v. Com. 84 Va. 619, 5 S. E. 565; Com. v. Weller, 14 Bush, 218, 29 Am. Rep. 407, and Schulherr v. Bordeaux, 64 Miss. 59, 8 So. 201. To the numerous cases cited in FOURTS V. HOOD RIVER which support such legislation, may be added Feek v. Bloomingdale, 82 Mich. 393, 10 L. R. A. 69, 47 N. W. 37; Cain v. Davie County, 86 N. C. 8, and Bancroft v. Dumas, 21 Vt. 456.

Wolverton, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The single question presented in this case is whether what is known as the "local-option act," initiated with and adopted by the people, is constitutional. It is urged by the appellant that it is not, for the reason that by its terms it is made to take effect, if at all, upon the popular vote of the locality or localities within which it is sought to have it apply or become operative. This feature, it is urged, is inimical to § 21, art. 1, of the Constitution, which reads as follows (omitting the proviso): "No ex post facto law, or law impairing the obligations of contracts, shall ever be passed, nor shall any law be passed, the taking effect of which shall be made to depend upon any authority, except as provided in this Constitution." The cardinal provisions of the act necessary for us to take note of now are as follows: "Whenever a petition therefor, signed by not less than 10 per cent of the registered voters of any county in the state, or subdivision of any county, or precinct of a county, shall be filed with the county clerk of such county in the manner in this act prescribed, the county court of such county shall order an election to be held at the time mentioned in such petition, and in the entire district mentioned in such petition, to determine whether the sale of intoxicating liquors shall be prohibited in such county or subdivision of such county, or in such precinct." Or. Laws 1905, p. 41. "The petition therefor shall be filed with the county clerk not less than thirty nor more than ninety days before the day of election. In every county, subdivision of county, or precinct thereof, that shall return a majority vote for prohibition in November, 1904, the law shall take effect on the 1st day of 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

January, 1905. In all succeeding elections, the law shall take effect on the 1st day of July following the day of election." Id. p. 43. Only qualified electors are permitted to vote at such elections. Ample provisions are then made for holding elections under the act. On the tenth day after any election so held the county clerk is required to take to his assistance two justices of the peace, and proceed to open the returns, and make an abstract of the vote for the information of the county court; and the court is required on the eleventh day after the election, or as soon thereafter as practicable, to hold a special session, and, if a majority of the votes thereon in the county as a whole, or in any subdivision of the county as a whole, or in any precinct in the county, are for prohibition, it shall immediately make an order declaring the result of such vote, and absolutely prohibit the sale of intoxicating liquors within the prescribed limits, except for the purposes and under the regulations specified in the act, until such time as the qualified voters therein at a regular election held for the purpose by a majority decide otherwise, and thereafter it shall be unlawful to sell, exchange, or give away any intoxicating liquor within the territory included within said prohibitory order, except as in the act provided. By § 11 (p. 47), it is further provided that, if a majority voting at any election held under the act vote against prohibition, the court shall make an order declaring the result, and have the same enrolled in its records. Further provision is made that, after the election has been held and the result declared, no subsequent election shall be held before the second calendar year thereafter; and that, when such subsequent election results against prohibition, then that the court shall enter an order setting aside the previous order enforcing it. A penalty is denounced against violations of the act.

There exist among the earlier adjudications directly opposing opinions as to the constitutionality of a statute which has been referred to the people to determine whether it shall become a law or not under Constitutions vesting legislative authority merely in a legislative assembly, without other provisions qualifying or limiting such authority. Rice v. Foster, 4 Harr. (Del.) 479; Maize v. State, 4 Ind. 342; Santo v. State, 2 Iowa, 165, 63 Am. Dec. 487; Geebrick v. State, 5 Iowa, 491; Baltimore v. Clunet, 23 Md. 449; People v. Collins, 3 Mich. 343; Barto v. Himrod, 8 N. Y. 483, 59 Am. Dec. 506; Cincinnati, W. & Z. R. Co. v. Clinton County, 1 Ohio St. 77; Parker v. Com. 6 Pa. 507, 47 Am. Dec. 480; Bancroft v. Dumas, 21 Vt. 456; State v. Parker, 26 Vt. 357; Bull v.

Read, 13 Gratt. 78. As if to set the principle at rest by explicit declaration, our Constitution has provided: "Nor shall any law be passed, the taking effect of which shall be made to depend upon any authority, except as provided in this Constitution." [Art. 1, § 21.] Indiana has the same provision in her Constitution, which has there received judicial construction, not fully but in a measure, to the purpose that a law made to take effect or not, dependent upon the popular will or vote of the people, is inimical to the clause, as being made to take effect by dependence upon other authority than that provided in the Constitution. Maize v. State, supra. This, we take it, should be so upon principle. Under our form of government the people have delegated to the legislative assembly, the lawmaking body, the power and authority to enact laws. The legislature must itself exercise the power. It cannot delegate it to any other authority. Since the adoption of the initiative and referendum amendment to the Constitution, however, the people have reserved to themselves the power to initiate an act, and to adopt or reject it by popular vote, and a bill adopted by the legislature may be referred to the people for their ratification; but the mode in this instance is the measure of the power. But where an act comes from the legislative assembly it may be affirmed, we think, under the clause of the Constitution above quoted that that body cannot leave it to a vote of the people to determine whether or not it shall become a law, because the taking effect thereof is thereby made to depend upon an authority other than that provided for in the Constitution. The proposition seems so clear that it is unnecessary to go further with the demonstration, but the pivotal and cardinal question here is whether the present legislation has been made by the act itself to take effect—that is, to become a law—dependent upon a vote of the people. It may be assumed, as counsel for appellant asserts, that the act is general, as contradistinguished from local or special, and such appears really to be its purpose and intentment. It might be further observed, however, that the subject-matter thereof does not fall within the category of cases concerning which local or special legislation is inhibited by § 23 of article 4 of the Constitution. In the case of Maize v. State, supra, a law similar in its provisions to this one was declared inimical to the Indiana Constitution, but it was not on account of the clause we now have under consideration alone, but as read in connection with another clause, which provided that, "whenever a general law can be made applicable, all laws shall be general and of uniform operation throughout the state;" 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

the court regarding the subject as matter for general and uniform legislation, and not local or special. In a much later case from the same state (Lafayette, M. & B. R. Co. v. Geiger, 34 Ind. 185), where was considered a law providing for the submission to the people of a county or township whether a tax should be levied and an appropriation made to aid in railroad construction, and wherein was not involved the requirement that the law should be of general application, the court held it to be valid and operative, notwithstanding a contention that it was made to take effect upon an authority otherwise than as provided in the Constitution. The Maize Case was distinguished upon the ground that the subject there treated of was matter for general legislation, while the act then under consideration did not fall within such classification. A similar act, applying to incorporated cities, authorizing an issue of bonds to pay for subscriptions to stock of a railroad company to aid in the construction of the road upon a petition of a majority of the resident freeholders therein, had been theretofore held valid in Thompson v. Peru, 29 Ind. 305, although the act was general, the power being conferred upon all cities. By a still later case (Groesch v. State, 42 Ind. 547), involving a statute whereby the issuance of a license was made to depend upon securing a majority of the legal voters in the township or ward of a municipality, it was determined that the law was general, and of uniform operation throughout the state; and that it took effect by force of its enactment by the legislature, and not by authority of a majority of the legal voters in the locality where sought to be invoked. These are the Indiana cases bearing upon the question, and are noticed particularly as our Constitution is the same as hers touching the taking effect of an act.

Other cases from elsewhere hold that a law similar in its provisions to the one under consideration does not take effect or become a law by reason of the popular will, but that it is a law perfect in all its parts as it comes from the hands of the legislative assembly; that the election is prescribed by the law, not by the people, to determine its application and limitation; and that the expressed will of the people is but an appropriate contingency upon which the law shall depend for its operation. We cannot better state or discuss the doctrine involved than by quoting from the opinion of Mr. Justice Agnew in Locke's Appeal, 72 Pa. 491, 13 Am. Rep. 716. The act there considered was by nature purely local, affecting only the twenty-second ward in the city of Philadelphia. He says: "What did the legislature, in this section, submit to the people, and what did they not submit? This is quite as clear as any other part of the act. Each elector is to vote a ticket for license or against license. He is allowed by the law to say, 'I am for the issuing of license,' or 'I am against the issuing of licenses,' and thus to express his judgment or opinion. But this is all he was permitted by law to do. He declared no consequences, and prescribed no rule resulting from his opinion. Nor does the majority of the votes declare a consequence. The return of a majority is but of a mere numerical preponderance of votes, and expresses only the opinion of the greater number of electors upon the expediency or inexpediency of licenses in this ward. When this is certified by the return, the legislature, not the voters, declare 'it shall (or it shall not) be lawful for any license to issue for the sale of spirituous liquors.' Thus it is perfectly manifest this law was not made, pronounced, or ratified by the people; and the majority vote is but an ascertainment of the public sentiment,—the expression of a general opinion,—which, as a fact, the legislature have made the contingency on which the law shall operate. When the law came from the halls of legislation it came a perfect law, mandatory in all its parts, prohibiting in this ward the sale of intoxicating liquors without license, commanding an election to be held every third year to ascertain the expediency of issuing licenses, and, when the fact of expediency or inexpediency shall have been returned, commanding that licenses shall issue or shall not issue. Then what did the vote decide? Clearly, not that the act should be a law or not be, for the law already existed. Indeed, it was not delegated to the people to decide anything. They simply declared their views or wishes, and when they did so it was the fiat of the law, not their vote, which commanded licenses to be issued or not to be issued. . . . So long, therefore, as the legislature only calls to its aid the means of ascertaining the utility or expediency of a measure, and does not delegate the power to make the law itself, it is acting within the sphere of its just powers." This case overrules the earlier case of Parker v. Com. supra, which held to a contrary opinion. The identical principle is aptly stated and avowed as sound by Mr. Justice Wagner, speaking for the court, in State ex rel. Dome v. Wilcox, 45 Mo. 458, 464. He says: "Now, the legislature cannot propose a law, and submit it to the people to pass or reject it by a general vote. That would, indeed, be legislation by the people. But the proposition cannot be successfully controverted that a law may be passed to take effect on the happening of a future event or contingency. The future event—the happening of the contingency, or the fulfilment of a condition—affords no additional efficacy to the law, but simply furnishes the occasion for the exercise of the power. The law is complete and effective when it has passed through the forms prescribed for its enactment, though it may not operate, or its influence may not be felt, until a subject has arisen upon which it can act. In the case we are now considering the act took effect with the other laws contained in the statutes. It was passed according to the prescribed forms designated in the Constitution. Its enactment did not depend upon any popular vote, but parties to be affected by it were at liberty to accept the privileges granted, and incur the burdens and obligations it would impose, as their interest or will should dictate. If they elected not to avail themselves of its privileges, it did not in the least impair its force. It still stood a valid enactment on the statute book. If they organized under it, they were entitled to the benefit of its provisions; but in either event the law remained the same. There is no pretense, therefore, for saying that the law is objectionable because it depends for its efficacy on the vote of the people. This point must be ruled against the plaintiff in error." So, in the case of Fell v. State, 42 Md. 71, 85, 20 Am. Rep. 83, involving almost an identical statute with our own, it was declared that the question was not a new one in that state; the court further saying: "Now, what has been delegated to the voters by this act of assembly? Certainly not the power to make the law, or to repeal existing laws. They are called on by the first section simply to express, by their ballots, their opinion or sentiment as to the subject-matter to which the law relates. They declare no consequences, prescribe no penalties, and exercise no legislative functions. The consequences are declared in the law, and are exclusively the result of the legislative will. The act of assembly is 'a perfect and complete law as it left the halls of legislation and was approved by the governor;' but by its terms it was made to go into operation in any district upon the contingency of a majority of the legal voters within the district being ascertained to be in favor of the prohibition contained in the second section. The question before us therefore resolves itself simply into this: May the legislature constitutionally enact a law, and make its operation depend upon the contingency of the popular vote?" Answering the question, it was resolved in the affirmative, and to the same effect is a more recent case in New Jersey, involving a similar act. State, Paul, Prosecutor, v. Circuit Judge, 50 N. J. L. 585, 1 L. R. A.

86, 15 Atl. 272. So, also, in Iowa. State ex rel. Witter v. Forkner, 94 Iowa, 1, 28 L. R. A. 206, 82 N. W. 772. See also, as announcing the same principle in that state, Dalby v. Wolf, 14 Iowa, 228, and Weir v. Cram, 37 Iowa, 649. Two earlier cases, holding to the doctrine for which the appellant contends, are distinguished, namely, Santo v. State, 2 Iowa, 165, 63 Am. Dec. 487, and Gebrick v. State, 5 Iowa, 491. We may remark, also, that the case in 5 Iowa was made to turn as well upon the constitutional provision that all acts of a general nature shall have uniform operation, which it was held the act there considered did not have. For other cases in harmony with the view entertained in Locke's Appeal, see Cincinnati, W. & Z. R. Co. v. Clinton County, 1 Ohio St. 77; Boyd v. Bryant, 35 Ark. 69, 37 Am. Rep. 6; State v. Wilcox, 42 Conn. 364, 19 Am. Rep. 536; Caldwell v. Barrett, 73 Ga. 604; Com. v. Weller, 14 Bush, 218, 29 Am. Rep. 407; Gayle v. Owen County Court, 83 Ky. 61; Com. v. Bennett, 108 Mass. 27; Com. v. Dean, 110 Mass. 357; State v. Cooke, 24 Minn. 247, 31 Am. Rep. 344; Rohrbacher v. Jackson, 51 Miss. 735; Schulherr v. Bordeaux, 64 Miss. 59, 8 So. 201; State ex rel. Dome v. Wilcox, 45 Mo. 458; State ex rel. Maggard v. Pond, 93 Mo. 606, 6 S. W. 469; State v. Noyes, 30 N. H. 279; State ex rel. Sandford v. Common Pleas Court, 36 N. J. L. 72, 13 Am. Rep. 422; Clark v. Rochester, 24 Barb. 446, 28 N. Y. 605; State ex rel. Atty. Gen. v. O'Neill, 24 Wis. 149. There are cases, of which Ex parte Wall, 48 Cal. 279, 17 Am. Rep. 425, is perhaps the strongest, opposed to this view. It is true; but the very great weight, as the above numerous authorities will attest, is in support of it.

As the law stood at the time of the adoption of the act, no person was permitted to sell spirituous liquors in the state in less quantities than one gallon without having obtained a license from the county court of the proper county for the purpose, which provisions are without application to cities and incorporated towns. The mode prescribed for securing such license is for the applicant to procure the signatures of an actual majority of the whole number of legal voters in the precinct in which he is desirous of carrying on the business; and, upon the production of such a petition and a compliance with other provisions, the county court is authorized to grant the license. The cities and incorporated towns are governed in the issuance of licenses of the kind by their several charters and ordinances. All these provisions remain operative, and are unaffected by the local-option act, now under consideration, unless the people, by a majority vote in the precinct, ward, or district involved, determine the contingency upon which the sale of intoxicating liquors shall be absolutely prohibited in such district. Sandys v. Williams, 80 Pac. 642, recently decided by this court. If the vote be against prohibition, then the old law—both the general statute and the local acts and ordinances pertaining to incorporated towns and cities—remains operative; but, if for prohibition, then its operation is suspended within the district until the people again vote against prohibition, as is firmly established by the foregoing authorities. The present law, when enacted, was complete in itself, requiring nothing else to give it validity. It became effective as a law from the time of its enactment. All its provisions were then susceptible of unrestricted operation. When the time came for 10 per cent of the voters of any authorized district to petition the county court to order an election, a way was provided and open; and so the very steps are prescribed in their regular order until an election determines the question of the expediency or in expediency of enforcing prohibition within the district involved. The law provides for all these things, and this it did as it came from the people duly adopted. It is not the election that breathes into the act its validity or vitality. The act is complete, and an active, living force without it; but the election as is designed, and which is constituted a part of the machinery of the law, does contribute to designate or determine the contingency upon which prohibition shall become operative or not, according to the popular will in the locality or localities where invoked. The new law is but supplementary to the old. It does not repeal or amend the old, or any portion of it, although it may suspend it for the time being, but not to eradicate it, or permanently to change its functions. Schulherr v. Bordeaux, supra. Suppose the two were adopted by the same statute, so that there was but one act instead of two or more, operating as an harmonious whole, would anyone doubt its constitutional efficacy or validity? It then would be license if applied for in the way prescribed, or prohibition, as the popular will might determine as to the expediency or in expediency in the premises. So it is now, and thus the matter is so simplified that none can fail to comprehend fully its operation. The wording of the act is not aptly devised, as it reads that "in every county, subdivision of a county, or precinct thereof, that shall return a majority vote for prohibition, . . . the law shall take effect on the 1st day of January," or "the 1st day of July," as the case may be; but the undoubted intentment is that prohibition shall become operative or not within the territory involved, dependent on the contingency to be determined by a vote of the people concerned, and is clearly distinguishable on principle from the act which was declared invalid in the early case of Barto v. Himrod, 8 N. Y. 483, 59 Am. Dec. 506, because of the provision that "it should or should not become a law," dependent upon a majority vote of the people of the state. Such an act would have been clearly inimical to our Constitution, as being made to take effect upon authority other than that prescribed in the instrument itself. But not so here. The act being general, it is also such by nature as that it may have local operation, and is not inhibited, as we have before observed, by any provision of § 23 of article 4 of the Constitution. It does not, as is suggested, provide for a different rule for the punishment of crimes and misdemeanors, nor does it in any measure regulate the practice of the courts of justice. The crime or misdemeanor prescribed or created for a violation of the prohibition order is alike and uniform all over the state, and so it is with such as are prescribed for a violation of the old law if prohibition is not ordered. The suggestion is therefore untenable.

But it is urged that the proviso annexed to § 21, art. 1, indicated a different intentment than such as we are disposed to attribute thereto. After reciting, "nor shall any law be passed, the taking effect of which," etc., the section continues: "Provided that the laws locating the capital of the state, locating county seats, and submitting town and corporate acts and other local and special laws, may take effect or not, upon a vote of the electors interested." The argument of counsel is based upon the fact that an amendment was proposed in the convention by inserting after the word "acts" contained in this latter clause the words "prohibitory liquor laws," and was voted down; from which he concludes that it was the intentment that no prohibitory liquor law should be made to take effect upon a vote of the people. This is true in a sense. The mover of the amendment intended, no doubt, to create an exception to the preceding provision so as to permit prohibitory liquor laws to take effect or not upon a vote of the people,—that is, a general law providing for that, and nothing else; but as the section now stands, considered in connection with § 23 of article 4, there is nothing to prevent the adoption of a local or special law inhibiting the sale of intoxicating liquors within any precinct, county, ward, or city in the state; and the fact that the present law may become operative locally, and not generally, is aptly in accord with the very spirit and letter of the Constitution. We have come to this conclusion after a very careful consideration of the reading of the Constitution, and are convinced that its soundness is established upon principle by the vast weight of the more recent authorities. Lafayette, M. & B. R. Co. v. Geiger, 34 Ind. 185, is especially instructive in this view.

With the wisdom, policy, and expediency of the legislation the courts can have nothing to do. That is a matter purely and solely for another department of state,—the lawmaking body, the legislative assembly,—or, under the initiative and referendum amendment, for the people themselves to determine, and their determination in that regard is final and conclusive, save by an appeal to the same authority or department.

The judgment of the Circuit Court should be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

Petition for rehearing denied.

TEXAS COURT OF CRIMINAL APPEALS.

MAX KELLER, Appt.,

v.

STATE OF TEXAS.

(.... Tex. Crim. App.)

1. Local option—sales in nonprohibitive territory.

Under a constitutional provision that the people of any locality may prohibit the sale of intoxicating liquors "within the prescribed limits" of the precinct or county, the legislature cannot prohibit the sale, in other

Case Note.—The view taken in the above case, that a command to the legislature to enact certain laws impliedly prohibits it from legislating on the subject in other particulars, which otherwise would have been within its power, is also supported by the following authorities: Holley v. State, 14 Tex. App. 505, holds that the express provision of the Texas Constitution, that the legislature shall enact a law whereby the qualified voters of any county, precinct, town, or city may determine from time to time whether the "sale" of intoxicating liquors shall be prohibited within the prescribed limits, impliedly prohibits the legislature from passing an act prohibiting the "gift" of liquor within the prescribed limits. Stallworth v. State, 16 Tex. App. 345, and Steele v. State, 19 Tex. App. 428, follow the Holley Case in denying the power of the legislature, under such constitutional provision, to prohibit the "gift" of intoxicating liquors. Ninenger v. State, 25 Tex. App. 449, 8 S. W. 480, holds that a provision for submitting to the people of any district the question of prohibiting the sale, or "exchange," of intoxicating liquors was beyond localities, of intoxicants to be shipped into territory which has adopted prohibition.

2. Same—C. O. D. sales.

The legislature cannot enact that all C. O. D. sales shall be deemed to have been made at the place of destination, if it is local option territory, under a constitutional provision permitting the people of any locality to prohibit the sale of intoxicants within the limits of the town or precinct adopting the law.

3. Sale—shipment C. O. D.

The sale is completed where the order is received and filled, where a person in one place sends an order for intoxicating liquor to another place, to be sent C. O. D.

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Hill County Court convicting him of violating the local option law. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Collins & Cummings, for appellant:

The locus of a sale in a C. O. D. shipment is at the point of shipment.

Messrs. Etheridge & Baker, also for appellant:

A wholesale liquor dealer, legally conducting his business as such in a county where local option does not prevail, commits no offense by accepting and filling an order emanating from a party in a local-option county, requesting a C. O. D. shipment to him of a specified amount of liquor. In such case the sale is consummated at the domicile of the vendor, and no sale is made within the local-option territory.

the power of the legislature under the same provision. Ex parte Brown, 38 Tex. Crim. Rep. 295, 70 Am. St. Rep. 743, 42 S. W. 554, denies the power of the legislature, under such provision, to pass an act making it a crime to keep intoxicating liquor in cold storage, by one citizen for another, in a local-option territory. State v. Gilman, 33 W. Va. 146, 6 L. R. A. 847, 10 S. E. 283, holds the provision of W. Va. Const. art. 6, § 46, that laws may be passed "regulating or prohibiting" the sale of intoxicating liquors within the state, an implied prohibition against the power of the legislature to pass an act providing that no person shall, without a state license, "keep in his possession for another spirituous liquors." People ex rel. Mooney v. Hutchinson, 172 Ill. 486, 42 L. R. A. 770, 50 N. E. 599, holds the provision of Ill. Const. art. 4, § 6, that the general assembly shall apportion the state every ten years, beginning with 1871, by dividing the population as ascertained by the Federal census, a prohibition against a change in apportionment within the ten years. This case is cited in Cooley, Const. Lim. 7th ed. p. 115, in support of the principle that, if directions are given in a Constitution respecting the times or modes of proceeding in which a power should be exercised, there is at least a strong presumption that the people designed it should be exercised in that time and mode only. Denney v. State, 144 Ind. 503, 31 L. R. A. 726, 42 N. E. 929 holds the same way, under the provision of Ind. Const. art. 4, § 4, for an apportionment by the general assembly at its second session after the adoption of the Constitution and every six years thereafter.

view. Koester v. Atchison County, 44 Kan. 141, 24 Pac. 65, holds the creation of county high schools not prohibited by the provision of Kan. Const. art. 6, § 2, requiring the legislature to establish a uniform system of common schools and schools of a higher grade, embracing normal, preparatory, collegiate, and university departments; even if high schools are not embraced in the latter provision. Curryer v. Merrill, 25 Minn. 1, 33 Am. Rep. 450, holds that the provision of Minn. Const. art. 8, § 1, that the legislature shall establish a general and uniform system of public schools, does not prohibit it from providing other public schools in addition to those included in the general system, nor from creating, by way of exception to the general uniformity, special school districts to meet particular and exceptional cases. State ex rel. Lamar v. Jacksonville Terminal Co. 41 Fla. 377, 27 So. 225, holds that the provision of Fla. Const. art. 16, § 30, requiring the legislature to provide for enforcing, "by adequate penalties and forfeitures," laws passed to prevent discrimination and excessive charges by common carriers, does not, by implication, prevent the legislature from authorizing the use of mandamus to enforce the duties imposed by such laws. And Brown v. Com. 98 Ky. 652, 34 S. W. 12, holds that the provision of Ky. Const. § 61, requiring the general assembly to provide, by general law, a means for taking the sense of the voters of any county, city, town, district, or precinct as to whether liquor shall be sold, does not deprive it of the power to permit or prohibit sales until such time as the sense of the people can be taken in the manner prescribed by law.

Messrs. Greenwood & Traylor and Howard Martin for the State.

Davidson, P. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The facts disclose that appellant shipped from West, in McLennan county, to 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Pat Moore, at Hillsboro, in Hill county, some whisky C. O. D., on an order previously given by Pat Moore to appellant. The conviction occurred in Hill county for a violation of the local-option law. There is no question as to the fact that this was an ordinary C. O. D. contract or order. So we have practically the sole question as to where a sale under this character of contract occurs. Contracts are matters of fact, to be decided by the terms and stipulations of the contracts and intent of the contracting parties. Where the question of presumption may be one arising in the case, that presumption will be taken in favor of the accused, under the broad theory of the presumption of innocence and the reasonable doubt of guilt which obtains in all trials of criminal cases. Even in civil cases it will not be presumed that parties deliberately enter into an agreement or make a contract, knowing or intending that it shall be invalid or violative of the law. Ryan v. Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. 65 Tex. 16, 57 Am. Rep. 589. The place of sale often becomes a very material question in construing contracts. "The test is generally held to be the acquiescence or final agreement of minds by which the contract is concluded, and the place where that occurs is the place where the contract, for most purposes, is held to have been made." Fidelity Mut. Life Assn. v. Harris, 94 Tex. 25, 86 Am. St. Rep. 813, 57 S. W. 635. In Cleveland v. Williams, 29 Tex. 204, 94 Am. Dec. 274, it is said: "By the common law, if a seller make a proposition, and the buyer accept, and the goods are in the possession of the seller, and nothing remains to be done to identify them or in anyway prepare them for delivery, the sale is complete, and the property in the goods passes at once. The buyer acquires not a mere jus ad rem, but an absolute jus in re, and he may demand delivery at once on tender of the price, and sue for the goods as his own if delivery be refused. . . . The goods sold must be ascertained, designated, and separated from the stock or quantity with which they are mixed before the property can pass. . . . Until this be done, it is merely a sale without a subject-matter in esse, which cannot take effect in presenti." So, where the party sells a certain stipulated amount of property, to be segregated from a general stock, the sale is complete when the amount of property agreed upon has been so set apart, and the title at once passes to the buyer. However, if there are other conditions to pass title, it will not pass until compliance with such conditions. For instance, if, in addition to the segregation from the general stock, it is stipulated that the seller shall convey and turn it over to a common carrier, the title will not pass until it has been received by the common carrier. This was decided in Woods v. Half, 44 Tex. 633. After it has then been received by the common carrier, the title is in the purchaser.

In Waples v. Overaker, 77 Tex. 7, 19 Am. St. Rep. 727, 13 S. W. 527, appellants were millers doing business in the city of Sherman, and contracted with appellees to buy wheat at the market price in Collin county, where they lived. Seven car loads of wheat were bought by appellees under this contract, and shipped to appellants, who refused to receive the wheat on its arrival at Sherman. The court said: "There may have been such constructive delivery and existence of such other facts as would have vested title to the wheat in appellants; but they cannot claim, under the facts shown, that such an absolute delivery had been made as would defeat the lien of appellees for the purchase money." Again: "As the wheat stood in the cars, appellants refusing to receive and pay for it, it was the right of appellees to hold it until its price was paid, as they might have done, had the wheat not been shipped to Sherman. Appellants having refused to receive and pay for the wheat, appellees might have retained it, and recovered the difference between the contract price and the market price at time and place of delivery, or they might have held the property for appellants at their risk, and recovered the purchase money," etc. See also Voelcker v. McKay (Tex. Civ. App.) 61 S. W. 424.

In Specialty Furniture Co. v. Kingsbury (Tex. Civ. App.) 60 S. W. 1030, the court, speaking through Judge Pleasants, said: "The contract of sale was complete when appellant accepted the order for the goods, and a delivery of the goods on the car at Evansville, Indiana, would have been a delivery to the appellee, and the title to the goods would have passed to appellee by such delivery."

In Irvin v. Edwards, 92 Tex. 258, 47 S. W. 719, there was a contract between Irvin and Jennings by which Irvin contracted to sell Jennings certain cattle. A small portion of the purchase money was paid; the remaining instalments to be paid as the cattle were delivered. The cattle were not delivered until after the 1st of January, 1895; the contract having been entered into on the 18th day of the previous September. The question in the case was whether Irvin, the vendor, or Jennings, the vendee, was liable for the taxes for 1895 on the cattle. It was contended that, as possession was surrendered subsequent to January 1, 1895, Irvin was liable for the taxes. Suit was instituted by Irvin to restrain Sheriff Edwards from enforcing the collection of the taxes. The district court issued a temporary injunction, which was subsequently perpetuated. The court of civil appeals (45 S. W. 1026) reversed the judgment and dissolved the injunction. On writ of error the supreme court reversed the judgment of the court of civil appeals, and affirmed the judgment of the district court. Passing on the question, the supreme court uses this language: "The court of civil appeals held that, construing the whole instrument, the intention [that is, of passing the title] thus manifested was shown not to exist in fact, but that the parties intended the title should not vest until delivery should be made: It is true that only a part of the purchase money was paid at the time, and the contract prescribed that the remainder of the purchase money should be paid in instalments as the cattle should be delivered. This does not prove that the parties intended the title to remain in Irvin until delivery: It was not at all unusual in such transactions to so provide, but was a reasonable arrangement for completing the payments of the price."

In Greif v. Seligman (Tex. Civ. App.) 82 S. W. 534, this language is used: "In the absence of an express or implied agreement, it is the general rule that, as between the parties, if the goods are delivered to a carrier by a seller, it is a delivery to the buyer, and a fortiori to one specially designated, by the buyer. The rule is that stated in Wheelhouse v. Parr, 141 Mass. 593, 6 N. E. 787: 'When goods ordered and contracted for are not directly delivered to the purchaser, but are to be sent to him by the vendor, and the vendor delivers to the carrier, to be transported in the mode agreed on by the parties or directed by the purchaser; or, when no agreement is made or direction given, to be transported in the usual mode; or when the purchaser, being informed of the mode of transportation, assents to it; or when there have been previous sales of other goods, to the transportation of which in a similar manner the purchaser has not objected,—the goods, when delivered to the carrier, are at the risk of the purchaser; and the property is deemed to be vested in him, subject to the vendor's right of stoppage in transitu.' If, however, there be an express agreement that the vendor must actually deliver the goods at the point of destination, and not to be paid for unless so delivered, it would be binding upon the parties; and a delivery to the carrier would not be sufficient. From the testimony of Julius Seligman, a jury might possibly be justified in concluding that such a contract was made. . . . Further, if it had been shown that no route had been designated, the delivery of the goods to the carrier was a delivery to appellee, in the absence of an agreement requiring the actual delivery of the goods to appellee in Seguin. Should the contract of purchase be silent as to the person or mode by which the goods are to be sent, a delivery by the vendor to a common carrier, in the usual and ordinary course of business, transfers the property to the vendee. Mechem, Sales, § 736, and authorities cited."

Authorities along this line might be multiplied indefinitely.

Mr. Benjamin, in his work on Sales, 7th ed. § 362, says: "In 1803, in the case of Dutton v. Solomonson, it was treated as already settled law that, where a vendor delivers goods to a carrier by order of the purchaser, the appropriation is determined, the delivery to the carrier is a delivery to the vendee, and the property vests immediately. And in the United States the law is established to the same effect;" citing in the note supporting this proposition 3 Bos. & P. 582, per Lord Alvanley, Ch. J. And see Cork Distilleries Co. v. Great Southern & W. R. Co. L. R. 7 H. L. 269; Johnson v. Lancashire & Y. R. Co. L. R. 3 C. P. Div. 499, where, under somewhat curious circumstances, the same rule was applied; Krulder v. Ellison, 47 N. Y. 36, 7 Am. Rep. 402; Pacific Iron Works v. Long Island R. Co. 62 N. Y. 272; Mee v. McNider, 39 Hun, 345. On page 349 of the same work, in the note headed, "American Note. §§ 358-380," these cases are cited: "The American law fully agrees with the English that a delivery to a carrier, as directed by the purchaser, or as warranted by custom and usage, is such an appropriation as to bind the vendor, and make the goods the property of the vendee from the moment of such delivery; and the risk thenceforth is on him. This has been settled law in Texas from the beginning. See also Smith v. Whitfield, 67 Tex. 126, 2 S. W. 822; Ballinger Nat. Bank v. Bryan, 12 Tex. Civ. App. 674, 34 S. W. 451; *Owens v. These authorities establish beyond controversy the law in Texas to be that wherever, under a contract, the goods are turned over to the common carrier or the transporting agent by the vendor, to be carried to the vendee, unless there be some contingencies defeating or withholding the title in the vendor, it immediately passes to the vendee; and the seller has the right to collect his money from the purchaser, although lost in transit. There are only a few cases in the United States which hold to the contrary, and none in Texas of which we are aware. The same rule applies to the ordinary C. O. D. shipment.

Mr. Justice Field, in O'Neil v. Vermont, 144 U. S. 345, 36 L. ed. 460, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 701, uses this language: "Transactions like those in controversy—that is, purchases of small quantities of goods upon orders, the packages to be shipped by the vendor, with a direction to collect the amount of the price on delivery—take place in this country every month to the amount of millions of dollars. Orders are sent all over the country for articles of small bulk; to California for fruits and wines, to Florida for oranges, to Kentucky for whiskies, and to the dealers in our large cities in general merchandise for small parcels of different kinds. They are transmitted without hesitation by the vendors upon the receipt of such orders, often even without knowledge of the parties sending them, their security being the retention of a lien upon the property shipped until the cash is actually paid. Amazement would strike the large class of merchants engaged in transmitting goods in this way from one portion of the country to another if they were told that they thereby rendered themselves liable to the penal statutes of the states to which the goods were sent in compliance with the orders of the purchasers, and might be prosecuted for criminal offenses committed in those states, which they had never visited, and with whose laws they never intended to interfere." These views were subsequently adopted by the entire court in the case of Norfolk & W. R. Co. v. Sims, 191 U. S. 446, 48 L. ed. 256, 24 Sup. Ct. Rep. 151; and in the later case of American Exp. Co. v. Iowa, 196 U. S. 133, 49 L. ed. 417, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 182. This has now become the settled rule by the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States.

The same rule is laid down in Black on Intoxicating Liquors. Section 267 of that work says: "It frequently becomes important to localize a sale of liquor, in order to determine whether the transaction must be regarded as taking place in the foreign state, where it would be lawful, or in the state of the forum, where it would be illegal. Many elements may enter into the determination of this question, but those most important to be considered are the place where the order was given, the place where delivery is made, and the character of the sale, as final or conditional." And in § 208 the same author says: "It is generally held that where a person living and doing business in one state sends his agent into another state to solicit orders for goods, and the agent there takes orders and sends them to his principal's place of business, and the latter fills the orders, and, without any special arrangement as to the manner and place of delivery, delivers them to a carrier in his own state, to be transported at the expense of the purchaser to the latter's place, the place of sale is in the state where the agent's principal does business." And in § 434 it is said: "The privilege conferred by a license to sell liquor is territorially restricted. And the license affords no justification for a sale made beyond the limits to which it is applicable. For instance, a person who has a license to sell in one county, and sells in another, may be indicted for selling without a license. In cases arising under this rule the vital question is almost always the determination of the place of the sale. And in this connection we find the following rules established or recognized by the best authorities: (1) Where a liquor dealer has a license from the city or county in which his store is kept, he may send out agents and take orders in any part of the state, for goods to be selected and forwarded from the stock kept in such store; and he is not required to obtain a license from the authorities of each city or county in which contracts are made therefor by such agents.

(2) A licensed dealer, who receives at his place of business an order for liquor from a place in which he has no license, and fills it by selecting the liquor from his stock and delivering it to an express company or other carrier, to be carried to the purchaser, does not violate the license law, although the carrier agrees to collect and return the price; for the sale is made at the place where the goods are separated from the general stock and delivered to the carrier, such delivery being delivery to the consignee. (3) Irrespective of the place where the bargain was made or the order received, if the seller, by his own hands or the hands of his servant or agent, carries the liquor to the purchaser, without any intermediate delivery to or through a common carrier, and delivers the liquor to the purchaser at the latter's place, and there receives the pay for it, the sale is made at the place of delivery; and, if the vendor is not licensed to sell there, he is indictable. (4) If an order for liquor is given by a person in A to an agent of a dealer, who has a license to sell liquor in B, and received by the agent subject to his principal's approval, and the liquor is put up by the seller, directed to the buyer at A, and delivered to a carrier at B, the sale is regarded as made at B, and is not unlawful."

In Com. v. Fleming, 130 Pa. 138, 5 L. R. A. 470, 17 Am. St. Rep. 763, 18 Atl. 622, the majority opinion held, in accordance with the views expressed by this court, commencing with Bruce v. State, 36 Tex. Crim. Rep. 53, 35 S. W. 383, 39 S. W. 683, that the sale is at the point of shipment, and not at the point of destination, and that the seller simply retains the lien upon the goods so shipped, and uses the C. O. D. method as a convenient one for the collection of the money,—the contract price. See also Black, Intoxicating Liquors, § 434. The doctrine is clearly declared in State v. Flanagan, 38 W. Va. 53, 22 L. R. A. 430, 45 Am. St. Rep. 836, 17 S. E. 792. For a collation of some of the authorities supporting the decisions of this court, see 22 L. R. A., note on page 426; *Kelsea v. In James v. Com. 102 Ky. 108, 42 S. W. 1107, the court of appeals of Kentucky uses this language: "The sole question involved is whether the sale was made in the county of Rockcastle or in Lincoln county. This precise question was determined in Com. v. Russell, 11 Ky. L. Rep. 576; and it was held that, where whisky ordered by letter was shipped from one county to another by express, C. O. D., the sale took place in the county in which the whisky was delivered to the carrier, and was not a violation of a prohibitory liquor law in force in the county to which it was shipped;" citing 2 Kent, Com. 492; Crawford v. Smith, 7 Dana, 60; Sweeney v. Owsley, 14 B. Mon. 413; Duncan v. Lewis, 1 Duv. 184. The same conclusions are reached by the superior court in a number of other similar cases. Prof. Benjamin, in his recent Principles of Sales (p. 86), states the rule thus: "Where goods are ordered and shipped C. O. D. (collect on delivery) the carrier is said to be the agent of the buyer to receive the goods from the seller, and the agent of the seller to collect the price from the buyer; and the sale is complete when the goods are delivered to the carrier."

It seems to be well settled that, if the goods are delivered under a C. O. D. shipment without collecting the price of the goods, the common carrier would be responsible to the seller for the price, or the seller could sue the purchaser for the contract price. Shipment C. O. D. does not retain title to the property, but it is simply in the nature of a lien,—the common carrier being intrusted by the seller with the power of collection,—and, as the authorities put it, it is but a convenient method for collecting the price of the goods already sold. This is the view taken by courts in Texas without a single exception, in an unbroken line of decisions. Judge Brooks, however, marked his dissent in Sinclair v. State (Tex. Crim. App.) 77 S. W. 621.

Presiding Judge Hurt's opinion in Bruce v. State, 36 Tex. Crim. Rep. 53, 35 S. W. 383, 39 S. W. 683, in the judgment of the writer, is one of the clearest to be found in all the books on this question, and lays down the rule as above stated. After citing the authorities, Judge Hurt says: "Tested by these rules, it would appear that, if there was no special contract between the parties, but a mere order by the purchaser at Gordon to the seller at Weatherford to ship beer to him C. O. D., the sale was completed at Weatherford." In the Bruce Case, however, there were circumstances or portions of the contract which rendered it not an ordinary C. O. D. sale. It was stipulated in that case, if the beer should sour or be lost, the seller was to stand the loss, and the beer should remain the property of the seller until it should be received by the purchaser at Gordon. "This appears to be a stipulation of the contract, and such a stipulation as the parties had a right to make." It was further said: "We cannot make a contract for the parties, or undo one that they may have made, no matter what we may conceive their purpose or intention to have been. Parties who are competent to trade can make their own contracts, stipulate as to terms, and can make such terms as are not illegal. The contradicted stipulation in this regard is that the beer in question was to remain the property of the seller until its delivery to the purchaser at Gordon, and the sale consequently was not an executed sale until the delivery of the beer to the purchaser at the latter place; and, the sale not being a completed sale until the delivery of the beer at Gordon the transaction was not in violation of the local-option law at Weatherford." It was further said: "We understand the weight of authorities hold that, if goods such as liquors are ordered to be shipped from one point to a buyer at another C. O. D. by common carrier, the sale is considered as completed at the point of shipment;" citing many of the cases already cited. Bruce was shipping from Weatherford, which was a local-option territory. If the sale was made at Weatherford, Bruce could have carried on his liquor trade at that place though it was under operation of the local-option law.

The same rule was followed in Freshman v. State, 37 Tex. Crim. Rep. 126, 38 S. W. 1007. The writer hereof wrote the opinion in that case. When the Bruce and Freshman Cases were decided, the court consisted of Judge Hurt, Judge Henderson, and the writer. The question was again decided by this court in Weathered v. State, 1 Tex. Ct. Rep. 655, 60 S. W. 876, and Treadaway v. State, 42 Tex. Crim. Rep. 466, 62 S. W. 574. The personnel of the court had then changed, Judge Brooks having succeeded Judge Hurt. This language is found in Weathered's Case: "The evidence discloses that within the local-option territory appellant gave an order to a party in Hillsboro, outside the territory in question, for a half gallon of whisky, to be sent by express C. O. D.; the purchaser paying express charges. This does not constitute a sale within the inhibited territory. Bruce v. State, 36 Tex. Crim. Rep. 53, 35 S. W. 383, 39 S. W. 683; Freshman v. State, 37 Tex. Crim. Rep. 126, 38 S. W. 1007; State v. Carl, 43 Ark. 353, 51 Am. Rep. 565; Pilgreen v. State, 71 Ala. 368; State v. Flanagan, 38 W. Va. 53, 22 L. R. A. 430, 45 Am. St. Rep. 836, 17 S. E. 792; Kelsea v. Ramsey & G. Mfg. Co. 22 L. R. A. 415, and notes on pages 425, 426 (55 N. J. L. 320, 26 Atl. 907); Garbracht v. Com. 96 Pa. 449, 42 Am. Rep. 550; Com. v. Fleming, 130 Pa. 138, 5 L. R. A. 470, 17 Am. St. Rep. 763, 18 Atl. 622; Boothby v. Plaisted, 51 N. H. 436, 12 Am. Rep. 140; McComb v. Doe, 8 Smedes & M. 510; Higgins v. Murray, 73 N. Y. 252; 21 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 511." This was written by the writer hereof, and rendered February 6, 1901. On the same day Treadaway v. State was decided, the opinion being delivered by Judge Brooks. In that opinion this language is found: "We do not think the court erred in refusing this charge. This court has heretofore held that, when whisky is shipped to a party C. O. D., the moment it is placed in the express office it becomes the property of the consignee; and this is clearly true the moment the consignee receipts the express company for the same, and pays the C. O. D. charges thereon. Hence the court did not err in refusing this charge;" citing Freshman v. State, 37 Tex. Crim. Rep. 126, 38 S. W. 1007; Bruce v. State, 36 Tex. Crim. Rep. 53, 35 S. W. 383, 39 S. W. 683. As before stated, this case and the Weathered Cases were decided the same day by this court. To the same effect is Bills v. State, 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

(Tex. Crim. App.) 3 Tex. Ct. Rep. 227, 64 S. W. 1047. This opinion was written by Judge Henderson on October 30, 1901. Davidson v. State, 44 Tex. Crim. Rep. 586, 73 S. W. 808, rendered on March 25, 1903,—the opinion written also by Judge Henderson,—followed the previous authorities.

There were some comments in the Sinclair Case (Tex. Crim. App.) 77 S. W. 621, in regard to the question of C. O. D. This was decided on November 25, 1903; but, on motion for rehearing, it was expressly stated that the Sinclair Case was not a C. O. D. sale, and therefore the question was not there decided. In the Sinclair Case Judge Brooks entered a general dissent, without specifying his reasons, as he did in James v. State (Tex. Crim. App.) 78 S. W. 951. This latter case was also written by Judge Henderson on February 10, 1904. Judge Brooks wrote the opinion in Kirby v. State (Tex. Crim. App.) 80 S. W. 1007, on May 4, 1904. It followed the cases cited, and the unbroken line of authorities in this state.

Sedgwick v. State (Tex. Crim. App.) 12 Tex. Ct. Rep. 455, 85 S. W. 813, decided at the Dallas term, 1905, was written by the writer of this opinion, in which two propositions were decided: First, that the case came within the purview of the interstate commerce clause of the Constitution of the United States, and was not, therefore, a violation of the law of Texas; and, second, being a C. O. D. shipment, the sale was at the point of shipment, in Missouri, and not at the point of destination, in Texas. Judge Brooks concurred in the opinion as to the interstate shipment, and dissented as to the place of sale; holding the sale to be at the point of destination. There have been several cases decided since the Sedgwick Case on the same line. See also Weldon v. State, 36 Tex. Crim. Rep. 34, 35 S. W. 176.

This seems to be the history of this question, viewed from the standpoint of the decisions of this court, where the sale was under a C. O. D. contract.

We have another line of decisions in this state. Treadaway v. State, 42 Tex. Crim. Rep. 466, 62 S. W. 574; Young v. State (Tex. Crim. App.) 4 Tex. Ct. Rep. 90, 66 S. W. 567; Ashley v. State (Tex. Crim. App.) 80 S. W. 1015; Cantwell v. State (Tex. Crim. App.) 85 S. W. 18; Dunn v. State (Tex. Crim. App.) 86 S. W. 326; Beall v. State (Tex. Crim. App.) 86 S. W. 334, decided at Dallas term, 1905. These decisions hold that, where a shipment is made C. O. D., without a contract between the shipper and the consignee, the sale is at the point of destination, if the property is there accepted by the consignee or someone designated by him. So the difference between those two questions turned upon whether or not there was a contract. Under the Young, Ashley, Cantwell, and Dunn Cases, there being no contract, the goods belonged to the shipper or seller, and the common carrier was his agent to carry to the alleged consignee, who was not a party to the contract until his acceptance. Therefore the express company was the agent of the seller or shipper to carry and tender the goods to the consignee, and, upon acceptance by the consignee of the goods at the point of destination, it became a sale at that point. Upon the latter line of cases the court has been united and harmonious. This much in regard to place of sale.

On April 17, 1901, the governor approved an act of the twenty-seventh legislature (Acts 1901, p. 262), which went into effect ninety days after the adjournment of the legislature, which is as follows: "Art. 402a. That in all contracts of sale and shipment of intoxicating liquor from any point in this state to any other point within this state located in any county, justice precinct, city, or town, or subdivision in which the sale of intoxicating liquor has been prohibited, under the laws of this state, where the terms of said contract is C. O. D. or 'Collect on delivery,' that the same is and shall be a sale at the point where said goods are delivered and paid for; and provided, further, that where orders are solicited for intoxicating liquor in any territory within this state, where the sale of intoxicating liquor has been prohibited by law and such order is subsequently filled, the sale shall be construed to have been made at the place where such order was solicited.

"Sec. 2. Whereas, there is now no law adequately regulating the sale of intoxicating liquor in territory where the sale of intoxicating liquor is prohibited by law, creates an emergency and an imperative public necessity that the constitutional rule requiring bills to be read on three several days be suspended and that said rule is hereby suspended and this act take effect and be in force from and after its passage and it is enacted."

Now it will be noted that, until the Sinclair Case (Tex. Crim. App.) 77 S. W. 621, was decided, in November, 1903, the Texas Reports, criminal and civil, so far as we have been able to ascertain, furnish no dissenting opinion from the rule announced in Bruce, Freshman, and that line of cases. So, until more than two years after this act of the legislature, it was unquestionably the law, without dissent, that the sale was at the point of shipment, and not at the point of destination, and appellate courts in this state had never questioned that rule. The passage by the legislature of the above act cannot but be regarded as an express recognition that the rule of law was so well and thoroughly settled and recognized that the sale was at the point of shipment that it required legislation to change it; else this act was totally unnecessary. By the passage of this act that body undertook to set aside the well-settled law as understood from the beginning in Texas. It is not only an express recognition by the legislative body that such was the law as to the place where the sale occurred generally, but it is further an express recognition of the fact that, in passing the act, they were culling from this general law, and making an exception thereto, sales of intoxicating liquor. They also thoroughly understood that they were leaving by this act the law as settled in regard to all other sales except intoxicating liquors. Not only so, but that act is further an express recognition of the fact by that body that the sale of all intoxicants should be under the law as it had been always, except where that sale occurred by virtue of a C. O. D. contract or shipment. We have held this act unconstitutional, and upon a review of the question we have been confirmed in the correctness of that conclusion. The provision of the Constitution in regard to local option only authorizes the people of a county, a justice precinct, city, or town, etc., to prohibit the sale of the intoxicants "within the prescribed limits;" that is, the limits of the territory in which the law has been voted into operation. They could vote on no other proposition, except the prohibition of the sale of the intoxicants "within the prescribed limits" or given territory, because this is the extent of the constitutional authority. The inclusion of this matter is the exclusion of all others. This would prohibit the legislature or the people voting on local option prohibiting the sale outside the "prescribed limits." Therefore, if the sale occurs outside the local-option territory, the legislature has no authority to prohibit the purchaser from carrying such intoxicants into the prohibited territory. The question is one only of sale within the local-option limits. The Constitution does not make, or undertake to make, contracts between individuals; nor does it interfere with the right of contract; nor does it undertake to impair the obligation of contracts. It simply prohibited the sale within such territory.

In this connection, the Constitution did not undertake to give the word "sale" a definition contrary to its ordinary acceptance, any more than that same instrument undertook to give the word "jeopardy" a different definition from that in which it was ordinarily understood when placed in that instrument. In Powell v.

State, 17 Tex. App. 345, it was expressly held that the legislature could not change the meaning of the word "jeopardy," as understood when the Constitution was adopted. See also Baltimore v. Horn, 26 Md. 194; People ex rel. Butler v. Saginaw County, 26 Mich. 22; 8 Cyc. Law & Proc. pp. 725, 810; Lindsay v. United States Sav. & L. Asso. 120 Ala. 156, 42 L. R. A. 783, 24 So. 171; State ex rel. Richey v. McGrath, 95 Mo. 193, 8 S. W. 425; Wanser v. Hoos, 60 N. J. L. 482, 64 Am. St. Rep. 600, 38 Atl. 449; State ex rel. Kenner v. Spears (Tenn. Ch. App.) 53 S. W. 247. "Sale," used in article 16, § 20, had as thoroughly known and definite meaning as did the expression "intoxicating liquors," used in the same section. The legislature could with as much propriety pass an act defining "intoxicating liquor" entirely destructive of its meaning as used in the Constitution, as it could the definition and meaning of the term "sale" as therein used. The same reasoning which justifies one would authorize the other, and one proposition is as subversive of the Constitution as would be the other.

Those who would sustain the act of the legislature above quoted, defining C. O. D. sales as occurring at point of consignment despite the real contract, would scarcely agree that that body could eliminate "intoxicating liquors" by giving that term a definition out of accord with its ordinary and well-understood meaning as therein employed, or add "liquors" thereto which are not intoxicating.

Where words, terms, or language of the Constitution are plain and definite, there is no room for construction, for such language is self-construing, and to be taken in its ordinary meaning and acceptance at the time of the adoption of the Constitution. If this were not true, the legislature could carve or legislate away the plainest provisions of that instrument, or these provisions could be construed to mean anything to suit the passing fancy of the hour, or as clamor might demand. Above all, there remains this fundamental rule: That, wherever the purpose and intent of the framers of the Constitution is clearly expressed, it will be followed by the courts in construing that instrument. Therefore, we assert with absolute confidence that, looking to the face of this constitutional provision, it is too obvious for discussion it was only placed there to prohibit the sale within the local-option territory. The language is more than all sufficiently plain to indicate such purpose and intent. To hold otherwise would overturn the intent and purpose of the local-option law, for, if one legislature or one court could give a meaning to suit the construing body, then a subsequent court or legislature could give it an entirely different meaning; and the Constitution would not be what the framers made it, but what the passing caprice of a construing body might see proper to make it. "The general principle on which we have heretofore insisted that the meaning of a written law is to be found in its terms, and that we are not at liberty to resort to extrinsic facts and circumstances to ascertain what the framers might have intended, has frequently been declared to apply to the Constitution." Sedgw. Stat. & Const. Law, 2d ed. p. 552. In Sturges v. Crowninshield, Chief Justice Marshall said: It is well settled that the spirit of a Constitution is to be respected no less than its letter; yet that spirit is to be collected from its words, and neither the practice of legislative bodies, nor other extrinsic circumstances, can control its clear language. 4 Wheat. 202, 203, 4 L. ed. 550. The same rule is adopted in the learned opinion in Newell v. People, 7 N. Y. 9. Courts, in the interpretation of Constitutions, have little to do with the argument ab inconvenienti, and should not "bend the Constitution to suit the law of the hour." That inconvenience may and will arise from an adherence to the Constitution may be conceded; but this affords no reason for construing away its provisions. It is not for the courts or legislatures to supply these defects. This is for the people who made that instrument. "If the legislature or the courts may take that office upon themselves, or if, under color of construction, or upon any other specious ground, they may depart from that which is plainly declared, the people may well despair of ever being able to set a boundary to the powers of the government. Written Constitutions will be worse than useless. Believing, as I do, that the success of free institutions depends on a rigid adherence to the fundamental law, I have never yielded to considerations of expediency in expounding it. There is always some plausible reason for the latitudinarian constructions which are resorted to for the purpose of acquiring power,—some evil to be avoided, or some good to be obtained, by pushing the powers of the government beyond their legitimate boundary. It is by yielding to such influences that Constitutions are gradually undermined and finally overthrown. My rule has ever been to follow the fundamental law as it is written, regardless of consequences. If the law does not work well, the people can amend it, and inconveniences can be borne long enough to await that process. But, if the legislature, or the courts, undertake to cure defects by forced and unnatural constructions, they inflict a wound upon the Consti-tion which nothing can heal. One step taken by the legislature or the judiciary in enlarging the powers of the government opens the door for another, which will be sure to follow; and so the process goes on until all respect for the fundamental law is lost, and the powers of the government are just what those in authority please to call them." This was the language of Chief Justice Bronson in Oakley v. Aspinwall, 3 N. Y. 547, 568. These words are well worthy of consideration in these days of latitudinarian construction. No change in public opinion on questions of policy can ever be given any weight in construing the provisions of a Constitution, where the meaning is clear; for the adoption of the construction that might be deemed wise at one time and unwise at another would abrogate the judicial character of the court, and make it the reflex of the popular opinion or the passions of the day. This was the thought expressed by Chief Justice Taney in the celebrated Dred Scott Case, 19 How. 393, 15 L. ed. 691. That case cites Crandall v. State, 10 Conn. 339. Speaking in regard to the wish or will of the people, expressed in the organic law, these words are more than significant. If decisions are to be made to suit the clamor of the hour in one section of the state, then a different clamor coming from another portion of the state would force a contrary ruling, and we would have the same question decided in antagonistic ways, not on the law, but from adverse clamor arising in different sections. The results which would follow from such diverse, but existing, lines of decisions would be more than disastrous. It would be worse than revolution. It would be chaos. The writer knows no will of the people on such questions, save that found in the Constitution. It was the will of the people that made that instrument, and it can only be changed by the same authority.

The history of local option is not of remote date. In 1876, § 20 of article 16 for the first time was embodied in the Constitution. In 1887 there came one of those fierce political struggles which sometimes happen in the change, or attempted change, of the organic law, wherein it was sought to make radical amendments to said § 20. The history of that terrific political struggle is yet well remembered. Its fearful defeat, if it could indicate anything as to the popular will, shows clearly and beyond any question that by about 100,000 majority the popular will was against these amendments; and it stands to-day as originally created, except for the little clause inserted in 1891, extending its operations to such subdivisions of a county as "might be designated by the commissioners' court." The popular will in regard to this matter, therefore, must be found in the Constitution. It stands there as the expression of the will of the majority of our voting population. It is here the "inherent power" of the people speaks. When the writer desires to seek the popular will or the public sentiment in regard to organic law, his recourse is and will be to the provisions of the Constitution, and not to popular clamor. As the plain reading of that instrument is found, it shall be his mission on the bench to declare. If the people want a change in the Constitution, there is a method provided in that instrument by which it can be accomplished. It cannot be done by the legislature, nor by the courts. Whatever decision the court may render, or whatever act the legislature may pass, contrary to the Constitution, is not and cannot be the law; and no attempt ought to be made thus to override the provisions of that instrument.

It is contended that Bogle v. State, 42 Tex. Crim. Rep. 380, 55 S. W. 830, is in conflict with Bruce v. State, 36 Tex. Crim. Rep. 53, 35 S. W. 383, 39 S. W. 683; Freshman v. State, 37 Tex. Crim. Rep. 126, 38 S. W. 1007; Weathered v. State (Tex. Crim. App.) 1 Tex. Ct. Rep. 655, 60 S. W. 876, and Treadaway v. State, 42 Tex. Crim. Rep. 466, 62 S. W. 574, and that line of cases. The Bogle Case did not involve a C. O. D. sale. Nor is it in conflict with the cases mentioned. The Northcutt Case, 35 Tex. Crim. Rep. 584, 34 S. W. 946, and the Bruce Case, 36 Tex. Crim. Rep. 53, 35 S. W. 383, 39 S. W. 683, were cited in support of the Bogle Case. The decision in the Bogle Case held that the sale was in Hunt county, the point of destination, and not in Dallas, the point of shipment. It was said: "If the purchaser was to, and did, deliver the goods in Greenville to the purchaser, Reeves, then it was a sale in Greenville, and not in Dallas, because, under the Bruce Case, the property did not pass until the delivery." While the facts should have been more fully stated, still in the report of the case the reporter makes a statement of the case which shows the contract to be a sale in Greenville. This is in the report of the case along with the decision. The writer of this opinion was also the writer of the opinion in the Bogle Case, and, while the facts could have been more clearly and definitely stated than they were, we thought the profession would understand, where the shipper or seller agrees to and does deliver the goods, that he assumes the risk, and the sale was at the point of destination. In order to be more definite about this matter, and satisfy those who find an apparent contradiction, I have taken the liberty to go to the original case itself, and copy from the statement of facts some of the evidence. The witness Reeves testified: "My beer had been costing me about $9 to $9.50 per cask, and defendant agreed to deliver to me in Greenville at between $8 and $9 per cask, if I would take it. I told him that I would take it, and he went his way. In a few days the beer came. I paid the drayage from the depot in Greenville to the place I was doing business, but the freight was prepaid, according to my contract with the defendant." It is not necessary here to repeat the order, because it is set out in the original opinion. He further testified: "There was nothing said at the time I am testifying about as to a conditional sale. The defendant agreed to deliver the beer in Greenville at a certain price, which I was to pay after the same was delivered and received by me at my place." Bogle himself testified to the written order, and that it was the only order he ever took from Reeves. He used this further language: "The conversation I had with Mr. Reeves is about like he stated it in his testimony." But for the urgent insistence that the opinion in the Bogle Case was contrary to that in the Bruce, Freshman, and that line of cases, I should not have taken the trouble to make these observations. It would hardly be questioned, if the defendant in that case agreed to deliver the goods in Greenville at $8.50, the sale would be there. He did not agree to ship the goods from Dallas in the ordinary way, but curtailed that with the express agreement and statement, as a consideration for the purchase and sale, that his house would deliver the beer in Greenville at that price. Certainly it would not be contended a moment, if the goods had not been delivered on the terms stipulated, that Reeves would in any way become responsible for his contract with appellant was that he was to deliver the goods at Greenville, "to be paid for as sold." There was no responsibility upon Reeves in any manner until the goods were delivered. If the goods had been lost in transit, the loss would not have fallen upon Reeves, but upon the shipper or seller.

The sale in the case at bar occurred in McLennan county. The goods were shipped into the local-option territory of Hill county. We have universally held, and are sustained by the great weight of authority, both Federal and state, including the Supreme Court of the United States, that in such C. O. D. shipments the sale is at the point of shipment. If this is true in interstate commerce, it is true in the shipment between points in the state. The fact that the sale occurred out of the state is the reason for attaching Federal jurisdiction. And this must be so by reason of a contract; otherwise it would not be interstate commerce, for, if a party outside the state ship the goods into Texas without contract, they remain his goods until they reach the point of destination and are accepted by the consignee, and this acceptance would constitute the sale at the point of destination.

In Sedgwick's Case it was held (following the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States and the great weight of authority in number and reason) that an interstate shipment under a C. O. D. contract or sale was at the initial point, and not at its destination. This is the construction placed upon the Wilson act by the Supreme Court of the United States, which act, in regard to the sale of intoxicants, eliminates the sale of the unbroken package at the point of destination, and protected the interstate shipment only between the contracting parties. Under that act, it would seem that the contract is necessary to call into play the exercise of the interstate commerce regulation or law. Without a contract between the citizens of the different states, it would hardly be contended, under the Wilson act, that the question of interstate commerce is suggested. If a party living in St. Louis, Missouri, should ship a package of intoxicating liquors to a party living in the local-option territory in Texas, without a previous understanding between the parties, the sale would be at the point of destination, for the reason that the goods from the time of shipment at St. Louis until they reached the hands of the alleged consignee at the point of destination remain the property of the shipper. This being true, when the property reaches its point of destination, and is tendered by the express company, as the agent of the shipper, to the alleged consignee, and is accepted by him, the sale is consummated at that point, and the local-option law is violated. As we understand, this is in strict accord with the Wilson act, because it limits the transaction as between the consignor and the consignee, and this upon a previous contract between them. If this is not true, then the interstate commerce would be distorted from its high purpose, and made the cloak for carrying on a liquor business in the local-option territory, without the hope of regulation or control in any manner by the state authorities. Such is not the interstate commerce law under the Wilson act. In fact, the Wilson bill, it would seem, was enacted to prevent just that sort of contingency. This condition was possible under the interstate commerce law as it stood before, when, by the provisions of that law, a disposition at the point of destination could be had of the unbroken package. Giving the Wilson bill the construction that all of these sales were at the point of destination would annihilate the local-option law of Texas, and make every local-option territory within the state the "dumping ground" of illegal shipments from parties outside the state.

Again, if this view is not correct, then we would have this anomalous condition: The interstate commerce law protects the drummer or solicitor of the house beyond the state from prosecution, while the citizen of Texas, under the same circumstances, would be amenable to imprisonment and fine. To illustrate: A, representing a St. Louis house, enters the local-option territory and takes an ordinary C. O. D. order for the shipment of intoxicants. B, a citizen of Texas, accompanies him, and takes an order for intoxicants from the same man from whom the order is taken by A. The whisky is sent in each instance in accordance with the C. O. D. contract. A, representing the St. Louis concern, is absolutely innocent of any transgression of the law. B, representing the Texas house, is placed in jail not less than twenty nor more than sixty days, and fined not less than $25 nor more than $100. What would be an innocent act in relation to A would be seriously criminal when performed by B, though at the same time, under the same circumstances, and in relation to the same matter. Thus we would have this anomalous condition: That the shipment C. O. D. would be a sale at the initial point when shipped from Missouri, and a sale at the point of destination when shipped from some point in Texas; that is, under the same identical facts, except residence, innocence in the one, and guilt in the other. The law would be one way with reference to A, and exactly the reverse with reference to B, on similar facts. To say the least of it, this would be a very remarkable conception of the law, under our form of government.

While we have deemed the law in respect to the question herein discussed settled by an unbroken line of decisions in this state, civil and criminal, as well as by the Supreme Court of the United States and the states of the Federal Union, except, perhaps, three, yet, as the decisions in this state have been criticized in a recent discussion before this court in this and companion cases, we have again reviewed the matter at some length. We find no reason authorizing an overturning of this well-settled law, but are the more thoroughly convinced we are and have been legally correct. To hold otherwise would be not only to reverse the decisions of this court, but to place this court in opposition to the well-settled law enunciated by our supreme court and courts of civil appeals, as well as the Supreme Court of the United States and a great majority of the states, in regard to the law of sales.

The judgment is reversed and the cause remanded.

Henderson, J., concurring:

While I entirely concur in the opinion of my brother Davidson, yet, on account of the importance of the question involved, and, moreover, because our brother Brooks has for the first time expressed his dissenting views as to C. O. D. shipments, I deem it necessary to review and point out what I consider some of the errors contained in the dissenting opinion.

I notice that my brother Brooks, at the outset of his dissenting opinion states: "Any inference therein to the effect that I have ever actually assented to the proposition therein laid down in the previous decisions of this court is not correct. As will be shown hereafter, in some of the decisions of this court my dissent was not marked. This is an omission frequently occurring in the decisions of this court, where one does not really agree to the principle laid down in the case, which principle has theretofore been announced by the majority of the court. But I have never agreed in principle with the proposition that an ordinary C. O. D. shipment by express is a sale at the point of shipment." In view of the opinion of my brother Davidson, and his reference to this matter, it would appear that the above is a severe indictment of what was said on the subject in that discussion. As to the duty of a judge on the bench in the rendition of an opinion, I believe the practice is well settled. He may concur either in whole or in part; that is, he may agree to the result, but disagree as to some of the propositions stated and discussed, in which event, if the matter is of sufficient interest, he may so express himself. Or there may be cases in which he is not in accord with a majority of the court, but, there being no principle involved, or the matter being of minor significance, he may merely tacitly concur. However, if the question is one of any magnitude, or the principle involved is of any consequence, and a judge does not agree with a majority of the court rendering an opinion, he is not expected to remain silent. On the contrary, duty requires that he should utter his dissent. He may do so by simply marking his dissent, or he may express his views on the subject. If he does not do so, he will be presumed to have concurred in the opinion. In other words, the principle of estoppel, and not the doctrine of "mental reservation," applies here. It is taken for granted that a judge may agree to an opinion when rendered, and he may subsequently change his views, in whole or in part, as to the propositions involved, in which event he is, of course, at perfect liberty to change or modify his position as to any particular decision. In such case he should not ordinarily be subject to criticism or censure. Perhaps no judge who ever sat upon any bench for any considerable length of time adhered to all the views theretofore concurred in or expressed by him. In what has been said there is no intention to reflect on the motives which may have actuated my brother Brooks in the attitude assumed by him on this subject in his dissenting opinion, nor to question the statement therein contained that he never in mind agreed to the propositions laid down by this court on the subject of C. O. D. shipments. Besides, he has supported his declaration in this regard by reviewing some of the cases which treated of this question, and in which he was presumed to have concurred, which review I shall now proceed to review as to some of the cases discussed.

As is generally known and conceded, the case of Bruce v. State, 36 Tex. Crim. Rep. 53, 35 S. W. 383, 39 S. W. 683, was the first case written on this subject. The opinion is from the pen of that distinguished jurist, Judge Hurt, and concurred in by both Judge Davidson and myself. There it was distinctly stated, as a starting point or predicate for the decision, as follows: "We understand that the weight of authorities hold that if goods, such as liquors, are ordered to be shipped from one point to a buyer at another, C. O. D., by a common carrier, the sale is considered as completed at the point of shipment." And a number of authorities are cited in support of this. Then follows: "Tested by these rules, it would appear that, if there was no special contract between the parties, but a mere order by the purchaser at Gordon to the seller at Weatherford to ship beer to him C. O. D., the sale was completed at Weatherford." The opinion then proceeds to state that there were other conditions of a contractual character between the parties, which it was held took the case out of an ordinary C. O. D. package, and that consequently, on account of such additional facts, the case was not an ordinary C. O. D. sale, and that the title did not pass at Weatherford, but at the point of destination, which was Gordon. Now, the dissenting opinion disposes of this case by stating it was a "bogus order." He says: "It was clearly done in order to evade the local-option law, and could have been for no other purpose. The blank was prepared by Bruce, furnished to the consignee, who merely filled it out, and then it constitutes an absolute defense for Bruce against any prosecution. This case was tried before the court without the intervention of a jury. The court had a right, under the conflict in the evidence, to decide—which he necessarily had to do in order to find the defendant guilty—that the order from the consignee to the defendant was a bare subterfuge resorted to for the purpose of evading the local-option law." Now, I have read that decision carefully, and, if there is anything said in the opinion, or in the statement of facts accompanying it, that the order was a subterfuge,—much less, that the decision of the court was in any wise based on the fact that the same was a subterfuge and an evasion of the local-option law,—I have failed to find it. Indeed, a careful reading of the decision shows that the parties had a right to make their own contracts, and, if legally made, although the effect may be to evade the local-option law as to the place of the sale, by actually making the sale at another point, the parties had a perfect right to make such contract.

As to Weathered v. State (Tex. Crim. App.) 1 Tex. Ct. Rep. 655, 60 S. W. 876, decided on February 6, 1901 (Judge Brooks being on the bench and participating in the decision), it is said in the dissent: This "appears to have been a memorandum decision, and was really decided upon another question than that of C. O. D., in this: There were two local-option laws adopted. One was valid, and the other not. The record shows appellant objected to the introduction of the valid law, which objection was sustained. This of itself should and did reverse the case. It is true that Judge Davidson, in writing the opinion, cites the above cases to support the C. O. D. proposition. But this case was agreed to on the first proposition." What is meant by a "memorandum decision," I am at a loss to understand, unless by this it was intended to convey the idea that it was a short opinion. If this be a correct version of the matter, I believe memorandum opinions are to be commended. However, let us look to the opinion itself, as to what it decides, and upon what grounds it was rendered. In this regard I can do no better than quote the opinion: "This conviction was for violating the local-option law; the punishment being assessed at a fine of $25, and twenty days' imprisonment in the county jail. The offense is charged to have been committed in justice precinct No. 5 of Navarro county. There seems to have been two elections in that precinct, both of which resulted in favor of prohibition. Where this is the case, the prosecution can be under either, if both were in accordance with the statute; and, if one is legal and the other not, the prosecution could be had under the legal election. We will not enter into a discussion as to whether or not the later election was strictly legal. Appellant sought to prove the prior election, which was admitted in the bill of exceptions to be valid, but the court rejected the testimony. While appellant cannot complain, this evidence was admissible. If it had been admitted, there would be no question of the legality of prohibition in that territory. See Leftwich v. State (Tex. Crim. App.) 55 S. W. 571; Decker v. State, 39 Tex. Crim. Rep. 20, 44 S. W. 845. The evidence discloses that within the local-option territory appellant gave an order to a party in Hillsboro, outside the territory in question, for a half gallon of whisky to be sent by express C. O. D., the purchaser paying express charges. This does not constitute a sale within the inhibited territory. Bruce v. State, 36 Tex. Crim. Rep. 53, 35 S. W. 383, 39 S. W. 683; Freshman v. State, 37 Tex. Crim. Rep. 126, 38 S. W. 1007; State v. Carl, 43 Ark. 353, 51 Am. Rep. 565; Pilgreen v. State, 71 Ala. 368; State v. Flanagan, 38 W. Va. 53, 22 L. R. A. 430, 45 Am. St. Rep. 832, 17 S. E. 792; Kelsea v. Ramsey & G. Mfg. Co. 22 L. R. A. 415, and notes on pages 425, 426 (55 N. J. L. 320, 26 Atl. 907); Garbracht v. Com. 96 Pa. 449, 42 Am. Rep. 550; Com. v. Fleming, 130 Pa. 138, 5 L. R. A. 470, 17 Am. St. Rep. 763, 18 Atl. 622; Boothby v. Plaisted, 51 N. H. 436, 12 Am. Rep. 140; McComb v. Doe, 8 Smedes & M. 510; Higgins v. Murray, 73 N. Y. 252; 21 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 511. Because the evidence does not sustain the conviction, the judgment is reversed and the cause remanded." From this we gather that the court, in passing, says there were two elections, both of which resulted in favor of prohibition, and that the prosecution could be maintained in such case under either. I certainly do not understand that this was made a ground of reversal. Evidently the case was reversed upon the proposition that it was a C. O. D. shipment, and that the sale was completed at the point of shipment, which was not within the inhibited territory. A number of authorities are cited in support of this view, and it does not occur to me that there can be any question than that this case directly involved a C. O. D. shipment, and its reversal was solely predicated upon the proposition that the sale was made at the point of shipment, and not at the point of destination, which was the local-option territory, and on which the prosecution was predicated.

466, 62 S. W. 574, which was rendered on the same day as the Weathered Case (Tex. Crim. App.) 1 Tex. Ct. Rep. 655, 60 S. W. 576, Judge Brooks, who wrote that opinion, says of same in his dissenting opinion, "that any candid man, in reading the same, will find that the point in issue was not a C. O. D. sale at all." Evidently a reading of the opinion shows that the package came to Kemp, in Kaufman county, as a C. O. D. shipment. The express charges had been prepaid by the sender, Bruce, at Dallas; and the C. O. D. charges on the same was simply the value of the whisky, which was $1. It appears, however, that the prosecution was predicated on a sale by appellant, Treadaway, to Will Jeffreys, who paid the $1 charges on the whisky, and the whisky was turned over to him by the consignee, Treadaway. This was held to be a sale. However, the judge, in passing upon the legal questions in giving and refusing charges, uses this language: "We do not think the court erred in refusing this charge. This court has heretofore held that, when whisky is shipped to a party C. O. D., the moment it is placed in the express office it becomes the property of the consignee; and this is clearly true the moment the consignee receipts the express company for the same, and pays the C. O. D. charges thereon. Hence the court did not err in refusing this charge;" citing Freshman v. State, 37 Tex. Crim. Rep. 126, 38 S. W. 1007, and Bruce v. State, 36 Tex. Crim. Rep. 53, 35 S. W. 383, 39 S. W. 683. This shows very clearly that his attention was directly called to the previous decisions of this court in the cases named, and shows, further, as it seems to me, a concurrence in the views therein expressed.

Nor is Judge Brooks any more fortunate in stating what the United States Supreme Court has decided as to this question. He disposes of Norfolk & W. R. Co. v. Sims, 191 U. S. 446, 48 L. ed. 256, 24 Sup. Ct. Rep. 151, substantially after this manner: That the sole question before the court was whether the C. O. D. shipment was interstate commerce, and not where the sale occurred; so that all that was said by the court as to the place of sale was purely dicta. It appears from the opinion that Sears, Roebuck, & Company of Chicago, on the written order of Mrs. Satterfield, of Roxboro, North Carolina, shipped to her by railroad freight a sewing machine, and sent the bill of lading to her by express, C. O. D. Upon payment to the express agent of the C. O. D., the bill of lading was delivered to her, and she presented the bill of lading for the sewing machine, tendering the freight charges. The express and railroad agent was the same person. However, before she got the machine out of the office, the tax collector of Person county, seized the same to satisfy the license or occupation tax; claiming that Sears, Roebuck & Company were liable for the tax, as being engaged in selling sewing machines in North Carolina. The court found against Sears, Roebuck, & Company, the amount of the tax, and this decision was affirmed by the supreme court of the state. The case was subsequently carried to the Supreme Court of the United States on the ground that it involved interstate commerce. Here is what Justice Brown, speaking for the court, says: "To the ordinary mind it seems a somewhat startling proposition that a manufacturing corporation located and doing its main business in a distant city, having no manufactory in North Carolina, no stock in trade, no place for the sale of its goods there, and no agent authorized to sell them, can be compelled to take out a license required of all those 'engaged in the business of selling,' from the mere fact that it had done what hundreds of others were doing daily,—sent a single machine there upon a written order of a customer, and under an ordinary C. O. D. consignment. . . . While it may be entirely true that the property in the thing sold does not pass under a C. O. D. consignment until delivery of the goods and payment to the carrier, and hence, it may be said that the sale is not completed until then, yet, as matter of fact, the bargain is made and the contract of sale completed, as such, when the order is received in Chicago, and the machine shipped in pursuance thereof. A sale really consists of two separate and distinct elements: First, a contract of sale, which is completed when the offer is made and accepted; and, second, a delivery of the property, which may precede, be accompanied by, or follow the payment of the price, as may have been agreed upon between the parties. The substance of the sale is the agreement to sell and its acceptance. That possession shall be retained until payment of the price may or may not have been a part of the original bargain, but, in substance, it is a mere method of collection; and we have never understood that a license could be imposed upon this transaction, except in connection with the prior agreement to sell, although in certain cases arising under the police power it has been held that the sale is not complete until delivery, and sometimes not until payment." It occurs to me that, notwithstanding the court took jurisdiction of the case on the ground that it was an interstate shipment, yet, in order to exonerate Sears, Roebuck, & Company from the tax, it became necessary for the court to find that the sale was made in Chicago, and not in North Carolina, which they accordingly did. So much for these cases, and the grounds upon which they were decided.

The Weathered and Treadaway Cases were rendered in May, 1901, and it was not until the Sinclair Case, which was decided on November 25, 1903, that my brother Brooks ever uttered one note of dissent from the views expressed in Bruce's Case, and followed in subsequent cases. While the Sinclair Case discusses the doctrine of C. O. D. shipments as to place of sale, the question was not really in the case, as the opinion on motion for rehearing clearly shows. So in that case, no views being expressed in the dissent, the C. O. D. shipment not being in the case, and it being reversed on other grounds, we were unable to determine the reason for his disagreement. However, it is not surprising that he should wander far afield to discover some analogy between a bill of lading and a C. O. D. shipment, and that he should build an argument predicated upon a condition precedent founded on such analogy. Of course, it cannot be said that the two are not in some of their features alike. Both are, in a sense, contracts for the shipment of goods. A bill of lading is a contract between the carrier and the sender, for a consideration to transport and deliver goods at a specified place to a person therein named, or to his order, and in commercial usage it may be, in a sense, negotiable; that is, the bill of lading has become symbolical, and stands for the property itself. We do not understand that a C. O. D. has this characteristic. Ordinarily, where goods are shipped under a bill of lading, the property passes as soon as they are delivered at the point of shipment to the common carrier. But if the bill of lading is taken in favor of the consignor himself, or some agent of his, by commercial usage and the decisions of the court the property does not pass, though intended for some consignee at the point of destination, until some stipulation is complied with, as payment of the purchase money. Of course, there may be exceptions to this rule, depending on the intent of the parties, to be gathered from the stipulations of their contract. Gulf, W. T. & P. R. Co. v. Browne, 27 Tex. Civ. App. 437, 66 S. W. 341. For an able discussion of the meaning of the terms, "cash," "cash down," or "cash on delivery," as used in sale, see Austin v. Welch, 31 Tex. Civ. App. 526, 72 S. W. 881. Here it is shown a cash sale may not necessarily involve the investment of title, as a condition precedent. A sale for cash on delivery may be entirely consistent with the investment of title, though the purchase money be not paid at the time of delivery of the property.

In such case "the buyer, though he has title, is not entitled to possession until he pays the price, for payment and delivery in such a case are presumed to be concurrent acts, and, until payment is made, the seller may retain the goods, by virtue of his vendor's lien; but he retains the goods, and not title." And such, I understand, is the doctrine applied to C. O. D. shipments by the authorities.

A C. O. D. package, by commercial usage, means, "Collect on delivery,"—that is, for the price of the goods shipped and the express charges,—and is generally applied to small packages, and not to large consignments of goods, which are ordinarily shipped under bills of lading. As to bills of lading taken in favor of the consignor or his agent, or as held by a number of the courts, even if taken in favor of the consignee, if the bill is forwarded to some bank, with draft attached, the property does not pass until the payment of the purchase money. The authorities appear to treat the payment of the purchase money as a condition precedent to the investment of the title in the purchaser. On the other hand, the same courts hold that a C. O. D. package, although it requires payment to the carrier before delivery of the goods, is not a condition precedent to the investment of title in the property; but they treat this merely as a method of collecting the money for the goods, and the contract is regarded as a lien to enforce this payment. It is not necessary here to enumerate the authorities which establish this doctrine as to C. O. D. packages, they being collated in the opinion of my brother Davidson. It may be conceded, if there was no commercial usage, and no decisions on the subject of C. O. D. shipments as to the place of sale, and there was commercial usage and decisions of the courts on bills of lading, to the effect that bills of lading, with drafts attached, contained a condition precedent to the delivery of the goods, and that, consequently, in such case the title did not pass; and it was presented as a new and original proposition, that the two being alike as to conditions of delivery, and on account of this analogy the rule of law as to investment of title should be the same,—there might be some plausibility or even force, in the argument. But I submit that, the matter being thoroughly settled by commercial usage and the decisions of the courts, as to one as well as the other, the proposition to control the one by the other can find no support in reason. It could as well be urged that, because of this same apparent analogy, the law in regard to bills of lading, as to payment of the price as a condition precedent to the investment of title, should be overturned by the decisions with regard to C. O. D. shipments, which invest the title at the point of shipment, but retain a mere lien for the collection of the purchase money. It necessarily follows, if the judge's argument based on some analogy between the law as to bills of lading and shipments by C. O. D. in regard to conditions precedent falls to the ground, then the whole structure erected by him must likewise tumble; and consequently the decisions invoked on this line, including Joseph v. Cannon, 11 Tex. Civ. App. 295, 32 S. W. 241, by which an estoppel was claimed on the writer, pass out of the case, as having no application.

As to C. O. D. shipments, as has been shown in the opinion of my brother Davidson, the great weight of authority is in favor of the doctrine announced in the Bruce Case; that is, that the title passes at the point of delivery to the common carrier. All the decisions, both state and national where the question has been raised, except in three or four states, agree with the rule announced in the Bruce Case, 36 Tex. Crim. Rep. 53, 35 S. W. 383, 39 S. W. 683; and even in Iowa, one of the excepted states, in the case of State v. American Exp. Co. 118 Iowa, 447, 92 N. W. 66, that court says: "If the question were res integra in this state, a majority of the court as now constituted would be inclined to the view that, under such a shipment, the carrier is the agent of the buyer for the purpose of transportation, and of the seller for the purpose of retention of possession and collection of the purchase price; and that, as a necessary corollary, title passed to the buyer on delivery to the carrier." But they go on to say that the question had previously been decided adversely in that state, and they would consider it stare decisis.

Now, this court having adopted this rule as early as the Bruce Case, and having continuously followed it since that time, we are asked, because there is some analogy between a bill of lading and a C. O. D. package, that we should not only disregard the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, and the great majority of the state courts, but that we should overturn our own decisions on this subject and establish a new rule. What emergency exists for a change of front by this court on this question, which has long since become the settled law of the state? It is because, as suggested in the dissenting opinion, under the decisions of this court the express companies have been converted into saloons in local-option districts? It may be true that express companies are being used by violators of the law in local-option territory, but as to the extent of this evil I am not prepared to say. I do know that it is the purpose of this court, as manifested in its decisions, to prevent all sales of liquor in local-option territory. And so we have held there must be a prior contract as to C. O. D. orders; and no express company can send intoxicating liquor into such territory to persons without previous orders, as all such transactions are held to be sales in the territory. Dunn v. State, 12 Tex. Ct. Rep. 803, 86 S. W. 326; Beall v. State, 12 Tex. Ct. Rep. 801, 86 S. W. 334; Ashley v. State (Tex. Crim. App.) 80 S. W. 1015. As stated, it may be conceded that express companies furnish facilities for violations of the local-option law. While this would afford ground for changing the law of the Constitution, as the case may be, it would furnish no reason to this court for disregarding or overruling the law. Public clamor may put a judge on guard to attend more zealously to the responsibilities of his high office, but it should never swerve him from a conscientious discharge of his functions to patiently investigate in order to determine the right, which is the law, and then to stand firmly by it after he has found it. Claiming for ourselves the same exalted motives which we accord to others, we trust we shall be able to enshrine in our hearts the majesty of the law, which to the judge on the bench should be the polar star pointing the way to duty.

Brooks, J., dissenting:

I do not agree with the opinion of the majority. Any inference therein to the effect that I have ever actually assented to the proposition therein laid down in the previous decisions of this court is not correct. As will be shown hereafter, in some of the decisions of this court my dissent was not marked. This is an omission frequently occurring in the decisions of this court, where one does not really agree to the principle laid down in the case, which principle has theretofore been announced by the majority of the court. But I have never agreed in principle with the proposition that an ordinary C. O. D. shipment by express is a sale at the point of shipment.

In order to properly discuss this matter it is necessary to revert to some rudimentary principles of law. A sale, by the law of merchants, is a transfer of title for a consideration. The title may pass at once, as the effect of a present agreement of the parties, or it may pass in the future, depending upon the performance of some precedent condition. In this lies the distinction between executed and executory sales, or a sale under an agreement to sell. Mechem. Sales, pp. 4, 5. In the case of a sale the agreement and transfer of title are practically contemporaneous. But in case of an agreement to sell the agreement may be consummated at one time, and the sale at another. 2 Mechem, Sales, § 1111. Hence, in looking for the locus of the sale, I think it is essential to ascertain where the title was transferred, and not where the agreement to sell was consummated, because the agreement to sell may be completed outside the prohibited district, and the sale be consummated in the prohibited district, in which case, according to my understanding, the locus of the sale would be in the prohibited district, and therefore a violation of the law. The question as to where the title passes is primarily one of the intention of the parties. Mechem, Sales, § 760; Texas C. R. Co. v. Dorsey, 30 Tex. Civ. App. 377, 70 S. W. 575; Elliott, Railroads, § 114; Wells v. Littlefield, 59 Tex. 556.

As to where and when a sale takes place is a question of fact, and not of law; and, where the facts show an undisputed consummation of the sale at a certain place, then necessarily the sale takes place there. But, if the facts indicate a doubt as to where the sale takes place, then this becomes an issue of fact for the court to submit to the jury. In order to make a sale, the parties' minds must meet upon the same thing; otherwise there cannot be a sale, within contemplation of law, either of real or personal property. In all sales we find two great subdivisions of conditions,—a condition precedent and a condition subsequent. These two great subdivisions of conditions are subdivided, but, so far as this opinion is concerned, it is not necessary to trace them farther than the two subdivisions stated. A material condition precedent precludes the consummation of any contract until such condition is complied with. A condition subsequent may be the basis for the cancelation of the contract entered into; and hence, where one ships goods by express C. O. D. (the C. O. D., by the law of merchants, and as understood by the courts, being cash on delivery), the consignor makes the express company his agent both for the delivery of the goods and the collection of the money, and the C. O. D. thereby becomes a condition precedent to the consummation of the sale. If the consignee complies with his condition and pays the contract price, the sale is consummated. If he does not, the property remains that of the consignor, and he can immediately, upon the failure of the consignee to comply with the terms of the sale, order the goods reshipped to him. In construing questions of this sort, the authorities sustain the proposition that the courts can look to the ordinary business affairs of life that are of common experience and knowledge. In my view, in the light of common experience and knowledge, the consignor does not intend to part with his property until the C. O. D. is paid; and, further, upon his failure to comply with the terms of the contract, the consignor uniformly has the goods returned to himself. Suppose the goods are lost in transit before they reach the consignee. Would it be seriously contended that the consignee would be bound in any court of justice for the purchase price? Certainly not. Nor is there any decision sustaining this proposition. Could the consignee sequester the goods from the hands of the express agent without paying the C. O. D.? Certainly not. Yet the majority opinion places the consignee in the unique attitude of owning property, which property is in the possession of the consignee's agent, and yet the consignee cannot get his property from his agent without paying the consignor. It is a rudimentary principle of law that, where one has a lien upon property, the owner of the property can sequester the same. But here the majority insist that my agent has my property, and yet the possession of my agent is my possession, and I cannot get my property from my agent without paying a third party, the consignor. Suppose the consignee steal the property without paying the C. O. D. Could he be indicted for the theft of his own property? Or suppose he uses violence in obtaining the property from the express agent without paying the C. O. D. Could he be indicted for the robbery of his own agent, whereby he takes by violence his own property from his own agent? These illustrations show to my mind the legal absurdity urged with such prolixity in the majority opinion.

But it is insisted that the majority of the decisions of the courts of other states sustain the majority opinion. This may be conceded, in so far as said decisions relate to the sale of whisky. But such decisions are at variance with the philosophy of the law, and also at variance with other decisions upon other sales of like kind and character all over the United States; and they, in that respect, are an anomaly in the jurisprudence of this country. Suppose I say to A, "I will sell you my hat for $5, cash on delivery." Surely it is not A's hat until he pays the $5. Or, if I say to A, "I will sell you my hat for $5, cash on delivery, and have B bring and deliver the same to you, provided A pays B $5." Certainly this would not authorize A to say the hat was his until he paid the $5. Then what virtue is there in the intervention of an express company in the place of B? What reason or philosophy can there be in the distinction between the agency of B, in the illustration just used, and the express company? I have the utmost respect for the decisions of the courts of last resort of other states, 1 L.R.A.(N.S.)

but that respect does not go to the extent of a fetich worship of authorities upon isolated propositions when those propositions are at variance with the whole trend of all the other authorities, and at variance with reason and law.

I will now review some of the authorities on this question, laying down the converse rule to that stated in the opinion of the majority:

In Dows v. National Exch. Bank, 91 U. S. 618, 23 L. ed. 214, I find that the consignor had sent the goods to the consignee, and then sent the bill of lading to a bank, with draft attached. The Supreme Court of the United States holds this is a sale at the point of destination. In other words, it is a condition precedent to the sale, to wit, the payment of the draft. The bill of lading is the evidence of title. The title vests when the draft is paid. The draft being paid at the point of destination, the sale occurs at the point of destination. And again I find this language: We agree that, where a bill of lading has been so taken, the inference that it was not so intended that the property in the goods should pass may be submitted, though it is held to be almost conclusive; and we agree that, where there are circumstances pointing both ways, some indicating an intent to pass, others contra, it becomes a question for the jury whether the property has passed. This proposition was laid down by Judge Fisher in Texas C. R. Co. v. Dorsey, 30 Tex. Civ. App. 377, 70 S. W. 575. And again, the learned court in the case first cited says: "There are no circumstances to rebut the intent to retain ownership; . . . nothing in the evidence . . . tended to show any other intent. Hence there was no necessity of submitting to the jury the question, whether there was a change of ownership." If the carrier had instructions not to deliver the property until it was paid for, then it did not belong to the plaintiff at the time of the injury in transit, and he could not maintain his action therefor. Cudahy Packing Co. v. Dorsey, 26 Tex. Civ. App. 484, 63 S. W. 549. While it is true that, where delivery of property sold is to be determined by the contract between the vendor and vendee, yet, if the vendor sent bill of lading to his order, draft attached, the presumption arises that he thereby intended to retain title in himself until payment. A. J. Neimeyer Lumber Co. v. Burlington & M. River R. Co. 54 Neb. 321, 40 L. R. A. 534, 74 N. W. 670. It is true that this presumption might be rebutted by evidence, and it would then become an issue for the jury. So, also, I hold that, if the goods are sent C. O. D., the same presumption would arise; and, there being no evidence combatting the presumption, there would be no issue, except the general one of innocence. But the liquor dealer might show that the purchaser directed that it be turned over to the carrier. Then it would be a question of fact for the jury to determine whether he intended to pass the title when he delivered to the designated carrier. If there was no intention to pass title at the point of shipment, it would not pass until the delivery and payment at the point of destination,—guilt depending upon the question of intent. Where there is no issue as to the intent, there is no issue to be presented to the jury, except the general presumption of innocence.

Now, as stated above, it is the common experience that, where a consignor places goods with an express company C. O. D. (these alone being the facts), he does not intend to part with his property until the property reaches the point of destination, and until the consignee pays the contract price to his agent, the express company. I do not mean to be understood, as indicated above, that acts might not be shown establishing conclusively that the intent of the parties was merely to use the C. O. D. as a convenient mode of collecting the money. Certainly they could, since the intent of the parties making the contract, and what intent they had, is a question of fact, and not a question of law. But in an ordinary C. O. D. express shipment no other intent is suggested than that the consignor did not intend to part with his property until the condition precedent, to wit, the payment of the purchase price, was complied with. When the price is paid the sale is consummated. If this is in the prohibited district, the consignor becomes guilty of the sale there.

The rule is thus expressed in Benjamin on Sales, §§ 382 et seq.: "If A, in New York, orders goods from B, in Liverpool, without sending the money for them, there are two modes usually resorted to, among merchants, by which B may execute the order without assuming the risk of A's inability or refusal to pay for the goods on arrival: B may take the bill of lading, making the goods deliverable to his own order, or that of his agent in New York, and send it to his agent, with instructions not to transfer it to A except on payment for the goods, or B may not choose to advance the money in Liverpool, and may draw a bill of exchange for the price of the goods on A, and sell the bill to a Liverpool banker; transferring to the banker the bill of lading for the goods to be delivered to A on due payment of the bill of exchange. Now, in both of these modes of doing the business, it is impossible to infer that B had the least idea of passing the property to A at the time of appropriating the goods to the contract." There is no distinction between this character of sale and an ordinary C. O. D. shipment. To attempt to make one would be urging merely a difference wherein there is no distinction.

Again, if A puts goods in the express office to be sent to B, by a previous arrangement, C. O. D., he thereby expresses an evident intent to hold the title to the goods until the purchase price is paid. In other words, the C. O. D. becomes a condition precedent to the sale. Suppose A swears he transferred the title, and it was agreed that the title passed at the point of the shipment, but, in the same connection, swears he did not agree to deliver the goods until the C. O. D. was paid. Now, this, I take it, would be a bare subterfuge. Yet it would not preclude a charge of the court upon what his intent might be. If the case were tried before a jury under a proper charge on this state of facts, and the jury should decide against defendant, believing it was a sale in the inhibited district, I apprehend that no court would disturb the finding of the jury on the ground that the evidence was not sufficient.

No one will seriously controvert the fact that the intent of the parties is the gist of the sale. Without the concurrence and co-operation in the intent, there can never be a sale of any species of property. Then, the intent being a question of fact, this is an issue that can be proved like other issues. Of course, if the contract is a written contract, you cannot vary the terms thereof by parol evidence, as between vendor and vendee. C. O. D. shipments are not written contracts, but verbal acts, so to speak; and they must be looked at in the light of human experience, in passing upon the evident intent of the parties. Benjamin, Sales, § 390. In the above propositions I am also supported by Benjamin in his work on Sales (§ 399), that under no circumstances does an ordinary C. O. D. shipment pass the title, nor does the shipment, where a bill of lading is attached to a draft, until the money is paid for the goods. The different phases of the rule are there admirably stated.

In Joseph v. Cannon, 11 Tex. Civ. App. 295, 32 S. W. 241, we have this very proposition of law very positively laid down: "Where the seller, without any agreement for credit, fills an order for goods, and ships them to the buyer, accompanied by a bill and invoice showing the terms to be cash, the sale is not complete until payment is made, and the consignee does not acquire title by receiving the goods without payment; nor would a subsequent deed of trust by him, for the benefit of creditors, convey the title to the trustee." This decision was rendered by Collard, Associate Justice, and is an affirmance of a case tried before Judge Henderson, my associate upon this bench, who was then district judge. Judge Henderson filed his conclusion of law and fact, and upon said conclusions the case was affirmed. Among other conclusions by him are the following: "A sale is a mutual agreement constituted by an offer to sell on terms by one side, and the acceptance by the other; and the acceptance must be responsive to the very terms stated in the offer. Second. If one of the terms stated is for cash, and that is a condition precedent, that must be complied with before the title is vested in the vendee. And it makes no difference in such case if the goods have been delivered, or possession obtained by the vendee. The condition must be complied with before the title vests." This is rather strange language, in view of the opinion of the majority. Here we have a man shipping goods to another, accompanied by bill and invoice showing the terms to be cash, and yet it is not a consummated sale until said terms are complied with, although said property has passed into the hands of a trustee for the benefit of creditors. Then how can it be seriously contended that where the goods are not sent with bill and invoice, but sent C. O. D., the property passes to the consignee before he complies with the C. O. D. agreement? To my mind, it is too clear for discussion. This authority alone, independent of those hereafter referred to, conclusively shows the sophistry in the opinion of the majority.

In Campbell Printing Press & Mfg. Co. v. Powell, 78 Tex. 64, 14 S. W. 247 (opinion delivered by Chief Justice Stayton, of the supreme court), we have this very significant language bearing upon the question now under consideration: "The general rule in reference to personal property is that, when the seller delivers possession of the thing sold, he parts with the seller's lien; but the property in this case was not delivered with intent to pass the title, but rather as a bailment, by the express terms of the contract, title remaining in appellant, who expressly agreed to make title only when the purchase money was paid."

In Scott v. Childers, 24 Tex. Civ. App. 349, 60 S. W. 776, Templeton, J., delivering the opinion of the court (and writ of error was denied by the supreme court), uses this language: "The court in the general charge submitted the law upon the issue arising from the deposit of the deed from Childers to Vaughan with Word, to be held by him in escrow, in a manner not complained of by the appellant, and, at the request of the appellee, gave a special charge on this issue to the effect that if the cattle were delivered by Childers to Vaughan in pursuance of the deed, and, if it was agreed between them that the title to the cattle would not pass until the conditions, if any, for which the deed was placed in escrow with Word, had been complied with, then the title would not pass, notwithstanding the delivery of the cattle. The court further charged the jury, in response to a question propounded by them, that 'the title to personal property would pass by delivery, unless you believe from the evidence that it was the agreement by and between the parties to the contract that there was some condition to be performed before the title should pass, and that said condition had not been performed, or that, if a delivery of said personal property had been made, that said delivery, if any, was made with the intention to waive the condition, if you believe from the evidence that there was any such condition.' The appellant objects to these special charges on the ground that they give too much prominence to the proposition that the delivery of the cattle would not pass title if there was an agreement that it should not pass until certain conditions were complied with. It is clear, as a matter of law, that the delivery would not have the effect to pass the title to the cattle from Childers to Vaughan if there was an agreement between them that the title should not pass until Vaughan had complied with certain conditions; and we do not think that the charges under consideration give unnecessary prominence to Childers' theory on this issue."

In Leath v. Uttley, 66 Tex. 82, 17 S. W. 401, the supreme court of this state says: "When he has not performed a condition precedent to the accrual of his title to personal property, having no title, he can convey none, even to a purchaser without notice." Judge Robertson, one of the most illustrious judges that has adorned the bench in Texas, delivered this opinion; and, while it is short, it lays down the principle very clearly as contended for by the writer. See also 24 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, pp. 1047, 1052, 1065; State v. O'Neil, 58 Vt. 140, 56 Am. Rep. 558, 2 Atl. 586; Griffith v. Morrison, 58 Tex. 51.

In Sinker v. Comparet, 62 Tex. 470, we find the principle laid down as follows: "It would seem that when goods are sold at a fixed price, to be paid on a certain day, and delivery is made upon an agreement, express or implied, that, until the price is paid, the title is to remain in the vendor, payment becomes a condition precedent, and, until payment, the title to the property is not vested in the purchaser."

Mr. Mechem, in his work on Sales, § 740, says: "The delivery to the carrier, to pass the title, must be unconditional, and made with the intention that the title shall pass thereby. Of this intention, where the facts are in dispute, the jury is to judge. Consigning the goods without restriction to the purchaser, or assigning and transmitting to him the bill of lading, are strong evidences of an intention to pass the title, and cannot be controlled by secret determinations to the contrary." And again, in § 774, in the same work, we find this language: "Where the seller takes a bill of lading which expressly stipulates that the goods are to be delivered at the point of destination to himself, or agent, or to his order or assigns, there is the clearest possible evidence upon the face of the transaction that, notwithstanding such an appropriation of the goods as might have been sufficient to transfer the title to the buyer, the seller has determined to prevent this result by keeping the goods within his own control." Section 777: "This reservation of the title by the seller may be prompted by any one of a number of motives, and it may have a variety of effects. Its ordinary purpose undoubtedly is to coerce payment of the price by retaining title until payment. In addition to this main purpose and effect, it may have several incidental or collateral effects. It may, for example, determine when and where the title has passed and the sale has been completed, within the purview of local statutes forbidding or restricting sales, as in the common case of the statutes forbidding or restricting sales of intoxicating liquors." The text on this last proposition cites a long list of authorities too numerous to collate,—among others, State v. Wingfield, 115 Mo. 428, 37 Am. St. Rep. 406, 22 S. W. 363. In this latter case the very converse doctrine to that laid down by the majority of the court is discussed and approved by Burgess, J., and the opinion collates various decisions of his own court and other states supporting that position.

The majority opinion collates a great array of authorities establishing that an ordinary shipment of goods passes the title at the point of shipment. I see no pith or point in this suggestion. There has never been any controversy as to this proposition. In that instance there is no character of condition attached to the shipment. The title, of course, passes to the consignee upon placing the property with the carrier, subject, alone, to the right of stoppage in transitu on the part of the consignor.

The opinion of the majority also discusses the constitutionality of the statute passed by the legislature which makes a C. O. D. shipment a sale at the point of destination, and declares this statute unconstitutional. This may be correct, were it not for the fact that the statute itself merely announces the common-law rule on C. O. D. shipments,—that is, a condition precedent to the consummation of the sale precludes the sale,—and the legislative declaration is a mere re-enunciation of this plain provision of the common law.

The majority also hold that the clause of the statute which inhibits soliciting orders for whisky in a local-option district is unconstitutional, but they cite no provision of the Constitution to support it. The constitutional provision on local option authorizes the inhibition of a sale in local-option territory. This, I take it, carries with it the necessary, incidental, and subsidiary power to pass all legislation necessary to make the inhibition effective; and hence I say no constitutional objection exists to making inhibition of soliciting orders for whisky in a local-option territory, and fixing a penalty for its violation.

The majority also insist that the Supreme Court of the United States have held that the local-option law of this state cannot interfere with interstate commerce shipments, and that, therefore, to hold the contrary would make purely state shipments subject to a different law from that of interstate shipments. There is no reason in this for the position the majority occupy. State drummers can be taxed now, but interstate drummers cannot, because it interferes with interstate commerce. Yet I apprehend that the majority would not insist on the repeal of a tax upon state drummers by sheer force of the fact that interstate drummers could not be made to pay a tax.

Were it not for the length of this opinion, I would discuss many other phases of the majority opinion, but I shall proceed now, in a brief way, to review the decisions of this court:

In the Bruce Case, 36 Tex. Crim. Rep. 53, 35 S. W. 383, 39 S. W. 683, the proposition is laid down that the sale is at the point of shipment, in an ordinary C. O. D., but a contract signed with the purchaser by Bruce, in the shape of an order to Bruce, precluded the prosecution for a C. O. D. shipment by Bruce from Weatherford to Gordon, in Palo Pinto county. If it was not a violation of the law, why did he insist upon the consignee sending him a bogus order, such as the statement of facts indicates? It was clearly done in order to evade the local-option law, and could have been for no other purpose. The blank was prepared by Bruce, furnished to the consignee, who merely filled it out, and then it constitutes an absolute defense for Bruce against any prosecution. This case was tried before the court without the intervention of a jury.

The court had a right, under the conflict in the evidence, to decide—which he necessarily had to do in order to find the defendant guilty—that the order from the consignee to the defendant was a bare subterfuge resorted to for the purpose of evading the local-option law. But, if it is not a subterfuge, as the court in the Bruce Case holds, then said decision recognizes the contention I make,—that is, that the intent of the parties must be gathered from the evidence,—and, according to the bogus order, his real purpose and intention was not to part with the property until the same reached Gordon, in Palo Pinto county. The case, instead of being reversed on the proposition that the evidence might change the locus of the sale, was really reversed because of the insufficiency of the evidence, as I construe the opinion. This case and that of Freshman v. State, 37 Tex. Crim. Rep. 126, 38 S. W. 1007, were rendered before I came upon the bench.

Weathered v. State (Tex. Crim. App.) 1 Tex. Ct. Rep. 655, 60 S. W. 876, appears to have been a memorandum decision, and was really decided upon another question than that of C. O. D., in this: There were two local-option laws adopted. One was valid, and the other not. The record shows appellant objected to the introduction of the valid law, which objection was sustained. This, of itself, should and did reverse the case. It is true that Judge Davidson, in writing the opinion, cites the above cases to support the C. O. D. proposition. But this case was agreed to on the first proposition.

It is stated by the majority of the court that the writer hereof agreed to the C. O. D. proposition in Treadaway v. State, 42 Tex. Crim. Rep. 466, 62 S. W. 574. I take it that any candid mind, in reading the same, will find that the point at issue there was not a C. O. D. sale at all. The property had reached the destination, and Treadaway merely borrowed the money from a third party to pay the whisky out, and let such third party have the whisky in payment of the loan. The opinion of the majority says that this authority was followed in various other decisions.

It is insisted by the majority that the word "sale" must be taken in the legal signification that it had at common law. Yet in Bruce v. State, 39 Tex. Crim. Rep. 26, 44 S. W. 852, we find this statement: "The term 'sale,' as used in the local-option statute, is not to be construed according to its strict contractual sense. It means the actual sale to the person buying at the counter, whether he purchased for himself, or as agent of another."

In Davidson v. State, 44 Tex. Crim. Rep. 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

586, 73 S. W. 808, the facts show that defendant testified in his own behalf that he gave the jug of whisky to the hackman at Guthrie to be delivered to Dan Roberts at Benjamin. The jug had a card attached to it, and on the card was the following: "To Dan Roberts, in care of Dan Berry." This jug was a two-gallon jug of whisky, closed up in a box, and marked on the outside of the box, "Dog Poison." Defendant marked the box in this way so no one would molest it. He delivered the box to the mail carrier from Guthrie to Benjamin, but did not pay the mail carrier to bring the box to Benjamin. When he put the whisky in the box at Guthrie, he charged $9 to Dan Roberts, as he was the person who had ordered the same from him. The box was sent by express, and was not shipped C. O. D. "Berry was not my agent, and at no time did I ever request him to act as my agent in the delivery of any whisky to Dan Roberts or anyone, and I did not have Dan Berry or anyone else soliciting any orders for whisky in Benjamin about the 15th of April. . . . The next day after I sent the whisky to Benjamin, I wrote the witness Dan Berry a note, in which I stated to him to collect the money for me for the whisky sent Roberts." The court holds the letter of instruction, which accompanied the whisky and was delivered to Berry, and under which he acted, clearly constituted him the agent of appellant in delivering the whisky and receiving pay therefor. "The acts of Berry were performed at Benjamin, in Precinct No. 1 of Knox county. He was evidently not authorized to deliver the whisky without receiving pay therefor, as the letter of instructions directed to him clearly indicates that he acted in that matter for appellant, who lived at Guthrie, King county, and he sent the whisky to Dan Berry, to be delivered to Dan Roberts when he paid for the same; that is, as we understand the letter of instructions to Berry, appellant was not willing to intrust the matter to Roberts, the purchaser of the whisky, nor was he empowered to deliver the same to him, unless the money therefor was paid to Berry, who was authorized to receive and remit it to appellant, the consignor of the whisky. This, as we understand it, was a sale consummated at Benjamin." It is true, the court states that the above facts are not like those of Bruce v. State, which, they say, "depended on its own peculiar circumstances." Now, in what respect is this case peculiar from an ordinary C. O. D.? Davidson sent the whisky to Roberts in care of Berry, with instructions to collect the money when Roberts received the whisky. He does so. Under these facts, the court holds that Davidson is guilty of selling whisky in Benjamin.

In Rills v. State (Tex. Crim. App.) 3 Tex. Ct. Rep. 227, 64 S. W. 1047, the Treadaway Case, 42 Tex. Crim. Rep. 466, 62 S. W. 574, is followed. The fact is recognized that the Treadaway Case had nothing whatever to do with C. O. D., because not predicated upon the doctrine laid down in the Bruce Case. And the same may be said of Kirby v. State (Tex. Crim. App.) 80 S. W. 1007.

The majority opinion, however, attempts to reconcile the case of Bogle v. State, 42 Tex. Crim. Rep. 390, 55 S. W. 830, with the other authorities. But a casual reading of it will show it is at variance,—not only at variance but it violates the rudimentary principles of the law of sales, in this: Where the consignor places goods upon the car without any character of reservation of title, to be shipped to the consignee, the title passes when the goods are placed with the carrier. The Bogle Case had no character of reservation of title, as the statement of facts shows; but the shipment was merely an ordinary shipment of goods, without any character of reservation, from Dallas to Greenville. The opinion shows this, and the excerpts from the original statement of facts contained in the opinion of the majority do not change the principle laid down in the case itself.

The above are all the authorities of this court, I believe, passing upon the question of C. O. D., except Sinclair v. State (Tex. Crim. App.) 77 S. W. 621, and James v. Com. 102 Ky. 108, 42 S. W. 1107, cases cited in the majority opinion, to which I do not agree. Nor, as stated above, have I ever agreed to the proposition stated in the Bruce Case, 39 Tex. Crim. Rep. 26, 44 S. W. 852.

It is earnestly insisted that the Supreme Court of the United States, in Norfolk & W. R. Co. v. Sims, 191 U. S. 446, 48 L. ed. 256, 24 Sup. Ct. Rep. 151, has held with the majority of this court. I do not think so. This decision was a pure announcement of the doctrine laid down in numerous authorities holding that the shipment is interstate commerce. It is true, they incidentally discussed the matter; but that part of the opinion is dicta, and a close scrutiny of the same shows they do not intend to hold that the sale is completed and title to the property passes at the point of shipment.

So I believe that the above shows that the supreme court of this state, various decisions of other courts, and the elementary authorities sustain the proposition that a shipment with bill of lading attached to a draft is a sale at the point of destination, upon the payment of the draft by the consignee. The legislature, through the constitutional provision authorizing the same, has passed a law inhibiting sales in a local-option district. The question arises, then, as to where the sale is consummated. The majority of this court hold that the sale is at the point of shipment, under an ordinary C. O. D. This, I take it, is not in accord with reason or philosophy, and a violation of all the rules of sale. A C. O. D. is a condition precedent to the sale. The sale takes place upon compliance with the condition, and, if the condition is complied with in the inhibited district, then the sale takes place there, and the party would be guilty of making the sale in the local-option district. To hold otherwise renders nugatory and void, and to a large extent destroys, the local-option law of this state,—a law of sufficient importance to have been made a constitutional provision,—and converts the express offices of this state into saloons for the convenient distribution of whisky in prohibited districts to all parties who desire to violate the law. While this would not be a conclusive reason against a converse decision, yet the results of that decision are so at variance with the clear import of the intent of the legislature, and so out of harmony with the decisions of other courts, and so out of harmony with the elementary authorities and principles of the law of sales, that I enter this, my dissent.

RHODE ISLAND SUPREME COURT.

v.

CITY COUNCIL, ETC., OF NEWPORT.

(... R. I.)

1. Local self-government—regulation of police force.

The right of local self-government is not infringed by a statute regulating the police force of a city.

2. Same—payment of salaries.

The state may require municipal corporations to pay the salaries of local police of-

Case Note.—The unique character of the early settlements in Rhode Island, and the manner in which the state government came into existence, make the question of the right to local self-government in that state of peculiar interest. Unlike other colonies, these settlements were made without a charter of any kind, on land to which the Crown of England had no title, and which was bought from the Indians. The settlers organized their own government, and these organizations were really independent sovereignties, and were the precursors or forefathers of the state. The fact that the state was formed by a confederation of these icers, although such officers are officers of the state, and appointed under its authority.

3. Constitutional law—legislative control of police.

Where the legislature has exercised control over the police of a municipal corporation, the further right to do so is not denied by the adoption of a constitutional provision that it shall continue to exercise the powers it has hitherto exercised.

4. Same—payment of salaries.

Legislative control of the local police, and requiring the payment of their salaries out of local funds, are not forbidden by the provisions of the 14th Amendment of the United States Constitution.

(May 22, 1905.)

PETITION for writ of mandamus to compel the payment of the salaries of independent sovereign towns, each possessing well-defined, self-instituted, governmental powers, legislative, judicial, and executive, lends considerable force to the contention that by such union they abandoned to the state only such powers as were expressly delegated, and that they still retained their original right to regulate their own local affairs. But this contention was denied by the supreme court of that state in the case of Newport v. Horton, 22 R. I. 196, 50 L. R. A. 330, 47 Atl. 312, so far as the question of the power of the general assembly to create a board of police commissioners for a city, with power to appoint a chief of police, is concerned. The court denied that the Constitution of the state must be interpreted according to an unwritten theory of local self-government, which so entered into its provisions as to make it controlling in construing them. But its decision was expressly limited to the question whether the appointment of a chief of police for the city of Newport, by this board of police commissioners, infringed the city's right of local self-government, and it was held that it did not, on the theory that a police officer performs a state, and not purely a municipal, duty. The question of the right to impose on the municipality the burden of paying the salaries of local police officers was left untouched. The facts and arguments furnished by the history of Rhode Island in support of this claim of the right to local self-government are summarized in a note to the case of Newport v. Horton, in 50 L. R. A. 330, prepared by Amasa M. Eaton, of Providence, R. I.; and these historical facts and arguments are set out in detail, at much greater length, in a series of articles contributed by him to the Harvard Law Review. See 13 Harvard Law Rev. 441, 570, 638, and 14 Harvard Law Rev. 20, 116.

The whole question of the power of the legislature to impose burdens upon municipalities, and to control their local administration and property, is treated in a note in 48 L. R. A. 465, which shows that the weight 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

petitioners as police commissioners of the city of Newport. Judgment for petitioners.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. William B. Greenough, Attorney General, and William P. Sheffield, Jr., for petitioners:

R. I. Pub. Laws, chap. 804, § 9, does not violate the principles of local self-government, so called.

S. 78, 26 L. ed. 658; 1 Dill. Mun. Corp. 42-105; Re North Smithfield, 26 R. I. 164, 58 Atl. 628; Newport v. Horton, 22 R. I. 196, 50 L. R. A. 330, 47 Atl. 312.

The legislature can, in so far as funds are of authority sustains the right of the state to control the local police of a municipality, on the ground that the police is a matter pertaining to governmental functions, as distinguished from the purely private functions of the municipality. See State ex rel. Terre Haute v. Kolsem, 130 Ind. 434, 14 L. R. A. 566, 29 N. E. 595; Com. v. Plaisted, 148 Mass. 375, 2 L. R. A. 142, 12 Am. St. Rep. 560, 19 N. E. 224; *State ex rel. Atwood v. So in the later case of Americus v. Perry, 114 Ga. 871, 67 L. R. A. 230, 40 S. E. 1004, an act creating a board of police commissioners with exclusive control of the police officers of the city, naming the first members of the board, prescribing the manner in which their successors should be chosen, and setting forth their powers and duties, was held not to be an unconstitutional deprivation of local self-government.

And in Redell v. Moores, 63 Neb. 219, 55 L. R. A. 740, 93 Am. St. Rep. 431, 88 N. W. 243, it is held that no unconstitutional deprivation of local self-government is made by a statute creating a board of fire and police commissioners for cities of the metropolitan class, and placing the power of appointment thereto in the governor, since the power to create municipal corporations, which is vested in the legislature, implies the power to impose upon them such limitations as the legislature shall see fit. This case overrules State ex rel. Atty. Gen. v. Moores (State ex rel. Smyth v. Moores), 55 Neb. 480, 41 L. R. A. 624, 76 N. W. 175, where it was held that the right of local self-government was inherent, and was one of the rights retained by the people at the time of the adoption of the organic law. Yet even the overruled case recognized that "the authorities quite uniformly agree that the preservation of the public peace is essentially a matter of public concern," and that the instrumentalities by which the not raised for, or appropriated to, a special purpose, appropriate them to defray the expenses of government, or to any use which it deems to be for the public welfare.

Mr. J. Stacy Brown for respondents.

Parkhurst, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This was a petition for a writ of man-same is effected are agencies of the state; but the court said: "Conceding that the legislature, unless inhibited by the Constitution, may provide the mode of selecting police officers, yet it has no power or authority to deprive the municipality of the right to select officers whose duties are solely of a local nature, such as officers connected with the fire department." The overruling case, however, does not make this distinction, but sustains the statute as a whole. The effect of this decision must be to reinstate State ex rel. Simeral v. Seavey, 22 Neb. 454, 35 N. W. 228, which sustained a similar statute, and which was overruled by State ex rel. Atty. Gen. v. Moores (State ex rel. Smyth v. Moores) supra.

But an act of the legislature appointing members of a police force in a city was held, in O'Connor v. Fond du Lac, 109 Wis. 253, 53 L. R. A. 831, 85 N. W. 327, to be an unconstitutional interference with local affairs, where the Constitution provided that all towns and village officers whose election or appointment is not provided for by the Constitution should be elected by the electors of such cities, towns, and villages, or appointed by such authorities thereof as the legislature shall designate for that purpose.

And in Speed v. Crawford, 3 Met. (Ky.) 207, members of a police board of a city were held to be officers of the city; and an act providing for their appointment by the chancellor or governor was held to be unconstitutional.

So, the right of local self-government is held, in Rathbone v. Wirth, 150 N. Y. 459, 34 L. R. A. 408, 45 N. E. 15, to be violated by an act which provides that the police board of a certain city shall consist of four commissioners, of whom two shall belong to the political party having the highest representation in the common council and the other two to the party having the next highest representation, and that each member of the common council shall vote for but two of the four commissioners to be chosen; since the minority which is thus given power to appoint two of the commissioners is not a city authority within the meaning of the state Constitution, empowering the legislature to designate the local authority who shall appoint local officers.

And People ex rel. Bolton v. Albertson, 55 N. Y. 50, denies the right of the legislature to establish a police force for a city where the Constitution requires that city officers shall be elected by the electors of the city. The court states that the purpose of the constitutional provision was to secure to the civil and political divisions of the state the right of local self-government, and that the police powers are among the most important conferred upon city governments.

In Lovington v. Wider, 53 Ill. 302, and Wider v. East St. Louis, 55 Ill. 135, the constitutionality of an act vesting the control of the police department of certain cities in commissioners appointed by the governor with the consent of the senate, and authorizing them to incur indebtedness on behalf of the city, was denied; but these decisions rest upon an express provision of the Illinois Constitution as to the power of municipalities to tax for corporate purposes.

The cases generally concede the right of legislative control over the exercise by a municipality of purely governmental functions; but the line which distinguishes matters with respect to which a city exercises damus, brought by Jeremiah W. Horton, John H. Wetherell, and Frederick B. Coggeshall, police commissioners of the city of Newport, against the city council and city treasurer of the city of Newport, to compel the payment of the salaries of the petitioners for the month of February, A. D. 1905, as provided in § 9 of chapter 804 of the Public Laws.

The petition in the first clause sets forth the creation and establishment of a police commission for the city of Newport under chapter 804 of the Public Laws of Rhode Island. The second clause recites the appointment, election, and qualification of Jeremiah W. Horton, Frederick B. Coggeshall, and John H. Wetherell, under, respectively, chapters 804, 1032, and § 63 of chapter 809 of the Public Laws. The third clause recites the 9th section of chapter 804, as follows: "The annual salary of each of the members of said board shall be $1,000 and of the clerk $500, payable monthly by said city." The 4th clause alleges that there is due to each of said petitioners the sum of $83.33 as his salary for the month of February, 1905; and the 5th clause alleges that it became the duty of the city treasurer of the city of Newport to pay out of the funds of the city the said sum of $83.33 to each of the petitioners as his salary for the month of February, 1905. The 6th clause alleges two resolutions passed by the city council of Newport, directing the city treasurer of said city to pay no funds from the city treasurer for the salary of the petitioners, and the refusal of the city treasurer, in obedience to said resolutions, to pay said salary or any part thereof to the said petitioners, or to any of them. The prayer of said petition asks for a writ of mandamus to issue against the city council and city treasurer of said city, ordering the city council to revoke said resolution and directing the city treasurer to pay said salary.

The court granted an alternative writ, returnable on the 24th day of March, at which time the defendants filed their answer; the only part of which, material to determination of the present question, is embodied in the 7th clause: "Seventh. And the respondents, further answering, say that said § 9 of chapter 804, referred to in the third paragraph of said bill or petition, is unconstitu-governmental functions, as an agent of the state, from those as to which it acts in its private corporate capacity, is not always well defined. Dillon, Mun. Corp. vol. 1, § 58, states the distinction thus: "The administration of justice, the preservation of the public peace, and the like, although confided to local agencies, are essentially matters of public concern; while the enforcement of municipal by-laws proper, the establishment of gas works, of waterworks the construction of sewers, and the like, are matters which pertain to the municipality as distinguished from the state at large."

The case of Horton v. Newport seems to be the first to decide squarely and directly the right of the state to require municipal corporations to pay the salaries of local police officers. Some of the statutes regulating the local police, which have been sustained, have made provision for the payment of salaries by the municipalities; but these provisions have not been discussed in passing on the validity of the acts.

The right of the legislature to fix the salaries of firemen employed by a municipality is denied in Lexington v. Thompson, 113 Ky. 540, 57 L. R. A. 775, 101 Am. St. Rep. 361, 68 S. W. 477, on the ground that this is a matter of local government, never delegated to the legislature. But the court concedes the right of the legislature to control the police, as being officers of the state, though it says nothing about the power to fix their salaries and impose the payment thereof on the municipality.

The power to impose upon a municipality the payment of salaries of police officers appointed by the state is impliedly questioned 1 L.R.A. (N.S.) in Evansville v. State, 118 Ind. 426, 4 L. R. A. 93, 21 N. E. 267, where the court, after holding unconstitutional an act providing for a board of metropolitan police and a fire board, to be appointed by the legislature, said: "If the act related alone to the management of the police department, and the state was proposing to take upon itself the burden of maintaining the department as well as its management, . . . then a very different question would be presented."

And in Wider v. East St. Louis, supra, the court said, in denying the constitutionality of an act vesting control of the police department of certain cities in commissioners appointed by the governor, that the police force organized by the police commissioners appointed under the act would doubtless have a legal right to serve, if they chose to do so, gratuitously, and to that extent the law might be upheld. But this decision rested upon an express provision of the Illinois Constitution as to the right of cities and towns to tax for corporate purposes.

But the power of the legislature to fix the salary of a city recorder was sustained in Wyandotte v. Drennan, 46 Mich. 478, 9 N. W. 500.

And in Speed v. Detroit, 160 Mich. 92, 58 N. W. 638, legislative power to fix the salary of a city counselor was upheld.

So it has been held that the legislature may require a city to pay out of its treasury the salary of the stenographer of courts in the city having jurisdiction in cases of felony. Young v. Kansas City, 152 Mo. 661, 54 S. W. 535.

tional, null, and void, for that: (a) That said § 9 throughout infringes the rights of local self-government, fundamental and historic in the state of Rhode Island, enjoyed and preserved from the settlement of its four towns to the adoption of the Constitution, which the Constitution itself recognizes. (b) That said section throughout, and particularly the portion thereof set forth in the third numbered paragraph of the said bill or petition, infringes the Constitution of the state of Rhode Island, and is contrary to article 1, §§ 2, 23. (c) That said portion of said § 9 also infringes article 4, § 10, of the Constitution of the state of Rhode Island. (d) That said section throughout infringes article 14, § 2, of the amendments to the Constitution of the United States."

1. As to the claim that § 9, chap. 804, of the Public Laws of Rhode Island "infringes the rights of local self-government," it has already been decided by this court, in Newport v. Horton, 22 R. I. 196, 50 L. R. A. 330, 47 Atl. 312: "Our conclusion is that the right of a city to the sole control of its police force has not been so reserved as to bring it within article 1, § 23, or article 4, § 10, of the Constitution; that the act to establish a board of police commissioners for the city of Newport is not unconstitutional on the ground of interference with the right of that city to local self-government, so far as the appointment of a chief of police by said commissioners is concerned; that the petition, therefore, states no ground for relief."

Although the case of Newport v. Horton, supra, was confined to the single question of the appointment of a chief of police, that being the only question there raised, yet this very question, the chief of police being an appointee of the commissioners, involved the whole question of the validity of the appointment of the commissioners themselves, and the historical discussion of the rights of local self-government and of the question of the authority of the general assembly in regard to the control of the police was so fully set forth therein that the scope of that opinion is broad enough to cover the whole question of legislative power in the matter of police. After a full discussion of the status of the towns under the original or parliamentary charter of 1643-44, and of the powers of the general assembly to control the towns under the charter of Charles II., of 1663, and of the authorities, it is stated (p. 208 of 22 R. I., p. 338 of 50 L. R. A., and p. 316 of 47 Atl.): "The clear weight of authority sustains the right of the legislature to control police; and equally is it sustained by sound reason." The whole question of "the right of the legislature to control police" is therefore fully settled in this state by the foregoing case.

2. The further question here raised is as to the right of the legislature to require the payment of the expenses of the police department by the city of Newport; the respondents contending that, inasmuch as the police commissioners and their appointees are held to be state officers, the state should pay them out of the general state funds, and has no right to require that the city shall pay them out of its funds; and that this is an infringement of the same constitutional rights as above set forth. It would appear upon general principles that, if the general assembly has the right to "control police," although their duties are confined to a certain locality, it would have the equal right to provide for the payment of the expenses of the local police department out of the local funds of the municipality, and that such payment could lawfully be required only out of such funds; and, upon examination of the authorities cited, such is found to be the law.

In the leading case of Baltimore v. State, 15 Md. 376, 74 Am. Dec. 572, decided in 1860, after most elaborate argument by very able counsel, this same question of the legislative power to appropriate local funds for the support of the police department was most fully and ably discussed, and the court sustained the act, in this particular, as well as generally. Thus, on page 397 of 15 Md., 74 Am. Dec. 572, Martin, J. (superior court), says: "The 15th section of the bill presents the question as to the authority of the legislature to confer upon the commissioners the means of raising the money necessary for the execution of the duties imposed upon them, without which, of course, the board would be inefficient and powerless. That portion of the 15th section which confers on the commissioners the authority to estimate what sum of money will be necessary to enable them to discharge the duties imposed on them, and the obligation of the mayor and city council to raise, by assessment and levy upon the assessable property of the city, the sum thus estimated by the board, is not obnoxious to any valid objection, as a question of power. But the commissioners are authorized to issue certificates of indebtedness, in the name of the mayor and city council, in the manner, upon the terms, and for the purposes indicated by the bill, upon the contingency of the mayor, register, comptroller, or other proper disbursing officer failing to comply with the requisitions of the board; and the validity of this power has been contested and defended with great ability by the respective counsel." And on page 493 of 15 Md., 74 Am. Dec. 572, Le Grande, Ch.

J. (court of appeals), after an elaborate opinion, says: "The opinion of the learned judge who decided this case in the superior court shows the bestowal of great care and his usual ability in its preparation. The views there taken are in full concurrence with those herein presented. The judgment pronounced by him must be affirmed." The judges were unanimous.

So, in Young v. Kansas City, 152 Mo. 661, 54 S. W. 535, where an official stenographer of the criminal court of Kansas City was required to be paid out of the city treasury, it is said (p. 665 of 152 Mo., p. 536 of 54 S. W.): "We have, then, a court of the state created by law to hear and punish crime in Kansas City. That it was and is entirely competent for the legislature to require the salary of an official of that court to be paid out of the treasury of Kansas City and be a charge upon the revenues of said city, we have no sort of doubt." See also State ex rel. Police Com'rs v. County Court, 34 Mo. 546, where legislative power of appropriation of county funds for payment of the expenses of the police department was fully argued and sustained.

So, as to the general power of the legislature for the appropriation of funds of county, town, or city for the purpose of paying for local improvements or for the payment of disputed claims, etc., see New Orleans v. Clark (Jefferson City Gaslight Co. v. Clark) 95 U. S. 644, 654, 24 L. ed. 521, 522; Williams v. Eggleston, 170 U. S. 304, 310, 42 L. ed. 1047, 1049, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 617; Kelly v. Pittsburgh, 104 U. S. 78, 81, 26 L. ed. 658, 659; Mobile County v. Kimball, 102 U. S. 691, 26 L. ed. 238; Guthrie Nat. Bank v. Guthrie, 173 U. S. 528, 43 L. ed. 796, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 513; Chicago B. & Q. R. Co. v. Otoe County, 16 Wall. 667, 21 L. ed. 375; State ex rel. Bulkeley v. Williams, 68 Conn. 131, 48 L. R. A. 465, 35 Atl. 24, 421; Philadelphia v. Field, 58 Pa. 320; Perkins v. Slack, 96 Pa. 270; People ex rel. Springfield v. Power, 25 Ill. 187; Williams v. Cammack, 27 Miss. 209, 61 Am. Dec. 508; Guilford v. Chenango County, 13 N. Y. 143; Agawam v. Hampden County, 130 Mass. 528, 530; Prince v. Crocker, 166 Mass. 347, 359, 32 L. R. A. 610, 44 N. E. 446; Creighton v. San Francisco, 42 Cal. 446; People ex rel. Blanding v. Burr, 13 Cal. 353; Baltimore v. State, 15 Md. 376, 74 Am. Dec. 572; New York v. Tenth Nat. Bank, 111 N. Y. 447, 15 N. E. 618.

In most of the cases cited by the parties the question of the payment of salaries and expenses of the police department seems not to have been raised, but to have been treated as involved only as incidental to the general question of legislative control.

latest text-book on the subject (1904), it is stated (§ 64, p. 199): "In the absence of constitutional inhibition, the legislature has unlimited power to control over those municipal officers who are charged with the performance of governmental functions devolved upon it, but cannot interfere with those officers who perform functions of a distinctly municipal character. This power is illustrated in many of the states by the creation of what is known as the 'metropolitan police' for the larger cities. This police force is usually appointed and controlled by a board of commissioners, chosen either by the legislature or governor of the state, as an exercise of the sovereign power of legislation and patronage." Also (§ 65, p. 205): "It may also create and appoint a board of police commissioners, and regulate the compensation for them and for the police officers of the municipality, and compel their payment out of the municipal treasury. In short, it has been repeatedly adjudicated that the legislature has the same power over the revenues of the municipality that it has over the funds of the state, and may thus direct their application to such purposes as it deems appropriate for the public welfare."

No case is cited by the respondents, nor has any case come to the attention of the court, wherein it is held that, in the absence of an express prohibition in the Constitution of a state, the legislature has not full control of the police department of any municipal or local subdivision, and, incidental to such full control, the power to provide for payment of salaries and expenses. On the contrary, the cases cited by the respondents in their brief without exception, so far as they at all relate to the question of legislative control of the department of police, or of any of the officers appointed by a police commission, sustain the position heretofore set forth. The case of Gooch v. Exeter, 70 N. H. 413, 85 Am. St. Rep. 637, 48 Atl. 1100, which was a suit by a police officer appointed by police commissioners, for wages at a rate fixed by the commission, against the city of Exeter, is under a constitutional provision which is remarkably like the provisions of the Rhode Island charter of 1663, which then set forth the powers of the general assembly of Rhode Island with relation to the appointment of officers and commissioners, and which are hereafter more fully discussed. Under similar provisions similar cases have been decided in many other states, and all of them sustain the same position in regard to the legislative power in question. See Com. v. Plaisted, 148 Mass. 375, 2 L. R. A. 142, 12 Am. St. Rep. 566, 19 N. E. 224; Burch v.

Hardwicke, 30 Gratt. 32, 33, 32 Am. Rep. 640; State ex rel. Bulkeley v. Williams, 68 Conn. 131, 149, 48 L. R. A. 465, 35 Atl. 24, 421; State ex rel. Atwood v. Hunter, 38 Kan. 578, 17 Pac. 177; State ex rel. Atty. Gen. v. Covington, 29 Ohio St. 102.

The respondents in argument seem to rest very confidently upon the opinion in the case of Ex parte Anderson (Tex. Crim. App.) 10 Tex. Ct. Rep. 852, 81 S. W. 973. In this case the "commissioners" objected to, and the validity of whose appointment was held to be unconstitutional, were said to "dominate and have sole control over the city council in regard to the police department, fire department and the sanitary and street department; and over all franchises and privileges to use the streets of the city for any purpose, or otherwise to exercise any public privilege or advantage in said city, and to prevent the issuance of any bonds by said city for any purpose whatever." They had also various additional powers in regard to legislation, etc.; and it appears from the whole case that the powers granted to these commissioners practically took away all the powers of the mayor and aldermen. The opinion refers to numerous provisions of the Texas Constitution expressly guaranteeing the right of local self-government to the towns and cities, and, among others (p. 978 of 81 S. W., and p. 857 of 10 Tex. Ct. Rep.), those of article 3, § 56, where it is provided that "the legislature shall not . . . pass any local or special law, . . . regulating the affairs of counties, cities, towns, wards, or school districts; . . . creating offices, or prescribing the powers and duties of officers in counties, cities, towns, election, and school districts," etc. From all which it appears that the act in question creating these commissioners and prescribing their powers and duties was in violation of numerous express provisions of the Texas Constitution.

In a number of other cases cited upon the respondents' brief, the opinions expressly discriminate between local affairs like a fire department or department of streets, sewers, etc., which are not subject to direct legislative control, and state functions, such as those exercised by the police. For example: In Lexington v. Thompson, 113 Ky. 540, 57 L. R. A. 775, 101 Am. St. Rep. 361, 68 S. W. 477, it is expressly stated on page 557 of 113 Ky., page 780 of 57 L. R. A., page 371 of 101 Am. St. Rep., and on page 482 of 68 S. W.: "The better opinion as to police systems seems to be that, inasmuch as the state is charged primarily with the preservation of public peace and the protection of life and property in the cities as well as in the rural districts, the city police is, in a large measure at least, a part of the 1 L.R.A. (N.S.) state constabulary, and its members perform the functions of state officials in the exercise of delegated state sovereignty. Therefore, in so far as the police systems of our cities form a part of the state government, they are subject to legislative control."

The same principle is set forth in State ex rel. Geake v. Fox, 158 Ind. 126, 56 L. R. A. 893, 63 N. E. 19; State ex rel. White v. Barker, 116 Iowa, 96, 57 L. R. A. 244, 93 Am. St. Rep. 222, 89 N. W. 204; Moreland v. Millen, 126 Mich. 381, 85 N. W. 882; State ex rel. Holt v. Denny, 118 Ind. 449, 4 L. R. A. 65, 21 N. E. 274; Evansville v. State, 118 Ind. 426, 4 L. R. A. 93, 21 N. E. 267.

The remaining cases cited by the respondents upon this point relate to various attempts on the part of the legislature in different states to control through commissions such matters as fire departments, highway departments, and other matters of purely local cognizance, and do not in any way militate against the position with regard to legislative control of the police. Respondents in their brief and argument insist very confidently and very strongly that chapter 804, Pub. Laws, is in violation of article 4, § 10, of the Constitution of the state, to wit:

"Sec. 10. The general assembly shall continue to exercise the powers they have heretofore exercised, unless prohibited in this Constitution."

Respondents attempt to show, by historical references to various acts and charters, that this control of police in municipalities was not a power which the general assembly had ever exercised, and that, consequently, it was a power which was reserved to the people. It appears, however, upon examination of the charter of 1663 (2 R. I. Col. Rec. 1664-1677, pp. 9, 10), that the general assembly constituted by that charter was given full power "to elect and constitute such offices and officers, and to graunt such needfull commissions, as they shall thinke fitt and requisite, ffor the ordering, managing and dispatching of the affaires of the sayd Governour and Company, and their successours; and from tyme to tyme, to make, ordeyne, constitute or repeal, such lawes, statutes, orders and ordinances, formes and ceremonies of government and magistracye as to them shall seeme meete for the good and welfare of the sayd Company, and ffor the government and ordering of the landes and hereditaments, hereinafter mentioned to be graunted, and of the people that doe, or att any tyme hereafter shall, inhabitt or bee within the same; soe as such lawes, ordinances and constitutiones. soe made, bee not contrary and repugnant unto, butt, as neare as may bee, agreeable to the lawes of this our realme of England, considering the nature and constitutione of the place and people there; and alsoe to apoynt, order and direct, erect and settle, such places and courts of jurisdiction, for the heareinge and determininge of all actions, cases, matters and things, happening within the sayd collonie and plantatione, and which shall be in dispute, and depending there, as they shall thinke fitt; and alsoe to distinguish and sett forth the severall names and titles, duties, powers and limitts, of each court, office and officer, superior and inferior; and alsoe to contrive and apoynt such formes of oaths and attestations, not repugnant, but, as neare as may bee, agreeable, as aforesayd, to the lawes and statutes of this our realme, as are conveniente and requisite, with respect to the due administration of justice, and due execution and discharge of all offices and places of trust by the persons that shall bee therein concerned; alsoe to regulate and order the waye and manner of all elections to offices and places of trust."

An act passed in 1664, at the very first session of the general assembly after receiving the said charter, related to the police of the several towns (see 2 R. I. Col. Rec. p. 27), as follows: "It is ordered, that each towne is impowered to apoynt a day for election of their towne officers, and to elect as to chouse Towne Counsell men, soe many as to make vp sixe with the Assistants of each towne, as alsoe Clarke, Treasurer, Constable and Sargant; and that the sayde officers shall receive their ingagemment from one of the Assistants." Whereby it appears that the first provision for election of police or peace officers was for election by the freemen at town meeting.

In 1669 an act was passed, requiring each respective town in the colony to "erect, build, make, and maintain at their own Charge . . . one good and sufficient Pair of stocks or Cage, for the punishing and securing of Offenders, in such Place or Places of each respective Town, as shall be to them most convenient." R. I. Pub. Laws, 1767, p. 210. This a plain instance of the exercise of legislative control over local municipal expenditure, even if the amounts involved are not large.

A notable instance of the regulation and control of the police is seen in the charter of the city of Providence of 1832, where the "administration of police" is vested in the "mayor and aldermen," and not in the freemen. Even in the charter of the city of Newport, passed May, 1853 (Laws 1853, pp. 21, 22), the only provision which covers the appointment of police and their compensation is as follows, from § 4: "The city council shall appoint all necessary officers, define the duties, and fix the compensation 1 L.R.A. (N.S.) of officers, in cases where such duties, fees, and compensation shall not be defined and fixed by this charter or the laws of the state." Further references almost without number might be detailed to show how, in relation to various matters of public interest, though of local application, the general assembly has assumed and exercised control, many of which are given in the opinion of Stiness, Ch. J., in the case of Newport v. Horton, supra.

That a municipal charter is subject at all times to such change, modification, or repeal as the legislature shall see fit to impose is not only fully set forth in many of the cases cited, supra, but is very convincingly and strongly stated in Philadelphia v. Fox, 64 Pa. 169, wherein, at page 181, it decides as follows: "The sovereign may continue its corporate existence, and yet assume or resume the appointments of all its officers and agents into its own hands; for the power which can create and destroy can modify and change. Indeed, the legislature of this commonwealth, under the Constitution, could not by contract invest any municipal corporation with an irrevocable franchise of government over any part of its territory. It cannot alienate any part of the legislative power which, by the Constitution, is vested in a general assembly annually convened. Parker v. Com. 6 Pa. 507, 47 Am. Dec. 480. If the legislature were to attempt to erect a municipality with a special provision that its charter should be unchangeable or irrevocable, such provision would be a nullity; for acts of Parliament derogatory from the power of subsequent Parliaments bind not. 1 Bl. Com. 90. That such political institutions have not, and cannot have, any vested rights as against the state, is strikingly illustrated and exemplified in Dunmore's Appeal, 52 Pa. 374, where it was held by this court that municipal corporations, being creatures of legislation, have no constitutional guaranty of trial by jury and such trial may be denied them." It is needless to say, in view of all these matters, that the court in this instance does not find that the act in question is in violation of article 4, § 10, of the Constitution, but, on the contrary, finds that this exercise of legislative power is well within the provisions of the Constitution.

The respondents also claim, in their answer to the alternative writ, that the section of the act in question (Pub. Laws, chap. 804, § 9) also infringes article 14, § 2, of the Amendments to the Constitution of the United States. We do not find that this position is insisted upon, either in the brief of the respondents or in the argument before the court; nor do we find any case cited where it is held that such an act as this, which is here in question, is in any manner an infringement of the said provisions of the United States Constitution. On the contrary, several of the cases above cited incidentally hold that such acts, being within the direct legislative control, under the Constitutions of the several states, are not obnoxious to the provisions of article 14 of the Amendments to the Constitution of the United States. See, in this connection, Williams v. Eggleston, 170 U. S. 304, 310, 42 L. ed. 1047, 1049, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 617; Kelly v. Pittsburgh, 104 U. S. 78, 81, 26 L. ed. 658, 659; Mobile County v. Kimball, 102 U. S. 691, 26 L. ed. 238; State ex rel. Bulkeley v. Williams, 68 Conn. 131, 48 L. R. A. 465, 35 Atl. 24, 421; Giozza v. Tiernan, 148 U. S. 662, 37 L. ed. 602, 13 Sup. Ct. TENNESSEE SUPREME COURT.

J. S. FITE, Superintendent of Shelby County Workhouse, Appt.,
v.

STATE OF TENNESSEE ex rel. NICK SNIDER.

(.... Tenn.)

x. Convict—credit for good behavior.

Conferring on a board of commissioners the power to fix the credits which shall be allowed convicts for good behavior is an unconstitutional delegation of legislative power.

Case Note.—The objections made to the constitutionality of statutes providing for the allowance of credits on a prisoner's term for good behavior are: (1) That they encroach upon the province of the judiciary; (2) that they operate as an exercise of the pardoning power; and (3) that they are a delegation of the legislative power.

That an act (May 1, 1861) providing for a graduated deduction from the term of every prisoner having no infraction of rules recorded against him is unconstitutional as interfering with judgments of the judiciary, was held in Com. ex rel. Johnson v. Hallowsay, 42 Pa. 446, 82 Am. Dec. 526, by a divided court. It is said: "The trial, conviction, and sentencing of criminals are judicial duties; and the duration or period of the sentence is an essential part of a judicial judgment in a criminal record."

This reasoning was criticized in State ex rel. Atty. Gen. v. Peters, 43 Ohio St. 651, 4 N. E. 81, as failing to distinguish between the judicial duties proper and those acts relating to the mode and manner of executing a sentence. The further argument, quoted 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

2. Statute—void in part.

An entire statute will not be annulled by the insertion therein of an unconstitutional provision if it is so far independent of other provisions that the object of the statute will not be affected by its absence.

3. Court—convict—time allowance.

The courts will not recognize a deduction from the sentence of a criminal of time for good behavior, which has been allowed under authority of an unconstitutional statute.

(May 22, 1905.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Criminal Court for Shelby County in favor of relator in a habeas corpus proceeding to secure his release from custody, to which he was alleged to be entitled because of time credits. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. L. T. M. Canada for appellant.

Mr. Charles T. Cates, Jr., Attorney General, for appellee:

The vestiture of power to grant reprieves and pardons in the chief executive is exclusive of all other departments of the state.

McAlister, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The question involved in this case is in respect to the constitutionality of a certain in FITE v. STATE EX REL. SNIDER, that the law operates to impair the judgment of the court, since they could not know, in measuring the sentence, how many days of abatement would be earned, is commented on in Re Linden, 112 Wis. 523, 88 N. W. 645, where it is said: "It seems plain that the court might well have taken into account the probability of good-time allowance, which is rendered reasonably certain by such statutes, and have measured the sentence pronounced accordingly."

On the other hand, State ex rel. Atty. Gen. v. Peters, 43 Ohio St. 629, 4 N. E. 81, sustains a law providing for determinate sentences, and leaving their termination, between the expiration of the minimum and maximum terms, to the discretion of the board of managers. The court thus argues: "It is among the admitted legislative powers to define crimes; to prescribe the mode of procedure for their punishment; to fix by law the kind and manner of punishment; and to provide such disciplinary regulations for prisoners, not in conflict with the fundamental law, as the legislature deems best.

provision of the workhouse law embodied in Shannon's Code, § 7423, namely: "The board of commissioners may, on recommendation of the superintendent deduct, for good conduct, a portion of the time for which any prisoner has been sentenced, or a portion of the fine, if he or she be working out a fine."

The subject-matter of the inquiry arises on the petition of one Nick Snider, prisoner in the county workhouse of Shelby county, for the writ of habeas corpus to be discharged from said confinement upon the ground that a proper credit and allowance for good time under said act would entitle him to his liberty. The record reveals that the prisoner was under confinement in said workhouse under the judgment of the criminal court of Shelby county, on the 17th day of November, 1903, upon a conviction of unlawfully carrying a pistol, and the assessment of a fine of $50 and confinement in said workhouse for a period of eleven months and twenty-nine days. On the 14th of March, 1904, in accordance with the recommendation of the superintendent of said workhouse, the board of workhouse commissioners directed that the relator, Snider, be relieved of eight months of his term of imprisonment on account of his good conduct.

It further appears that on March 28, 1904, said board of workhouse commissioners directed that the sum of $45 of the fine of $50 imposed upon the relator by judgment of the criminal court be remitted. Thereafter, on the 1st of April, 1904, said board of workhouse commissioners, in view of the credits allowed on fine and sentence of said Nick Snider, relator, ordered his discharge from the county workhouse upon payment of all costs, which was accordingly done.

It appears, however, that the judge presiding over the criminal court of Shelby county, conceiving that the action taken by the board of workhouse commissioners was beyond their authority, issued an order directing the superintendent of the workhouse to hold relator in custody until he had served out his term of imprisonment and paid the fine imposed, or had secured or worked out said fine in the manner directed by law. Thereupon the relator filed his petition for the writ of habeas corpus, which being heard by the judge of the second circuit court of Shelby county, it was adjudged that the relator was illegally restrained of his liberty, and he was ordered to be discharged, and the defendant, Fite, as superintendent of the Shelby county workhouse, was taxed with all costs of proceeding.

The said Fite, superintendent, aforesaid, appealed, and has assigned the following error: "The orders of the board of workhouse commissioners of Shelby county relieving relator of $45 of the fine of $50 imposed upon him, and reducing jail sentence from eleven months twenty-nine days to three months and twenty-nine days, were beyond the authority vested in said board of workhouse commissioners, and were null and void, because: "(1) The statute under which said board claimed authority to make said orders is unconstitutional, in that it attempts to confer the pardoning power upon said board, in violation of § 6 of article 3 of the Constitution of the state; and (2) it is also violative of § 1 of article 6 of the

In many instances the legislature fixes the penalty, as, for instance, in murder in the first and second degree; and this has never been regarded as an infringement of the judicial power. The law might fix a definite sentence for each crime without such infringement. The statute vests in the courts in some instances a discretion between a maximum and minimum penalty, or between alternative penalties; but this discretion might be taken away without infringing upon the exclusive power of the judiciary."

And it has been held in State v. Page, 99 Kan. 664, 57 Pac. 514, that Kan. Gen. Stat. 1897, chap. 134, which provides that the board of managers of the state reformatory may grant an absolute release before the expiration of the sentence, in view of the good conduct of the prisoner, does not confer judicial power, since it does not give power to adjudge and condemn to imprisonment.

The same objection has been made to statutes providing for the parole of convicts. It was overruled in Fuller v. State, 122 Ala. 32, 45 L. R. A. 502, 82 Am. St. Rep. 17, 26 So. 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

146, discussing § 5462, Code 1896, which provides that the governor may authorize the discharge of any convict from custody, and suspend his sentence upon terms, without granting a pardon. The court says: A "parole does not in any wise displace or abridge the sentence. It merely stops its execution for a time only, it may be, or indefinitely, it may prove. It suspends, not destroys."

In Miller v. State, 149 Ind. 607, 40 L. R. A. 109, 49 N. E. 894, the power conferred by § 8 of the Indiana reformatory act (Acts 1897, p. 69) on the board of managers, to release upon parole persons confined upon indeterminate sentences, after the expiration of the minimum term, was said to be not judicial, but purely ministerial or administrative. From this conclusion, however, two judges dissented.

A similar statute (Mass. Stat. 1895, chap. 504) has been held not to take the determination of the time of imprisonment from the courts. Murphy v. Com. 172 Mass. 264, 43 L. R. A. 154, 70 Am. St. Rep. 266, 52 N. E. 505.

Constitution of the state in that it attempts to confer upon said board judicial power to review, revise, and modify valid judgments of criminal and circuit courts of this state."

The provisions of the workhouse law material to be mentioned in this investigation are embodied in chap. 123, § 18, p. 271, of the act of 1891, compiled in Shannon's Code in § 7423, namely: "The board of commissioners may, on recommendation of the superintendent, deduct, for good conduct, a portion of the time for which any prisoner has been sentenced, or a portion of the fine, if he or she be working out a fine. Should any prisoner escape, he or she shall forfeit all deductions that have been allowed, and, when recaptured, shall be made to work out the costs of the same in addition to the other costs in the case. The commissioners may discharge any prisoner when satisfied from the certificate of the physi-

On the other side of the question is the case of People v. Cummings, 88 Mich. 249. 14 L. R. A. 285, 50 N. W. 310, in which it is said: "It is in the power of the legislature to fix all punishment for crime, and to provide for a minimum and maximum punishment, and to give the courts in which the prisoners are convicted a discretion to fix a term between these limits; but it cannot be contended for a moment that this discretion can be given to any other person or persons. To do so would imperil the liberties of the citizen by putting his punishment for wrongs committed into the arbitrary power of unauthorized persons, without any right of remedy in the courts."

All of the foregoing cases, except Com. ex rel. Johnson v. Halloway, are distinguishable from Ex parte Darling, 16 Nev. 98, 40 Am. Rep. 495, where it was held that Neyada Stat. 1881, 109, establishing certain credits for good behavior, in so far as it attempts to commute any portion of the sentence imposed by the courts prior to the time the act took effect, is inoperative and void, as interfering with the judiciary.

The Illinois act of June 26, 1895, which provides that the warden may certify to the prison board that a prisoner serving under indeterminate sentence has shown himself so reliable and trustworthy that he may safely be given final release; and that, when the board shall decide that said prisoner is entitled to his final discharge, it shall cause a record of the case to be made and sent to a judge of the court that sentenced the prisoner, who shall enter an order for the final discharge, which, on being approved by the governor, shall constitute a full discharge,—is not open to objection on the ground that it authorizes the board to perform a judicial act. George v. People, 167 Ill. 464, 47 N. E. 741.

Various reasons are given for holding that the class of statutes under discussion does not infringe upon the power to pardon.

It is said in Ex parte Wadleigh, 82 Cal. 518, 23 Pac. 190 that a statute providing for fixed commutations for good behavior enters into and becomes a part of the judgment, and, hence, does not interfere with the power to pardon. That such deduction becomes an essential legal element in the sentence itself is held in Opinion of Justices, 13 Gray, 618, and Re Canfield, 98 Mich. 644. 57 N. W. 807.

The reason given for a like conclusion in Com. ex rel. Johnson v. Halloway, 42 Pa. 446, 82 Am. Dec. 526, is that "a pardon operates directly on the crime, and only indirectly on the criminal. He is discharged from further punishment under the operation of a pardon, because the offense is blotted out for which he was consigned to punishment."

The power conferred on the board of managers of the state reformatory by Kan. Gen. Stat. 1897, chap. 134, to grant an absolute release before the expiration of the sentence, in view of the good conduct of the prisoner, is not the executive power of pardon, not being the power to remit guilt, nor to restore to civil rights. State v. Page, 60 Kan. 664, 57 Pac. 514.

In this connection, reference may also be made to the case of Miller v. State, 149 Ind. 607, 40 L. R. A. 109, 49 N. E. 894, in which it is said, in discussing whether the release of a prisoner on parole is the exercise of the pardoning power, that pardon is the remission of guilt, and the act of the board in shortening the sentence leaves the conviction of guilt unaffected.

That an act establishing credits for good behavior amounts to an exercise of the pardoning power so far as it applies to sentences previously pronounced, is decided in State ex rel. Johnson v. McClellan, 87 Tenn. 52, 9 S. W. 233, quoted in FITE v. STATE EX REL. SNIDER. The validity of such a law with respect to its retroactive operation is discussed in State ex rel. Atty. Gen. v. Peters, 43 Ohio St. 829; 4 N. E. 81, where it is said that the only party who could object is the prisoner, who cannot, where it is clearly for his benefit.

The third objection, that such statutes unlawfully delegate legislative power, sustained in FITE v. STATE EX REL. SNIDER, does not seem to have been raised heretofore. That the legislature, in the exercise of its power to prescribe punishments, may give the courts a discretion between a maximum or minimum penalty, is generally admitted. See the quotations hereinbefore taken from State ex rel. Atty. Gen. v. Peters and People v. Cummings, in the latter of which a reason is given why this discretion should not be given to any other person or persons.

In the following cases statutes allowing credit for good time have been construed and applied without question as to their validity: Woodward v. Murdock, 124 Ind. 439, 24 N. E. 1047; Re Kness, 58 Kan. 705, 50 Pac. 939; Re Fuller, 34 Neb. 581, 52 N. W. 577; State ex rel. Filer v. Patterson (N. J. L.) 22 Atl. 802; State v. Austin, 113 Mo. 538, 21 S. W. 31; Re Clawson, 5 Utah, 358, 15 Pac. 328; Ex parte Nokes, 6 Utah, 106, 21 Pac. 458.

cian in charge that he or she is physically unable to do labor or for any cause when they may deem it best for the institution and the public good."

The argument of the attorney general is that the exercise of the power conferred upon said board of workhouse commissioners is both violative of § 6 of article 3 of the Constitution of the state, vesting in the governor the pardoning power, and is also in contravention of § 1, art. 6, of the Constitution, vesting all judicial power in the courts of this state, because the necessary effect of the exercise of said power by the board of workhouse commissioners is to constitute said board a judicial tribunal for the purpose of reviewing, modifying, and reversing the judgment of courts of competent jurisdiction acting under the power vested in them by the Constitution of the state.

We have several cases in this state in which intimations were thrown out touching the constitutionality of such acts, but no case in which the precise point now presented was involved. In State v. Dalton, 109 Tenn. 544, 72 S. W. 456, the court was dealing with the power of the circuit judge to relieve a convict of imprisonment imposed by a valid judgment rendered at a former term. In its opinion this court said: "The vestiture of the power to grant reprieves and pardons in the chief executive is exclusive of all other departments of the state, and the legislature cannot, directly or indirectly, take it from his control, and vest it in others, or authorize or require it to be exercised by any other officer or authority. It is a power and a duty intrusted to his judgment and discretion, which cannot be interfered with, and of which he cannot be relieved. The circuit judge's action in remitting the imprisonment and releasing the costs adjudged against the defendant cannot be sustained under § 7226 of Shannon's edition of the Code, or act 1891, chap. 123, § 18 p. 271 (Shannon's Code, § 7423), authorizing the discharge of convicts confined in workhouses under certain circumstances."

In State ex rel. Johnson v. McClellan, 87 Tenn. 52-55, 9 S. W. 233, the act of 1885 (Acts 1885, chap. 15, p. 87), allowing to convicts certain specific credits on their terms of imprisonment in consideration of good conduct, was involved; but it appeared in that case that the judgment under which the prisoner was serving had been rendered prior to the passage of the act of 1885, and for that reason the court expressed no opinion touching its constitutionality. In that case, however, the court said as follows: "The act of 1885 (passed at the extra session June 12th) . . . is also referred to, and it is insisted that the relator was and is entitled to the benefit of that act; but such cannot be its effect, though it purports to be for the benefit of those then as well as thereafter confined in the penitentiary, because to the extent of provision for those then confined it is an attempted exercise of the pardoning power, which is vested alone in the governor under the Constitution, and is void."

Again, in the case of Rogers v. State, 101 Tenn. 425, 47 S. W. 697, the question as to the constitutionality of this section of the workhouse law was raised, but not decided, as the case went off on another point.

There seems to be much authority on this subject in other states of the Union, which we find, upon examination, is not altogether harmonious.

The supreme court of Michigan, in People v. Cummings, 88 Mich. 249, 14 L. R. A. 285, 50 N. W. 310, in passing upon the constitutionality of a statute of that state providing for indeterminate sentences and the disposition, management, and release of criminals under such sentences, says as follows: "It is not clear from the reading of this statute whether the board of control is given the power of absolute discharge from imprisonment or not. If so, it would be clearly unconstitutional, as the exercise of such power would certainly involve one of two things, and perhaps both. It would be the exercise of judicial power in determining the term of imprisonment of a citizen or an act of grace, to wit, the bestowing of a pardon and release of a prisoner before his term of imprisonment had expired. The judicial power of this state by the Constitution is vested in certain specified courts, . . . and the pardoning power is vested absolutely in the governor of the state." The court then proceeded to hold that this act provided for the exercise of the pardoning power, and also for the exercise of judicial power by said board of control.

In Com. ex rel. Johnson v. Holloway, 42 Pa. 446, 82 Am. Dec. 526, it was held that such legislation was not an interference with the pardoning power, for the reason that "pardon operates directly on the crime, and only indirectly on the criminal." But it was further held by a divided court that such diminution of sentence by reason of good conduct was an interference with judicial power, and therefore void. In the midst of its opinion the court said as follows: "From what judicial sentence may not the legislature direct 'deductions' to be made, if this act be constitutional? What they may do indirectly they may do directly. If they may authorize boards of inspectors to disregard judicial sentences, why may they not repeal them as fast as they are pronounced, and thus assume the highest judicial functions?" Further on the court says: "In respect to one of the relators, who was convicted and sentenced before the law was passed, it is considered very clear that it is a legislative impairing of an existing legal judgment. But is it not equally so in respect to him who was sentenced since the date of the act? The court could not have taken the act into account in measuring the sentence because they could not know how many days of abatement the prisoner would earn."

In State ex rel. Atty. Gen. v. Peters, 43 Ohio St. 629, 4 N. E. 81, the supreme court of that state, dealing with a kindred statute, held: "It was not an interference with the executive or judicial powers conferred on these departments by the Constitution of the state."

In State ex rel. Bishop v. State Bd. of Corrections, 16 Utah, 478-480, 52 Pac. 1090, a similar question arose, and the supreme court of that state held the act unconstitutional, as being in violation of the governor's constitutional prerogative of pardon. That court said: The power to either pardon or commute can only be exercised by that authority in which it is vested by the Constitution. On the other hand, such statutes allowing good time as credit on sentences have been upheld. Opinion of Justices, 13 Gray, 618; State v. Austin, 113 Mo. 538, 21 S. W. 31; Woodward v. Murdock, 124 Ind. 439, 24 N. E. 1047; Re Fuller, 34 Neb. 581, 52 N. W. 577; Ex parte Nokes, 6 Utah, 106, 21 Pac. 458; State ex rel. Filer v. Patterson (N. J. L.) 22 Atl. 802.

The Congress of the United States, it appears, has also provided for credits on sentences of Federal convicts confined in state penitentiaries where there is no statute of the particular state providing for such allowances. U. S. Rev. Stat. §§ 5543, 5544, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 3721.

We are of opinion, upon an examination of the authorities and upon principle, that such legislation, where the credits are specifically defined by statute, and where the provisions of the statute operate alone upon sentences of convicts who have been imprisoned subsequent to the passage of the statute, is not an invasion of the constitutional prerogative of the governor. Said Chief Justice Marshall in United States v. Wilson, 7 Pet. 150, 8 L. ed. 640: "A pardon is an act of grace, proceeding from the power intrusted with the execution of the laws, which exempts the individual on whom it is bestowed from the punishment the law inflicts for a crime he has committed." It releases the offense and obliterates it in legal contemplation. Per Justice Field in Osborn v. United States, 91 U. S. 474, 478, 23 L. ed. 388, 390. A full and absolute pardon 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

releases the offender from entire punishment prescribed for his offense, and from all the disabilities consequent upon his conviction. Ex parte Garland, 4 Wall. 380, 18 L. ed. 371.

Again: "A pardon discharges the individual designated from all or some specified penal consequences of his crime. It may be full or partial, absolute or conditional." Bouvier, Law Dict. title, Pardon.

We think it quite obvious that an act of the legislature specifically defining credits for the good conduct, in existence at the date of the judgment against the convict, becomes a part of the sentence, and inheres into the punishment assessed. In California a statute providing in express terms that certain credits or deductions from a term of imprisonment shall be allowed for good conduct, without requiring any action on the part of the governor for this purpose, was held not to be unconstitutional as an infringement on his power to pardon, as it does not take away or interfere with such power in any way. In the opinion of the court the statute simply fixed the term of imprisonment in certain cases and upon certain conditions, and this provision entered into and became a part of the judgment of the court below. Ex parte Wadleigh, 82 Cal. 518, 23 Pac. 190.

In Re Canfield, 98 Mich. 644, 57 N. W. 807, it was held that the right of a convict to a prescribed reduction from his sentence upon compliance with the rules of the prison, which were prescribed by 2 How. Anno. Stat. (Mich.) § 9704, was one of which he could not be deprived, and that the act of 1893, the effect of which was to deprive a person sentenced under the prior statute of this right in part by reducing the amount of his credits, is to that extent an ex post facto law, because its effect is to increase, and not to mitigate, his punishment. It was held, therefore, that the prisoner was entitled to credit upon the basis of the statute under which he was sentenced.

Such, however, would not be the effect of an act of the legislature passed subsequent to the conviction of a particular convict, for as held in State ex rel. Johnson v. McClellan, 87 Tenn. 52-55, 9 S. W. 233, that would be a clear invasion of the prerogative of the governor. The scale of the punishment for the violation of a particular statute is fixed, in the first place, by the legislature, and in the next, it is administered by the court or jury. The power of the governor under the Constitution is exercised, of course, with reference to penalties and punishments inflicted by particular statutes, and, when judgment is pronounced upon the convict assessing his punishment by implication of law, he is entitled to the provisions of a statute prescribing credits for his good behavior; but the credits are in the nature of a payment by the state to the convict for his good behavior, in order to stimulate him to conform to the rules of the institution and to avoid the commission of crimes and misdemeanors during his imprisonment. Such statutes are prompted by the highest motives of humanity, and are looked upon with favor both by state and Federal legislatures.

The constitutional infirmity of § 18 of the workhouse law of 1891, now under review, is that no specific credits are provided as a reward for good behavior of the convict. The whole matter is left to the arbitrary discretion of the board of workhouse commissioners. It is plainly a delegation of legislative authority, which renders this part of the workhouse law unconstitutional and void. In this respect § 18 of the workhouse law is wholly unlike the Acts of 1869-70 and 1885, which specifically prescribed the credits that are to be allowed, and which statutes have been enforced from time to time by the courts.

As already seen in State ex rel. Johnson v. McClellan, 87 Tenn. 52, 9 S. W. 233, the act of 1869-70 was recognized by the court as a constitutional enactment, and it was accordingly applied in fixing the unexpired term of imprisonment of relator in that case. It may be remarked in this connection that the acts of Congress in allowing credit for good time specifically prescribed the scale by which they are to be graduated. But, while § 18 of the workhouse law is, for this reason, unconstitutional and void, it is so independent of the other provisions of the act as not thereby to affect their constitutionality. See State ex rel. Hays v. Cummins, 99 Tenn. 682, 42 S. W. 880. If the legislature had fixed a scale of credits for allowances of good time to workhouse prisoners, this section of the act would stand within constitutional limitations; but without it, it is clearly void as a delegation of legislative authority. So, if the legislature had fixed some graduated scale for the reduction of fines assessed against the prisoner, then the board of workhouse commissioners might have carried out the legislative authority. But, as already seen, § 18, of the workhouse act authorizes the commissioners to remit a portion of the fine without fixing any basis for its remission.

As the law now stands, the remission of fines and reduction of terms of imprisonment of convicts confined in the county workhouses of the state are wholly without authority, and subject such officials granting them to individual liability for malfeasance in office. It is the duty of the courts and executive officers of the state to disregard, 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

as well as to resist with all their official authority, the exercise of unlawful functions and assumed power by those who are acting in open violation of the statutes and Constitution of the state. It is very plain that under the existing laws, and until their amendment by the legislature, the governor alone is clothed with authority to remit fines and penalties and to reduce the terms of imprisonment of convicts confined in the county workhouse under judgments of the circuit and criminal courts of the state.

The judgment of the circuit court will therefore be reversed, the cause remanded, and the prisoner committed to the sheriff of the county, to be returned to the official in charge of the county workhouse, to serve out his fine and imprisonment assessed by the criminal court of Shelby county.

TENNESSEE SUPREME COURT.

WESTERN UNION TELEGRAPH COMPANY, Appt.,

v.

HUSTON GREER, by Next Friend.

(.... Tenn.)

Infant—contract—telegram—binding effect.

A minor is bound by a provision in a contract for the transmission of a telegram, that suit must be brought for its breach within sixty days.

(October 21, 1905.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Claiborne County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for failure promptly to transmit and deliver a telegram. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Hughes & Hughes, for appellant:

The clause providing for the company's nonliability where claim is not presented within sixty days is reasonable and valid.

27 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 1046; Western U. Tele. Co. v. Courtney, 113 Tenn. 482, 82 S. W. 484.

Such rule is binding on a minor.

Mead v. Phenix Ins. Co. 68 Kan. 432, 64

Case Note.—No other decisions have been found on the binding effect upon an infant of a stipulation in a contract for sending a telegram, limiting the time within which suit for breach must be brought; but identically the same question, in principle, has arisen in respect to such limitations contained in insurance contracts.

The minority of the beneficiaries of an accident insurance policy was held, in Suggs v. Travelers' Ins. Co. 71 Tex. 579, 1 L. R. A. 847, 9 S. W. 676, not to give them any

L. R. A. 79, 104 Am. St. Rep. 412, 75 Pac. 475; Suggs v. Travelers' Ins. Co. 71 Tex. 579, 1 L. R. A. 847, 9 S. W. 676; Guthrie v. Connecticut Indemnity Asso. 101 Tenn. 643, 49 S. W. 829.

The contract for sending the telegram was a contract for necessities, and, for that reason, Greer would be bound by it.

Stanton v. Willson, 3 Day, 37, 3 Am. Dec. 255; Englebert v. Troxell (Englebert v. Pritchett), 40 Neb. 195, 26 L. R. A. 177, 42 Am. St. Rep. 605, 58 N. W. 852.

Messrs. Shields, Cates, & Mountcastle also for appellant.

Messrs. Jesse L. Rogers, John P. Davis, and G. W. Montgomery for appellee.

Neil, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action was originally brought before a justice of the peace under a warrant stating the cause of action to be "for failure to promptly and properly send and deliver a certain telegram." There was a judgment rendered against the company by the justice of the peace, and from this judgment an appeal was prosecuted to the circuit court. In that court a judgment was rendered in favor of the plaintiff below for $200, and from this latter judgment the company prayed and obtained an appeal to this court.

The facts, so far as necessary to be stated, are as follows:

In January, 1905, the defendant in error, then a boy seventeen years old, left his father's home in Claiborne county, this state, without his father's knowledge or consent, and went thence to Louisville, Kentucky, and from that city to Decatur, Illinois. When he reached Decatur he only had about $1 or $1.50 in his possession. He tried to obtain work, but could get nothing to do. He then went to the telegraph office and deposited a telegram, addressed to his uncle, "Bud" Greer, at New Tazewell, Tennessee, the station nearest his father's home. This message was as follows, viz.:

Decatur, Ill.

To Bud Greer.

New Tazewell, Tennessee:

Send me fifteen dollars. Can't come home until I get it. See mama.

Huston Greer.

For the transmission of this message Huston Greer paid the company's charge, 59 cents. After he deposited the message he went to a hotel, where he remained all night, and returned the next morning to the telegraph office for a reply, but received none. After he had paid the charge for the message and his hotel bill he had only 10 cents left. With that he bought something to eat. After his money was all gone he went to police headquarters, and told the officials in charge that he was out of money and had no place to stay. Thereupon he was admitted to the jail, where he remained and was lodged and fed, and kindly treated for ten days. At the expiration of this time he received sufficient money to bear his expenses, and was released from confinement and returned home. The money, however, was sent in response to a letter which he wrote and mailed to his father while he was in jail. The telegram, when it reached the sendee, read "Decatur, Alabama," instead of "Decatur, Illinois." A second telegram, sent the next day, met the same fate. The result was that defendant in error's home people were misled into be-exemption from a stipulation in the contract requiring action on the policy to be brought within one year after the right accrued.

A provision of the same kind, in a life insurance policy made for the benefit of minors, was held to be effective and binding on them when an action for them was brought on the policy, in the case of O'Laughlin v. Union Cent. L. Ins. Co. 3 McCrary, 543, 11 Fed. 280.

In another case of a life insurance policy or benefit certificate, in which one of the beneficiaries was an infant, who died within the year within which the policy required action thereon to be brought, the court held not only that the stipulation of the policy was binding on an infant plaintiff, but that such contract stipulation limiting the time of action was not affected by a statutory exception in favor of minors, or by another provision of the statutes extending the time limited for commencement of an action if the person entitled to bring it dies before the expiration of such time. The court said 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

that these statutory provisions respecting "the time limited for the commencement of the action" referred to the time limited by law, and not to contract stipulations. Fey v. I. O. O. F. Mut. L. Ins. Soc. 120 Wis. 358, 98 N. W. 206.

To the same effect, it has been held, in an action on a fire insurance policy taken in the name of a minor, that a stipulation in the policy limiting the time for suit or action thereon to a period of twelve months after the fire was binding on the infant; and that in all such cases the contract limitation of the policy controls the general statute of limitations, and is good even against minor beneficiaries. Mead v. Phenix Ins. Co. 68 Kan. 432, 64 L. R. A. 79, 104 Am. St. Rep. 412, 75 Pac. 475.

There seems to be no ground of distinction in principle between these decisions upon the effect of these stipulations in insurance policies upon infant plaintiffs and the same kind of a provision in a contract for a telegram.

lieving that he was in Decatur, Alabama, and made inquiries accordingly, the consequence of which was the ten days' delay complained of.

The blank form upon which the message was written contained on its face a stipulation that the terms on the back of it were assented to. One of these terms was expressed in the following language: "The company will not be liable for damages or statutory penalty in any case where the claim is not presented in writing within sixty days after the message is filed with the company for transmission."

The present suit was not brought until after the sixty days had expired.

Sundry errors are assigned by the company as follows:

That the court erred (1) in refusing to withdraw from the jury all evidence concerning the payment of money by defendant in error's father for the purpose of ascertaining his whereabouts; (2) in refusing to withdraw all evidence concerning the defendant in error's having gone to jail in Decatur, Illinois; (3) in instructing the jury that defendant in error could recover for grief, disappointment, or other injury to his feelings; (4 and 5) in submitting to the jury the question of punitive damages; (6 and 7) in refusing to charge the jury, in accordance with the request of plaintiff in error, that the defendant in error, although a minor, was bound by the sixty-days clause above set out; (8) in refusing to set aside the verdict on the ground that it was excessive, evincing partiality, prejudice, or passion.

In the view we take of the case, it is necessary that we consider only the sixth and seventh assignments.

In this state it has been held that the sixty-days clause is a reasonable and valid one. Manier v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 94 Tenn. 446, 29 S. W. 732; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Courtney, 113 Tenn. 482, 82 S. W. 484. And the great weight of authority elsewhere is to the same effect. Albers v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 98 Iowa, 51, 66 N. W. 1040; Russell v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 57 Kan. 230, 45 Pac. 598; Webbe v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 64 Ill. App. 331; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Meredith, 95 Ind. 93; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Jones, 95 Ind. 228, 48 Am. Rep. 713; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. McKibben, 114 Ind. 511, 14 N. E. 894; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Yopst, 118 Ind. 248, 3 L. R. A. 224, 20 N. E. 222; Lester v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 84 Tex. 313, 19 S. W. 256; Hill v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 85 Ga. 425, 21 Am. St. Rep. 166, 11 S. E. 874; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Waxelbaum, 113 Ga. 1017, 56 L. R. A. 741, 742, 39 S. E. 443; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Dougherty, 54 Ark. 221, 11 L. R. A. 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

apparent why a minor should be excused from compliance with this regulation any more than an adult. Such persons must generally depend upon adult relatives or friends for the protection of their rights; and, where the law makes no saving or exception in their favor, the court can make none. Without doubt, owing to the great lapse of time and loss of evidence, the evils intended to be provided against by the rule would be very greatly intensified by establishing an exception in favor of persons under age and permitting them to sue after attaining their majority. Conceding that we have no power to ingraft this exception upon the rule, the serious evils that would result from so doing would far outnumber and outweigh the few instances in which the rights of infants against telegraph companies for breach of duty would be lost by the failure of relatives or friends to present their claims for them.

The sixth and seventh assignments having been sustained, the judgment must be reversed.

TENNESSEE SUPREME COURT.

H. C. SLOVER

v.

UNION BANK, Appt.

(.... Tenn.)

1. Limitation of actions—usury.

The statute of limitations does not begin to run against a right to recover usury, in case of a series of usurious transactions, until they are closed.

2. Action—legislative interference.

A provision in a statute of limitations that it shall not affect pending actions is nugatory, since the legislature has no right to interfere with rights of action after suit has been brought on them.

3. Limitation of actions—prospective operation of statute.

A statute providing that no action shall be brought on a claim for usury after two years from the time the cause of action arose will be given a prospective effect; and it will therefore not affect rights of action which accrued prior to its passage.

(September 28, 1905.)

A PPEAL by defendant from a decree of the Chancery Court for Anderson County overruling a demurrer to a bill filed to compel repayment of usury. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. C. J. Sawyer and D. K. Young for appellant.

Mr. J. H. Wallace, for appellee:

A statute will be so construed as to operate prospectively only, unless the words used, or the plain design of the framers of the law, being too clear to admit of any doubt, require that it should have a retrospective effect.

A vested right of action is property in the same sense in which tangible things are property, and is equally protected against arbitrary interference.

Case Note.—The doctrine enunciated by the authorities quoted in SLOVER v. UNION BANK in relation to the constitutionality of statutes shortening the period of limitation is stated in Buswell, Limitations & Adverse Possession, § 14, as follows: "It is generally held that a statute of limitations may apply to contracts existing at the time of its passage, if, by its terms, a reasonable time is allowed to creditors within which to bring their actions upon such contracts." Continuing, the author quotes from Terry v. Anderson, 95 U. S. 628, 24 L. ed. 365: "If the legislature may prescribe a limitation where none existed before, it may change one which has already been established. The parties to a contract have no more a vested interest in a particular limitation than they have in an unrestricted right to sue. They have no more a vested interest in the time for the commencement of an action than they have in the form of the action to be commenced."

Wilkes, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This cause is before us upon a decree of the chancellor overruling a demurrer and granting an appeal to the defendant.

The bill was filed to collect usury upon a series of transactions on the 20th of March, 1905. It charges that the last usurious interest was paid on the 1st of March, 1901, and that there was a final settlement between the parties on the 4th of March, 1902, of all the transactions between them involving the usury.

There was a demurrer filed, relying upon the statute of two years and the statute of six years; and it is insisted in this court that the demurrer should have been sustained on the ground that the action was barred by the statute of two years.

There being a series of usurious transactions, the statute of limitations would not begin to run until these transactions were closed; and a settlement was made between the parties on the 4th of March, 1902. On the 15th of April, 1903, the legislature of Tennessee passed an act in the following words, to wit: "No action shall be brought on any claim for usury after two years from the date of the payment of the debt upon which such claim for usury shall be based: Provided that this act shall not affect any litigation now pending." Shannon's Code Supp. p. 692.

It is insisted that, under this statute, all rights of action for usury paid, which had accrued more than two years before the passage of the act and upon which no suit had been brought at the time the act was passed, were barred, and that the expression of reservation used in the statute, "Provided this act shall not affect any litigation now pending," was intended to preserve all rights of action upon which suit had been brought before the act was passed, but none other, and that all other rights of action which had accrued more than two years before April 15, 1903, should be cut off at once and extinguished. In other words, if the right of action had accrued under the previously existing laws on the 15th day of April, 1901, it should be at once summarily cut off and extinguished; and, in this connection, it is said that the statute of limitations is not a vested right, but is a remedy, and that the legislature has the right to change and limit such remedy as it might see proper.

It is said by Mr. Bishop, in his work on Guiterman v. Wishon, 21 Mont. 458, 54 Pac. 566.

In Cooley, Const. Lim. 7th ed. p. 523, it is said: "All statutes of limitation, also, must proceed on the idea that the party has full opportunity afforded him to try his right in the courts. A statute could not bar the existing right of claimants without affording this opportunity: if it should attempt to do so, it would be, not a statute of limitations, but an unlawful attempt to extinguish rights arbitrarily, whatever might be the purport of its provisions. It is essential that such statutes allow a reasonable time after they take effect for the commencement of suits upon existing causes of action." See also Story, Const. 5th ed. § 1958, note 1; 8 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 921.

"What shall be considered a reasonable time must be settled by the judgment of the legislature, and the courts will not inquire into the wisdom of its decision in establishing the period of legal bar, unless the time allowed is manifestly so insufficient that the statute becomes a denial of justice." Cooley, Const. Lim. 7th ed. p. 523.

A retrospective statute which goes into effect thirty days after its passage does not allow a reasonable time. Berry v. Ransdall, 4 Met. (Ky.) 292.

Six months is not a reasonable limitation of the right to sue for the recovery of land. Pearce v. Patton, supra.

A reasonable time to sue is afforded when the statute shortening the period of limitation, which is approved on the 16th of February, does not go into effect until the 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

1st of July succeeding. Stine v. Bennett, 13 Minn. 153, Gil. 138.

The following periods of time have been held to be reasonable; ten and a half months, in Terry v. Anderson, supra; nine and a half months, in Marsh v. Burroughs, 1 Woods, 463, Fed. Cas. No. 9,112; one year, in Krone v. Krone, 37 Mich. 308; six months, in Turner v. New York, 168 U. S. 90, 42 L. ed. 392, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 38; nine months, in Osborne v. Lindstrom, supra.

That the statute itself must provide a reasonable time for bringing suit, even though a period of several months elapses between its passage and the time when it goes into effect, is held in Gilbert v. Ackerman, supra. See also Ludwig v. Stewart, 32 Mich. 27.

But the opposite view is taken in Stine v. Bennett and Osborne v. Lindstrom, supra, in which the postponement of the date at which the law goes into effect is regarded as an expression of legislative intention to allow a reasonable time for the assertion of existing rights.

Statutes affecting the period of limitations are construed, wherever possible, as operating prospectively. "A change in the statute of limitations does not affect existing claims, unless such is clearly the intention of the legislature; and especially is this the case where actions are pending upon such claims when the statute is passed." Wood, Limitation of Actions, 3d ed. § 11, citing Hooker v. Hooker, 10 Smedes & M. 599; Battles v. Fobes, 18 Pick. 532; Wright v. Oakley, 5 Met. 400; King v. Tirrell, 2 Gray, 331.

Written Laws, p. 73: The legislature can at its pleasure, change a remedy, but not to the denial of all remedy, or even to such a reduction of it as would leave any essential part of the right practically unavailable.

Cooley, in his work on Constitutional Law, p. 340, says: "A statute of limitation takes away no right of property. Such a statute prescribes a reasonable time within which a party claiming legal rights, which another, withholds, shall commence legal proceedings for their enforcement; but all limitation acts must allow to claimants a reasonable opportunity to assert their rights in court, and one entirely and manifestly unreasonable in the time it gives is void."

In 6 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 952. it is said: The legislature has no "power, however, to cut off the remedy or bar suit upon an existing cause of action instantly, or without giving a reasonable time to prosecute."

In order to sustain the validity and constitutionality of this act, we are compelled to give it a prospective, instead of a retrospective, effect. In other words, if the right of action had accrued to any party before the passage of the act, to recover for the usury paid, such right would not be affected afterward by the passage of the act, even though the suit had not been brought before its passage.

The provision in the act that it shall not affect any litigation now pending is entirely nugatory and of no effect, since the legislature could not interfere with the rights of the claimant after suit commenced.

Striking out this provision, therefore, we have an act which changes the statute from six years to two years, without mentioning rights of action which had already accrued. We think, therefore, that the legislature must have meant to give the act a prospective, and not a retrospective, effect, and that rights of action which had accrued before the passage of the act were not cut off or affected by its operation, inasmuch as no time was given for the enforcement of such rights.

The chancellor was therefore correct in overruling the demurrer and requiring the case to proceed to trial upon its merits.

There are other grounds of demurrer which we think not well taken; but, as they are not pressed in this court, we do not consider them further.

The decree of the court below is affirmed, the cause is remanded for further proceedings, and the appellant will pay the costs of appeal.

TENNESSEE SUPREME COURT.

HARLE MARTIN et al., Appts.,

v.

G. D. McCRARY et al.

(.... Tenn.)

1. Threshing engine—duty to avoid fire.

One who has contracted to thresh grain with a steam thrasher must, to avoid setting fires, use care commensurate with the risk or hazard.

2. Same—presumption of negligence.

Setting fire by sparks escaping from a threshing-machine engine raises the presumption of negligence, and casts the burden of showing care upon the owner of the engine.

3. Same—question for jury.

The jury must determine what is ordinary care to avoid setting fire from a threshing-machine engine, under all the circumstances of the case.

4. Same—measure of duty.

The owner of a threshing-machine engine does not fulfil his duty in regard to precautions to avoid setting fires by merely adopting a spark arrester in general use, and showing that the engine did not emit sparks any more copiously than was natural for an engine of similar kind and construction, where he had been in the habit of making use

Case Note.—In line with the holding in MARTIN v. McCRARY, that the owner of a threshing-machine engine does not necessarily fulfil his whole duty as to precautions to avoid setting fires by merely adopting a spark arrester in general use, is Martin v. Bishop, 59 Wis. 417, 18 N. W. 337, which holds that it is negligent to start an engine set about 65 feet from several stacks of grain, on a hot, dry day, during a high wind blowing towards the stacks, although the engine is provided with all the best appliances for preventing the escape of fire.

And Collins v. Groseclose, 40 Ind. 414, holds that it is the duty of one running a steam threshing engine under contract with the owner of the grain to stop work during the latter's temporary absence, where the wind increases to such extent as to make it apparent to an ordinarily prudent man that there is danger of setting fire to the stacks of grain.

And Garrison v. Graybill, 52 Mo. App. 580, holds that the proprietor of such an engine, who tells the owner of the grain, after one fire has been put out, that the engine can be operated safely with the damper down, is guilty of gross negligence, rendering him liable for loss of the grain by fire from the engine, where he subsequently has the damper opened without the owner's knowledge.

And Teall v. Barton, 40 Barb. 137, holds that the proprietor of a steam dredging machine, who continues to use wood as a fuel without any spark catcher or screen on the

of an additional spark arrester when working near material of the kind to which fire was set, and which was allowed to become out of order at the time the fire occurred.

5. Same—inspection of spark arresters.

The owner of a threshing-machine engine must make at least daily inspection of his spark arresters when he is working near combustible material.

(October 7, 1905.)

A PPEAL by plaintiffs from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Monroe County in favor of defendants in an action brought to recover the value of certain grain alleged to have been destroyed by defendants' negligence. Reversed.

Statement by Neil, J.:

Action by the owner of a wheat crop, against the owner of a steam thresher, for negligently setting fire to the wheat in the stack by means of sparks emitted from the engine, whereby the crop was destroyed.

The case was tried before the circuit judge without the intervention of a jury, with the result that he dismissed the plaintiffs' case, and rendered judgment against them for the costs of suit. From this judgment they have prosecuted a writ of error, also an appeal, and assigned errors.

smokestack, and without using any other extra precautions, after being told of the danger to farm buildings near from sparks and cinders that are carried over them by a high wind existing, is guilty of negligence rendering him liable for the loss of the buildings by sparks set from the engine.

And in Dennis v. Harris, 46 N. Y. S. R. 525, 19 N. Y. Supp. 524, the court states that it would be negligence to use an engine in pressing hay, without having a spark arrester on the smoke pipe, while the wind is blowing towards the barn, the door of which is open: although it refuses to set aside, as unjustified by the evidence, a finding that the spark arrester was in the smokestack at the time the fire was set.

But in Gillingham v. Christen, 55 Ill. App. 17, the court holds that it is not negligence per se to run a threshing-machine engine without a screen, nor to use wood in a burner intended for the use of coal.

And Holman v. Boston Land & Secur. Co. 20 Colo. 7, 36 Pac. 797, holds that the law requires from one operating a steam threshing machine only the exercise of reasonable means and efforts to furnish good and well-constructed machinery, adapted to the work, combining the greatest safety with practical use; and that he is not an insurer of the property, nor bound to have such safe machinery that, by the exercise of ordinary care, absolute security will be afforded. The smokestack in this case was provided with a cone, but not with a screen for arresting sparks.

The circuit judge was requested, under the statute, to make written findings of fact and law; and he did so.

The facts found, so far as material, were as follows:

The defendants, having contracted to thresh plaintiffs' wheat, set their steam thresher at plaintiffs' stacks, and were engaged in threshing the grain, when a spark from the engine fell upon and set fire to a wheat stack, and destroyed the entire crop, to the value of $166.75. This occurred July 22, 1904.

The spark arrester on the engine "was of the kind generally in use." However, some time prior to the beginning of the season for threshing wheat, defendants were using this engine in running a sawmill, and, while so using it, they, as a matter of precaution, inserted an inner screen under the spark arrester, composed of fine wire netting. This fine inner netting was resupplied to the engine from time to time, and had been thus replaced two or three times prior to the date of the fire in question. It is not customary, however, to use this fine netting. The evidence failed to show that it had ever been used in this manner by anyone other than the defendants. On the day the fire occurred, and after the fire, an examination of the engine disclosed that

And in Quint v. Dimond (Cal.) 82 Pac. 310, which was an action for damages by fire alleged to have been set by a harvesting engine on adjoining premises, the court holds that an instruction that, if the jury find that a traction engine properly constructed and fitted with a proper spark arrester will not throw sparks which will start fires when the engine is otherwise properly operated, and that the fire in question was set by such engine, they shall find that it was not properly operated, and that ordinary care was not exercised in its operation,—is erroneous, as making defendant absolutely liable if sparks from the engine caused the fire, though he was free from negligence; and as making the setting of the fire by the engine conclusive proof of negligence.

And Planters' Warehouse & Compress Co. v. Taylor, 64 Ark. 307, 42 S. W. 279, holds that a compress company was not negligent in continuing to operate its press, so as to render it liable for the destruction of adjacent property by fire set by sparks from its smokestack, by the mere fact that, after exhausting all known appliances to prevent the escape of sparks, it was impossible to prevent their emission in a manner endangering adjacent property, where the danger from such operation is not such a natural and probable consequence as to justify a finding that the business is a nuisance; although it is its duty to take such precautions, and use such means, to lessen danger and prevent injury, as a man of ordinary prudence, knowing the danger, would take.

there was a hole in the fine under netting, but none was seen in the spark arrester itself, and it was not deficient. Defendants examined the spark arrester and the fine wire screen under it a day and a half before the fire occurred, and at that time there was no hole in either of them.

No evidence was introduced showing that the engine in question emitted sparks more copiously "than was natural for any engine of similar kind and character." When the fire occurred the engine was running with the damper slightly up, but it was necessary to give it some draft to enable it to run at all. Defendant Peoples was with the engine at the time of the fire, but neither he nor any of his employees or servants had knowledge of the hole in the fine netting at the time.

His Honor added the following general findings upon the subject of negligence, viz.:

"Defendants had not been negligent in their duty to observe defects in the engine.

"Defendants were not negligent in the operation of the engine in question, and the accident complained of was not the result of the negligence of the defendants, either directly or through their servants."

Messrs. McCroskey & Peace for appellees.

Neil, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The degree of care required by one threshing wheat with a steam thresher, in respect of setting fires, is the same as that devolved upon railway companies in the use of their engines. That rule, as laid down in Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Fort, 112 Tenn. 432, 80 S. W. 429, is that "care commensurate with the risk or hazard" must be used. In the same opinion the degree of care required is thus characterized: "A degree of care and prudence commensurate with the danger to which this property is exposed by them in the lawful conduct of their business." In the same case it is further said: "They are authorized to . . . carry fire on them [the engines] for the purpose of generating steam; and, when they have them properly constructed and equipped with spark arresters and appliances of the latest and most approved character to prevent the escape of coals and cinders, in good repair, and carefully and skilfully handled, and observe such other precautions as the surroundings may call for to avoid the communication and spread of fire, they are not liable for property unavoidably destroyed by escaping sparks and cinders." Again it is said: "As the danger necessarily attending the use of fire in locomotives is far greater in some places and upon some occasions than others, what is reasonable care in their equipment and management must always depend upon the facts and circumstances of each case. What would be ordinary care in the operation of them in the country, or in a wet season, might be gross negligence in a town or city, or in a drought, where and when the danger of communicating the fire is, in the very nature of things, much greater."

The burden of proof is upon the defendant in such cases to show that he, or it, as the case may be, has complied with all the requirements of the rule, since a presumption of negligence arises upon evidence introduced that a fire has been set by sparks escaping from an engine. Ibid. And what would or would not be ordinary care, under all of the circumstances proved in a given case, is always a question for the jury, or for the court when it sits without the intervention of a jury. Ibid.

Applying these principles to the present case, we are of the opinion that the defendants were liable for the injury done. It was not sufficient for them to show merely that the spark arrester in question was of the kind generally in use, and that the engine did not emit sparks any more copiously "than was natural for any engine of similar kind and construction." Operating, as they were bound to do, in the midst of dry and combustible material like wheat straw, they should have shown that their engine was, in respect of fire precautions, up to the state of the art at the time the fire occurred. Indeed, the defendants, by their conduct, clearly showed that they did not regard the spark arrester with which the engine was equipped as containing meshes sufficiently fine and close to enable them to work with reasonable safety in the midst of combustible material. since, when they used the engine in running a sawmill, in the midst, of course, of material easily ignited, like sawdust (and straw is even more combustible). they found it necessary to place a fine wire screen under the spark arrester, and to continue to renew this fine netting from time to time as it would wear out. That this netting was in fact necessary, when using the engine for such a purpose, is shown by the fact that sparks escaped and set fire to the wheat straw because of the hole in the surface of that netting referred to in the statement.

Treating the engine as properly equipped for the purpose to which it was put, by the combined use of the spark arrester and the under netting, the defendants were negligent in failing to make at least a daily inspection of the equipment referred to. It was not sufficient for the defendants to show that neither they nor their servants had knowledge of the hole in the netting. They had the means of knowledge, and should have used those means.

The two general findings quoted at the close of the statement must be held findings of law, and, as such, they were incorrect, being, as we conceive, improper applications of the law to the special facts found.

It results that the judgment of the court below must be reversed, and judgment must be rendered here for the plaintiffs for the amount of the damages assessed, with interest and costs.

Petition for rehearing denied.

UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS, SIXTH CIRCUIT.

CINCINNATI, NEW ORLEANS, & TEXAS PACIFIC RAILWAY COMPANY, Plff. in Err.,

v.

SOUTH FORK COAL COMPANY.

(139 Fed. 528.)

1. Railroad—liability for fires.

A railroad company is liable for negligently setting fire to lumber stacked with its consent on its right of way at the place usually occupied by lumber awaiting transportation, although it has not been delivered to it for that purpose.

2. Evidence—presumption, from collision of cars.

A presumption of negligence arises from a violent impact of a train against another which it is following upon the same track, so as to telescope several cars, and start a conflagration which sets fire to neighboring property, which shifts the burden of showing care to the railroad company.

(June 21, 1905.)

ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Tennessee to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover the value of lumber alleged to have been destroyed by defendant's negligence. Affirmed.

Statement by Lurton, Circuit Judge:

This was an action by the South Fork Coal Company, a corporation, which was operating a sawmill near Oneida, Tennessee, for the loss by fire of a large quantity of lumber stacked upon the railway's right of way near its station at Oneida. The fire occurred October 23, 1902. The evidence tended to show that the lumber had been hauled from time to time from the mills of plaintiff and stacked on the right of way, several hundred feet from the station, but at a place customarily used for stacking lumber for shipment. On the night of October 23, 1902, there occurred a rear-end collision between two of the defendant company's freight trains at a point near this lumber. As a result certain cars containing tanks of oil were telescoped by the engine of the colliding train. The tanks were broken, and the escaping oil fired by fire from the engine. The fire thus started was communicated to the adjacent lumber. The defendant offered no evidence in explanation of the collision or upon any other matter, and at conclusion of plaintiff's evidence asked a peremptory instruction in its favor. This was denied, and the case submitted to the jury upon a charge found in the record, who found for the plaintiff.

Case Note.—An examination of the authorities shows that they fully support the decision in CINCINNATI, NEW ORLEANS & TEXAS P. R. Co. v. SOUTH FORK COAL Co. to the effect that a railroad company is liable for negligently burning lumber placed upon its right of way with its consent; as will be seen by a reference to the following cases:

Grand Trunk R. Co. v. Richardson, cited by the court, has been cited in St. Louis, A. & T. R. Co. v. Fire Assn. 55 Ark. 177, 18 S. W. 43, holding that it was not contributory negligence to place cotton near a railroad, on a private platform so close to passing engines that it was in danger of being ignited, where it was placed on such platform for the purpose of being shipped by the railroad company; and that the owner, in placing his property near the track of a railroad, assumed only the risk of fire following the proper and lawful use of locomotives, and did not assume the risk of the neglect of the company. The platform was a private one 1 L.R.A. (N.S.) constructed by merchants, only a few feet from the railroad track, and was used for loading cotton; and the railroad company had received freight from it.

It has also been cited in Sherman v. Maine C. R. Co. 86 Me. 424, 30 Atl. 69, where it was held that a railroad company is not exonerated from liability for injury to goods from fire communicated by its locomotive engine, by the fact that the corner of the building in which the goods were stored, extended a few feet over one of the side lines of the roadway, by express license of the railroad company. This decision was under a statute making railroad companies liable for injuries caused by fire communicated by their locomotive engines. A similar decision was rendered in Ingersoll v. Stockbridge & P. R. Co. 8 Allen, 438. The court, in the latter case, said: "The fact that a building, or other property, stands near a railroad, or partly or wholly on it, if placed there with the consent of the company, does not diminish their responsibility in case it is injured by fire communicated from their locomotives."

In Boston Excelsior Co. v. Bangor & A. R. Co. 93 Me. 52, 47 L. R. A. 82, 44 Atl. 138, it was held that one piling wood on a railroad right of way with the permission of the company is entitled to the benefit of the statute imposing absolute liability on railroads for fires caused by them; and that the fact that the plaintiff was a licensee made his rights and the defendant's liability with respect to injury by fire precisely the same as they would have been if the plaintiff had been owner of the land.

The liability of a railroad company for the destruction by fire of timber piled on its right of way for shipment, under a custom acquiesced in by it, was sustained in Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. McLean, 74 Tex. 646, 12 S. W. 843.

owner of wood to pile it on a railroad company's right of way with its consent, and the company is not relieved from liability for its destruction by fire. Pittsburgh, C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Noel, 77 Ind. 110; Indianapolis & C. R. Co. v. Paramore, 31 Ind. 143; Pittsburgh, C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Nelson, 51 Ind. 150.

But in a case where the license had expired it was held that, under a license to place telegraph poles on a railroad company's right of way for shipment and to await the purchaser's inspection, the railroad company is not liable for their destruction by fire, where the purchaser had inspected and rejected them, and a reasonable time had expired before the fire during which the plaintiff could have removed them. 356; Milwaukee & St. P. R. Co. v. Kellogg, 94 U. S. 469, 24 L. ed. 256.

Lurton, Circuit Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

Under an exception to the refusal of the court to withdraw the case from the jury, and an exception to the charge and for refusal to charge certain requests submitted, just two questions are made. The first is, Would the railroad company be liable for a loss of the plaintiff's lumber by fire originating from a negligent collision between two of its trains? and, second, If that be conceded, was there prima facie evidence that the collision was the result of negligence in the management of its trains? The gravamen of the plaintiff's case is negligence, for the essential thing which it must establish is that its lumber has been lost through a negligent act of the railroad company. It must show that the negligent act of which it complains was the breach of some duty which, under the circumstances, was due to the plaintiff. Standard Oil Co. v. Murray, 57 C. C. A. 1, 119 Fed. 572, 575. What was the duty or obligation of the railroad company in respect of this lumber burned upon its right of way? It had not been delivered to the railroad company for carriage. Carrier liability is therefore out of the case. But it is not essential that contract relations shall exist in order to give rise to a duty by one to another. A duty may arise to one who is nothing more than a trespasser to use all reasonable exertion to avoid unnecessary injury after discovery of the peril. But, if the plaintiff was not a trespasser, the obligation of the railroad company to avoid injuring their property would stand upon a higher plane. There was evidence from which the jury might well find that the railroad company had consented that the plaintiff might stack its lumber upon its right of way, at the customary place for receiving lumber for shipment, and keep it there until it should desire or direct its shipment. The jury were told, if they found this to be so, that the railroad company would owe the plaintiff the duty of exercising reasonable care to avoid injury to its lumber by the operation of its trains. In contrast, the defendant insisted that, if the lumber was not placed upon the right of way for shipment, but to be kept there until the plaintiff could obtain a price satisfactory, the company would owe no duty "other than not to wantonly or willfully destroy or injure its lumber." This ignores all distinction between a rightful and wrongful use of the right of way, and puts the duty of the railroad company upon the same plane that it would have been if the plaintiffs had placed their lumber upon the railway premises without its knowledge or consent.

But there was evidence from which the jury could find, and, as matters now stand, from which they have found, that the railroad company assented to the use which was made of its right of way. If the company had assented to this use upon condition that the plaintiff should assume the dangers from sparks emitted from its engines, negligently or not, or from dangers incident to fire resulting from collision or otherwise, we are not prepared to say that the agreement would not have been valid, inasmuch as it was under no obligation to permit its premises to be so used, and might be unwilling to assume the risk incident to the proximity of the property to its tracks. Hartford F. Ins. Co. v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 175 U. S. 99, 44 L. ed. 88, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 33, 30 L. R. A. 193, 17 C. C. A. 62, 36 U. S. App. 152, 70 Fed. 201, and Griswold v. Illinois C. R. Co. 90 Iowa, 265, 24 L. R. A. 647, 57 N. W. 843. But there is no pretense of any such agreement. The learned counsel for the railroad company have insisted that the mere fact that the plaintiff placed its lumber in such proximity to the railway track with knowledge of the danger of fire is an implied assumption of the risk of fire communicated from the engines of the company, and they have cited the cases of Post v. Buffalo, P. & W. R. Co. 108 Pa. 585, and Missouri P. R. Co. v. Bartlett, 69 Tex. 79, 6 S. W. 549. The Post Case was decided upon the ground of contributory negligence, and the conclusion much influenced by the fact that the plaintiff was a naked trespasser in so far as it had stacked a part of its lumber upon the right of way of the railroad company without the company's knowledge or consent. But the ground of the decision was that one who voluntarily places combustible property in such proximity to a railway, in time of great dryness, and where fires were of daily occurrence along the line of the road, attributed to sparks, was so grossly negligent as to be debarred of an action, although the company might have been negligent in the matter of proper spark arresters. Missouri P. R. Co. v. Bartlett went off upon the same ground, namely, that, if one voluntarily places property in a situation of great danger, his own negligence will prevent a recovery, although there may have been negligence in not properly guarding against the emission of sparks. The facts in both cases tending to show contributory negligence were very strong, and somewhat peculiar. It might be sufficient to pass over these cases without comment as not applicable here, inasmuch as the defense of contributory negligence is one to be affirmatively set up. No such plea was filed, and no question of contributory negligence was touched in the charge, or by any request which was made. In so far as either opinion rests upon the ground that the plaintiffs had placed inflammable property upon the premises of the railway company without its knowledge or consent, at a time of great danger from engine sparks, we are not prepared to say that the plaintiffs were so free from culpable negligence proximately contributory to the loss as to entitle them to recover for ordinary negligence. But in so far as the opinions go upon the theory that a plaintiff must lose his right of compensation for the negligent destruction of his own property situated upon his own premises because he had exposed it to dangers which could come to it only through the negligence of the railroad company, they do not meet our approval. Grand Trunk R. Co. v. Richardson, 91 U. S. 454, 473, 23 L. ed. 356, 363; Kellogg v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 26 Wis. 223, 7 Am. Rep. 69; Fero v. Buffalo & State Line R. Co. 22 N. Y. 209, 215, 78 Am. Dec. 178; Burke v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 7 Heisk. 451, 464, 19 Am. Rep. 618. The rights of persons to the use and enjoyment of their own property are held upon no such tenure as this. The principle would forbid the use of property for many purposes if in such proximity to a railroad track as to expose it to dangers attributable to the negligent management of its business. Upon principle, the case is not different if one places his property upon the premises of a railroad company without conditions, and with its assent. If he is not a trespasser, he is not beyond the protection of the law against injury due to the want of ordinary care. In Grand Trunk R. Co. v. Richardson, supra, the Supreme Court, and in Ann Arbor R. Co. v. Fox, 34 C. C. A. 497, 500, 92 Fed. 404, 497, this court, speaking by Judge Taft, held that the statutory liability of a railway company for fire communicated by sparks was not affected by the fact that the property burned was in part situated upon the railway right of way, by consent of the railway company. After saying that the risk of fire might be increased, Judge Taft said: "But the relation of the parties to the risk and danger is the same. It is an additional risk for each, but the loss must fall just where it would have fallen had a greater distance between the lumber and track been maintained; for they voluntarily assumed the burden from the increased danger."

By the ancient common law every man was obliged to keep his fire safe; and, if one was started upon his premises by the act of himself or anyone for whom he was responsible, and spread and injured his neighbor, except by some inevitable accident which could not have been foreseen, he was responsible without regard to the question of negligent origin. In 1 Bacon's Abridgment, title "Action on the Case," F. at page 85 (1st Am. ed. of 1811), it is said: "It was formerly holden that, if a fire broke out accidentally in a man's house, and raged to that degree as to burn his neighbor's, that he in whose house the fire first happened was liable to an action on the case on the general custom of the realm quod quilibet ignem suum salve."

But the same author states that, by the statute of 6 Anne, chap. 31, it was provided that the action should not lie if accidentally begun. See also Rolle's Abr. "Action on the Case," B, title, "Fire," and 2 Shearm. & Redf. Neg. §§ 665, 666; and St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. v. Mathews, 165 U. S. 1, 5, 15, 41 L. ed. 611, 613, 616, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 243. This statute of Anne constitutes a part of the common law of most of the states; and thus, when the matter is not the subject of regulation by state statute, the liability at common law is confined to a fire which was started through culpable negligence, which spreads and destroys property adjacent. Shearm. & Redf. Neg. § 665, and cases cited. We conclude, therefore, that the railroad company is liable to the plaintiff for the loss of its lumber, if same was stacked upon its premises with its consent, and was burned by a fire negligently started by itself upon its own premises. The measure of its obligation to avoid a negligent fire spreading to this lumber upon its own right of way is precisely the same as it would have been if it had been stacked near to, but off, its right of way.

That the fire, which was started by a collision between two railway freight trains, spread to plaintiff's lumber and consumed same, is beyond dispute. If that collision was a negligent one, it was the proximate cause of the destruction of plaintiff's property. There was no independent, intervening cause. But did the unexplained and undisputed facts in respect of this collision make a prima facie case of negligence? The contention now is that there was no evidence from which an inference of negligence could be drawn, and that the court erred in not directing a verdict for the defendant upon this ground, and also erred in saying to the jury that the evidence, in the absence of any explanation of the cause of the collision, would constitute prima facie evidence of negligence. The argument pressed upon us is that "there is no physical law that says that the collision of two freight trains, one following the other on the same track, may not occur from sheer accident." Counsel then suggest a number of ways in which such a collision might occur without want of ordinary care. All this may be conceded without advancing the argument, for the simple question we have here is whether, from evidence of certain facts, the inference of negligence, in the absence of explanation, may be logically and legally drawn. That the plaintiff's case must stand upon the ground of negligence is clear. That negligence is an affirmative fact to be shown by him who alleges it must also be conceded. Neither can it be denied, until the contrary appears, that there is a general presumption that a railroad company, in the conduct of a lawful business upon its own premises, will exercise due care. The question is not whether such a collision may not have occurred without culpable negligence, but whether, in the particular case, the circumstances do not raise a presumption that it was due to the want of ordinary care. In other words, does not the very nature of the catastrophe itself supply evidence of negligence? It is not necessary to go so far as to say that evidence of the happening of an injury always affords evidence of negligence even in a passenger case. The inference justifiably to be drawn must depend upon the particular situation shown by the evidence from which, or by which, it is sought to make a prima facie case of negligence.

Take the facts of this case. Two trains following each other upon the same track, both under the management of the same company, come into such violent collision as to cause the rear engine to telescope a number of cars at the rear end of the forward train. Fire escaping from the engine fires the wreck, and the fire thus started spreads, and consumes plaintiff's property 40 or 50 feet away. According to all human experience, such a collision cannot occur without something abnormal. It may be that that abnormal cause may be one for which the defendant may not be legally liable; but the question is whether the burden of showing this to be the fact is not legally shifted to the defendant by evidence showing a state of things most unlikely to occur unless caused by the absence of due care. It cannot be unreasonable to ascribe to negligence the happening of a catastrophe, which was not likely to occur if due care had been exercised, until the cause is explained by other evidence. If, therefore, the nature of the accident is such as to make it altogether probable that it was caused by negligence, it makes a case which falls within the maxim, Res ipsa loquitur. Manifestly, a presumption of negligence does not arise upon mere evidence of an injury sustained. The inference logically as well as legally deducible is necessarily dependent upon the nature of the accident, the surrounding circumstances which characterize it, and the relation of the parties. 21 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 521. Many accidents do not speak for themselves. The maxim, Res ipsa loquitur, does not, therefore, apply when the circumstances in evidence are of doubtful solution. That there should not be uniformity of opinion as to the applicability of the maxim is due, not only to the infinite variety of circumstances under which injuries are inflicted, but to differences in respect of the standard of diligence applicable in different situations. In cases between passengers and carriers it has been most often applied, and sometimes in such sweeping terms as suggest application only to an action for breach of contract, rather than one grounded upon tort. Thus, Mr. Justice Lamar, in Gleeson v. Virginia Midland R. Co. 140 U. S. 435, 443, 35 L. ed. 458, 463, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 859, 862, says: "Since the decisions in Stokes v. Saltonstall, 13 Pet. 181, 10 L. ed. 115, and New Jersey R. & Transp. Co. v. Pollard, 22 Wall. 341, 22 L. ed. 877, it has been settled law in this court that the happening of an injurious accident is, in passenger cases, prima facie evidence of negligence on the part of the carrier; and that (the passenger being himself in the exercise of due care) the burden then rests upon the carrier to show that its whole duty was performed, and that the injury was unavoidable by human foresight."

Now, it is clear that the learned justice did not mean that a presumption of negligence would arise upon mere proof of injury to a passenger, without any regard to the nature of the injury or the circumstances connecting the carrier with its infliction. Neither of the cases referred to by the learned justice, nor the one in which his observation was made, involved any question of the presumption of negligence from mere proof of an injury to a passenger; and it is not likely, as such actions stand upon the ground of negligence, that negligence would be inferred from nothing more than evidence that a passenger sustained an injury while upon his journey. The evidence should go further, and at least show that the carrier was connected with the cause of his injury. In other words, the presumption is one which arises not from the mere naked fact of an injury, but from the circumstances which characterize the injury. Thus, in Stokes v. Saltonstall the prima facie case of negligence was made upon evidence that the stage coach was upset, and the plaintiff injured. The fact that the coach was overturned while being driven by the carrier's servant, and a passenger injured, was evidence of the happening of a thing which does not happen under normal conditions, and made a case which required explanation.

In New Jersey R. & Transp. Co. v. Pollard there was evidence tending to show that Mrs. Pollard, by a sudden and unusual jolt, had been thrown against the arm of a seat and injured. In Gleeson v. Virginia Midland R. Co. a railway postal clerk was injured through a partial derailment of the train in consequence of coming in contact with a landslide. From the higher measure of care required from a carrier of passengers, a presumption of negligence may arise from evidence which would not be sufficient in other relations. But in principle there can be no difference between such cases and those in which a less degree of care is required for the exoneration of the party sued. In each action for a tortious injury the question as to what evidence will make a prima facie case of negligence and require an explanation from the defendant will depend upon the nature and circumstances of the injury and the measure of care due from the defendant. In passenger cases, as in other cases, the question at last is whether an inference of negligence may be logically inferred from the circumstances of the particular injury. Pennsylvania R. Co. v. MacKinney, 124 Pa. 462, 2 L. R. A. 820, 10 Am. St. Rep. 601, 17 Atl. 14; Holbrook v. Utica & S. R. Co. 12 N. Y. 236, 64 Am. Dec. 502; Seybolt v. New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. 95 N. Y. 562, 47 Am. Rep. 75; East Tennessee, V. & G. R. Co. v. Mitchell, 11 Heisk. 400; Sommers v. Mississippi & T. R. Co. 7 Lea, 201; Donovan v. Hartford Street R. Co. 65 Conn. 201, 29 L. R. A. 297, 32 Atl. 350; Yarnell v. Kansas City, Ft. S. & M. R. Co. 113 Mo. 570, 18 L. R. A. 599, 21 S. W. 1; Bonce v. Dubuque Street R. Co. 53 Iowa. 278, 36 Am. Rep. 221, 5 N. W. 177; Birmingham Union R. Co. v. Hale, 90 Ala. 8, 24 Am^d St. Rep. 748, 8 So. 142; Feital v. Middlesex R. Co. 109 Mass. 398, 12 Am. Rep. 720; Carpue v. London & B. R. Co. 5 Q. B. 747. Thus, a railroad is bound to use care to keep its track clear. An accident resulting from some obstruction upon the track is prima facie evidence that the obstruction was due to negligence. Shearm. & Redf. Neg. § 516. The mere fact of a collision between two trains has always been held, in suits by passengers, prima facie evidence of negligence. Ibid.; Iron R. Co. v. Mowery, 36 Ohio St. 418, 38 Am. Rep. 597; Clark v. Chicago & A. R. Co. 127 Mo. 197, 29 S. W. 1013; Smith v. New York, S. & W. R. Co. 46 N. J. L. 7; North Chicago Street R. Co. v. Cotton, 140 Ill. 486, 29 N. E. 899; Little Rock & M. R. Co. v. Harrell, 58 Ark. 454, 25 S. W. 117. So an injury resulting from derailment of a train is prima facie evidence 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

of negligence, or the fall of a bridge, or the breaking of machinery. Shearm. & Redf. Neg. § 516, and cases cited. The opening of a railway carriage door upon slight pressure, whereby the plaintiff was thrown out, was held prima facie evidence of negligent construction of the door. Gee v. Metropolitan R. Co. L. R. 8 Q. B. 161, 175. But this presumption of negligence from the nature of an injury is one which has been applied in many other kinds of action grounded upon negligence.

The case of the Inland & Seaboard Coasting Co. v. Tolson, 139 U. S. 551, 555, 35 L. ed. 270, 271, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 653, 654, was an action by a wharfinger against a steamboat company for crushing his foot between the timbers of a wharf by the violent striking of a steamboat against the wharf while touching to receive freight from him. The court said: "As such damage to a wharf is not ordinarily done by a steamboat under control of her officers and carefully managed by them, evidence that such damage was done in this case was prima facie, and, if unexplained, sufficient evidence of negligence on their part; and the jury might properly be so instructed."

In Kearney v. London, B. & S. C. R. Co. L. R. 6 Q. B. 759, a brick fell out of a pier of a railway bridge, without any assignable cause except the slight vibration of a passing train, and injured the plaintiff upon a highway passing under. Held, evidence of negligence.

In Byrne v. Boadle, 2 Hurlst. & C. 722, 728, the plaintiff was walking in a public street past the defendant's shops, when a barrel of flour fell upon him from a window above the shop. Held, sufficient prima facie evidence of negligence to cast upon the defendant the burden of showing that the accident was not due to negligence. Pollock, C. B., said: "The learned counsel was quite right in saying that there are many accidents from which no presumption of negligence can arise, but I think it would be wrong to lay down as a rule that in no case can a presumption of negligence arise from the facts of an accident. Suppose in this case the barrel had rolled out of the warehouse, and fallen on the plaintiff, how could he possibly ascertain from what cause it occurred? It is the duty of persons who keep barrels in a warehouse to take care that they do not roll out; and I think that such a case would, beyond all doubt, afford prima facie evidence of negligence. A barrel could not roll out of a warehouse without some negligence, and to say that a plaintiff who is injured by it must call witnesses from the warehouse to prove negligence seems to me preposterous. So in the building or repairing a house, or putting pots on chimneys, it a person passing along the road is injured by something falling upon him, I think the accident alone would be prima facie evidence of negligence. Or if an article calculated to cause damage is put in a wrong place, and does mischief, I think that those whose duty it was to put it in the right place are prima facie responsible; and, if there is any state of facts to rebut the presumption of negligence, they must prove them. The present case upon the evidence comes to this: A man is passing in the front of the premises of a dealer in flour, and there falls down upon him a barrel of flour. I think it apparent that the barrel was in the custody of the defendant, who occupied the premises, and who is responsible for the acts of his servants who had the control of it; and in my opinion the fact of its falling is prima facie evidence of negligence, and the plaintiff, who was injured by it, is not bound to show that it could not fall without negligence; but, if there are any facts inconsistent with negligence, it is for the defendant to prove them."

In Scott v. London & St. K. Docks Co. 3 Hurlst. & C. 596, 600, plaintiff, while passing in front of a warehouse in the dock, in discharge of his duty as a customs collector, was injured by bags of sugar falling upon him which were being lowered from above. An effort was made by counsel to distinguish the case from Byrne v. Boadle, cited above, because the place where the accident occurred was not, as there, a public highway, but a dock, the property of the company. Held, evidence of negligence; Erle, Ch. J., saying: "There must be reasonable evidence of negligence. But, where the thing is shown to be under the management of the defendant or his servants, and the accident is such as, in the ordinary course of things, does not happen if those who have the management use proper care, it affords reasonable evidence, in the absence of explanation by the defendants, that the accident arose from want of care."

To same effect is the able opinion of Judge Morrow in The Joseph B. Thomas, 81 Fed. 578.

In the case of The William Branfoot, 3 C. C. A. 155, 9 U. S. App. 129, 52 Fed. 390, 394, the rule of evidence applied in Inland & Seaboard Coasting Co. v. Tolson, 139 U. S. 552, 554, 35 L. ed. 270, 271, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 653, and cited heretofore, was applied to a case of where a stevedore was injured by the fall of a stanchion. The opinion was by Fuller, Ch. J., who, in affirming the judgment of the district judge, said: "It is plain that in his judgment a prima facie case was made out, not simply from the mere happening of the accident, but because the surrounding circumstances raised the presumption that it happened in consequence of a failure of duty on the part of libellee. Undoubtedly there are cases where the very nature of an accident has been held of itself to supply the proof of negligence, but the conclusion was not rested on the mere naked, isolated fact of injury. The presumption of negligence was drawn from the fact of the injury, coupled with the circumstances surrounding its infliction, and characterizing the nature of the occurrence as attributable to want of the requisite care, or as demanding an explanation which the defendant alone could furnish."

It has been said that in action by employees for negligence injuries evidence of an accident carries with it no presumption of negligence. Illinois C. R. Co. v. Coughlin, 65 C. C. A. 101, 132 Fed. 801; Patton v. Texas & P. R. Co. 179 U. S. 663, 45 L. ed. 364, 21 Sup. Ct. Rep. 275; Texas & P. R. Co. v. Barrett, 166 U. S. 617, 41 L. ed. 1136, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 707. The reason is the peculiar contract of such an employee by which he assumes the risks incident to his employment, including the negligence of his fellow servants. He must therefore show that the injury of which he complains was the result of a risk he did not assume. It is also said that the explosion of a boiler does not afford prima facie evidence of negligence. For this the cases of Texas & P. R. Co. v. Barrett, supra; Huff v. Austin, 46 Ohio St. 386, 15 Am. St. Rep. 613, 21 N. E. 864; Cosulich v. Standard Oil Co. 122 N. Y. 118, 10 Am. St. Rep. 475, 25 N. E. 259, and Marshall v. Welwood, 38 N. J. L. 339, 20 Am. Rep. 394, are cited. The case of the Texas & P. R. Co. v. Barrett was a suit by an employee, and, for reasons stated above, is not in point. Marshall v. Welwood follows Losee v. Buchanan, 51 N. Y. 476, 10 Am. Rep. 623, in simply holding that there is no absolute responsibility for the consequences of the bursting of a boiler, and that there must be evidence of some negligence to sustain a recovery. Neither case involved the question as to whether evidence of the fact that a boiler had exploded supplied evidence of negligence in the absence of explanation. Cosulich v. Standard Oil Co. was the case of the explosion of a tank of oil in a coal-oil refinery. Starting from the proposition that mere proof that fire had spread from the premises of one to those of another does not afford prima facie evidence of a negligent origin, the court held that evidence that it had started from the explosion of a tank of oil in process of distillation in a manufacturing establishment did not point to negligence or carelessness. Huff v. Austin does squarely hold that the explosion of an ordinary steam boiler does not make a prima facie case of negligence.

An opposite conclusion was reached by the Tennessee supreme court in Young v. Bransford, 12 Lea, 232, 241, where the question was considered in a careful opinion by Judge Cooper. In that case it was said: "The fact that there was an explosion, which is not an ordinary incident of the use of a steam boiler, ought to have some weight, inasmuch as it may be out of the power of the aggrieved party in some instances to prove any more. The reasonable rule would seem to be that laid down by Judge Wallace as above, 'that from the mere fact of an explosion, it is competent for the jury to infer, as a proposition of fact, that there was some negligence in the management of the boiler or some defect in its condition.'"

To same effect is Rose v. Stephens & C. Transp. Co. 20 Blatchf. 411, 11 Fed. 438.

The presumption from evidence of a fire started by sparks from a railway engine is in many states determined by statute. But at the common law a prima facie case of negligence is not made out by mere evidence that it was started by sparks from a railway engine. The use of such engine being sanctioned by statute, there is no liability for a fire started from sparks unless the sparks were negligently suffered to escape. The ground of action being, therefore, for the negligent escape of sparks, a case is not made out by mere proof that it was started by sparks in view of the fact that some sparks will escape despite the use of appliances to arrest them. Garrett v. Southern R. Co. 49 L. R. A. 645, 41 C. C. A. 237, 101 Fed. 102; 13 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, pp. 507, 508, and cases cited in notes. But evidence of escape of larger sparks than usual, or an unusual number of sparks, has been held prima facie evidence of want of due care. Field v. New York C. R. Co. 32 N. Y. 339, 345; Missouri P. R. Co. v. Texas & P. R. Co. 41 Fed. 917; Fitch v. Pacific R. Co. 45 Mo. 322; Henderson v. Philadelphia & R. R. Co. 144 Pa. 461, 16 L. R. A. 299, 27 Am. St. Rep. 652, 22 Atl. 851. There are, however, many jurisdictions in which the mere fact of fire started by sparks is held, irrespective of statute, to be prima facie evidence of negligence. The cases may be seen in 13 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, pp. 498 et seq., and notes.

But, where the character of the accident is such as to strongly point to a cause which is abnormal and negligent, it devolves upon the defendant to explain that that abnormal cause was not due to want of due care. Thus in Memphis Consol. Gas & Electric Co. v. Letson, 68 C. C. A. 453, 135 Fed. 969, we held that a prima facie case of negligence was made out upon evidence that the intestate received a fatal current of electricity when turning on an ordinary electric lamp, 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

the current being supplied for lighting purposes by the defendant.

It is useless to multiply examples of the proper application of the presumptions arising from the circumstances of a particular accident. The court below tried the case carefully, and submitted the matters at issue under a sound charge, and the judgment must be affirmed.

WASHINGTON SUPREME COURT.

EX PARTE THOMAS BROWN.

I. Imprisonment of insane person on acquittal.

Sentence to imprisonment according to the provisions of a statute that, when one is acquitted of the charge of murder on the ground of insanity, and that fact is stated by the jury, he may be sentenced to imprisonment, does not deprive him of his liberty without due process of law, nor of the bene-

Subject Note.—Confinement of one acquitted of crime by reason of insanity.

I. In general, 540.

II. Necessity of finding as to continuance of insanity, 543.

III. Place and nature of confinement, 545.

IV. Removal to place of confinement, 546.

V. Time for which sentenced, 546.

VI. Right to, and proceedings for, discharge after restoration to sanity, 547.

VII. Summary, 549.

I. In general.

Nearly all the states and territories, as well as England and Canada, have statutes in regard to the confinement of one acquitted of crime by reason of insanity existing at the time the offense was committed; but the question as to the right to confine one so acquitted, or as to the validity of the statutes authorizing such confinement, has seldom been directly before the courts, though it has been discussed in several other cases in which it has been indirectly involved.

The right to confine one who is still insane, and who is dangerous to the public peace and safety, until such time as he can be released with safety, providing that the present existence of such insanity or dangerous condition is properly shown, has apparently never been questioned; and it would seem that no objection thereto could be successfully raised.

Thus, in 1 Hale, P. C. p. 35, it is said that, if a person of nonsane memory commit homicide during his insanity, and continue so until the time of his arraignment, such person shall neither be arraigned nor tried, but remitted to jail, there to remain in expectation of the King's grace to pardon him; fit of the constitutional rights, to appear and defend in person or by counsel, and to trial by jury, where he has had a fair trial upon the issue of insanity, tendered by him in support of his plea of not guilty, and he has produced no evidence of a return of a lucid interval.

2. Same—cruelty of punishment.

No cruel punishment is inflicted by committing one who has been acquitted of the crime of murder on the ground of insanity to prison, where it appears to the court that his discharge from custody will be manifestly dangerous to the peace and safety of the community.

3. Same—uncertainty of committal.

The committal of a person acquitted of murder on the ground of insanity to prison until the further order of the court is not void for uncertainty.

(July 14, 1905.)

although in such case it is prudent to swear an inquest ex officio to inquire whether his madness was feigned.

And in Rex v. Little, Russ. & R. C. C. 430, defendant, who was accused of a misdemeanor, was found to have been insane at the time of the commission of the offense, and also at the time of the trial, and was acquitted on account of such insanity. The trial judge ordered him to be kept in strict custody in jail till His Majesty's pleasure should be known, in accordance with the provisions of 39 & 40 Geo. III. chap. 94, § 2, and the judges, on consideration of the question, held such order to be right.

And in People v. Griffen, 1 Edm. Sel. Cas. 126, defendant, having been acquitted because of insanity at the time the offense was committed, and such insanity being certified to still continue, was ordered into safe custody, and to be sent to the state lunatic asylum, in pursuance of N. Y. act April 7, 1842, for the organization of such asylum. It does not appear that any objection to such order was taken.

And in Bonfanti v. State, 2 Minn. 124, Gil. 99, the court had before it for consideration the correctness of a construction placing on defendant the burden of proving the plea of insanity, set up by him. The court decided that such instruction was correct, basing its decision on Minn. Rev. Stat. § 259, p. 570, providing that, if the defense to an indictment be the defendant's insanity, the jury must be instructed, if they acquit him on that ground, to state such fact in their verdict, and § 211, p. 562, providing that, when any person shall be acquitted of an offense by reason of insanity, the jury, in giving their verdict, shall state that it was given for such cause, and thereupon the discharge of such insane person shall be considered by the court manifestly dangerous to the peace and safety of the community, the court may order him to be committed to prison. The court states that the later statute very sensibly provides that the jury shall not acquit of the crime without convicting of insanity, so that the court, if of opinion that the insanity is continuing may dispose of his person without further delay.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Maurice A. Langhorne and Foreney & Ponder, for petitioner:

Section 6959, 2 Ballinger's Anno. Codes & Statutes, is squarely in conflict with the 14th Amendment to the Constitution of the United States, as well as in conflict with §§ 3, 14, 21, and 22 of art. 1 of the state Constitution, inasmuch as it attempts to confer arbitrary power upon a court to commit indefinitely to prison without first according that fair and impartial trial imperatively demanded by the Constitution.

And in Hadaway v. Smith, 71 Md. 319, 18 Atl. 589, which was an action by a married woman to recover land mortgaged by her without joinder by her husband, while he was confined in an insane asylum after a special finding by the jury, on a trial for assault with intent to kill, that he was insane at the time of the commission of the offense and still was insane, the court stated that the court before which the criminal trial was had thereupon ordered him to be confined in the hospital for the insane until he should recover and be discharged in due course of law, and that such proceeding was expressly authorized by Md. Code, art. 59, §§ 4, 5.

And in Lower Augusta Twp. v. Northumberland County, 37 Pa. 143, which was an action of assumpsit by a county against a township for the amount of a bill paid by the former for the board of an insane person committed to the state lunatic asylum by the court of quarter sessions, the statement was made that such person was indicted for attempting to set fire to a sawmill, and acquitted, as she was evidently insane; and that, on the following day, a petition alleging her insanity was presented to the court, the grand jury found her insane, and a jury to determine the question of her sanity also found her insane, whereupon an order was made committing her to such asylum.

And in United States v. Lawrence, 4 Cranch, C. C. 518, Fed. Cas. No. 15,577, it was proved that the defendant had shot at the President of the United States under the insane delusion that he himself was King of England and of the United States as an appendage to England, and that the President stood in his way in the enjoyment of his right, and that the shooting was done under such delusion. The jury found him not guilty by reason of insanity, and the court remanded him, being of opinion that it would be extremely dangerous to permit him to be at large while under such delusion.

And in Com. v. Meriam, 7 Mass. 168, defendant, who was charged with murder, was shown to have been occasionally deranged for several years before committing the offense; after the death of the person for whose murder he was indicted, he was committed to the house of correction as a person whom it was dangerous for the safety of the people to permit to go at large. After the finding of the indictment, he was brought from the house of correction to the courthouse for trial, and acquitted on the ground of insanity, whereupon the court committed him to the custody of the sheriff to be remanded to the place from which he had been brought, to remain until discharged by due order of law.

But the form for the judgment of acquittal on the ground of insanity found in White's Anno. Code Crim. Proc. (Tex.) § 925, p. 587, contains a provision that, upon such finding by the jury, the defendant shall "be immediately discharged from all further liabilities upon the charge for which he has herein been tried, and that he go hence without day."

On the other hand, a discharge from commitment of one so acquitted, if he has been restored to sanity at the time of the trial, or as soon thereafter as he shall have been so restored, would also seem unquestionable,—at least unless there is danger of a relapse into insanity.

Thus, in 1 Hale, P. C. p. 36, it is said that, if a person, during his insanity, commit homicide or petit treason, and recover his understanding, and, being indicted and arraigned for the same, he ought to be acquitted: and that it makes no difference whether the frenzy is fixed and permanent, or whether it was temporary by force of disease, if the act were committed while under such distemper.

And in State v. Klinger, 46 Mo. 224, defendant's attorney stated to the jury that, if they had a reasonable doubt as to the 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

defendant's sanity at the time of the commitment of the homicide, they should give him the benefit of the doubt, and that §§ 43, 45, of the chapter in the Missouri statutes in reference to the lunatic asylum had provided a way for his disposal, as it would be the duty of the court to issue an order restraining him in custody until he could be sent to the insane asylum. The trial court, however, at once stated that that was a question for the consideration of the court alone after a verdict, and that, if defendant were acquitted for insanity at the time of the homicide, the court would not send him to the insane asylum if satisfied that he was not insane at the time of the acquittal, as the court would never make an order to send a sane man to the asylum. There was no claim that defendant was insane at the time of the trial, and the court said, on appeal, that the statute restraining prisoners acquitted for insanity had reference solely to insanity existing at the time of the trial, when it was a question solely for the court, with which neither the jury, nor the counsel, have anything to do.

And the statutes of every state which require a finding as to the continuance of the insanity at the time of the trial of one so acquitted provide for his commitment only in case he is then found to be insane; and the customary provision of the different statutes in case he is then insane is for confinement until he becomes sane.

But in Gleason v. West Boylston, 136 Mass. 489, which was an action by the treasurer of the commonwealth for support in a state insane asylum, of one acquitted of murder, by reason of insanity at the time of committing the offense, the court stated that, under Mass. Stat. 1873, chap. 227, providing that, when one indicted for murder or manslaughter is acquitted by reason of insanity, the court shall order him to be committed to one of the state lunatic hospitals during his natural life, with power in the governor and council to discharge him when satisfied that he may be discharged without danger to others, it was the duty

Before the person alleged to be insane can be deprived of his liberty or his property, there must be accorded to him an opportunity to appear and defend.

No one has a right to confine an insane person for an indefinite period until he shall be restored to reason, except under the

of the trial court to order his commitment without inquiry as to his mental condition at the time, as, under such statute, the defense of insanity was not one entitling him to an unconditional acquittal, but that he must be detained in confinement until it should appear to the governor and council that he might be discharged without danger to others, his commitment not being for the purpose of treatment, but because his being at large would be dangerous to the peace and safety of the community.

And in People ex rel. Mooney v. Walsh, 21 Abb. N. C. 299, 15 N. Y. Civ. Proc. Rep. 19, 1 N. Y. Supp. 143, defendant before trial was found to be insane, and committed to the insane asylum to remain until restored to his right mind. After remaining about three months, he was reported restored, and brought to trial, on which trial he was acquitted on the ground of insanity when the offense was committed. The trial court thereupon, under the provision of N. Y. Code Crim. Proc. § 454, that the court must, if the person so acquitted is in custody, and they deem his discharge dangerous to the public peace or safety, order him to be committed to the state lunatic asylum until he becomes sane, ordered him to be committed to the insane asylum, notwithstanding the contention that, having previously been sent to an insane asylum until restored to his right mind, and having been so restored and put on trial as a sane man, he could not be committed to an asylum immediately at the close of the trial, as insane. A motion to compel the sheriff having him in custody to make a return to a writ of habeas corpus for his release was subsequently denied on the ground that the writ had not been personally served upon him.

In Reg. v. Oxford, 9 Car. & P. 525, the jury, in addition to finding that defendant was insane at the time of committing the offense, also stated that there was no satisfactory evidence of the existence of an essential element of the crime charged. The court directed them to retire and separately determine whether such element did in fact exist, and also whether defendant was guilty or not guilty; and, while they were out, the judges considered what could be done if the jury found the defendant not guilty under the facts, and they concluded, though they stated that they did not mean to be bound by what they said, that in such case they could not order the defendant to be kept in custody, notwithstanding the further finding of the jury that he was insane. The jury, however, on returning into court, found defendant not guilty because of insanity, and the court ordered him to be detained in prison.

In Clearfield County v. Cameron Twp. Poor District, 135 Pa. 86, 19 Atl. 952, the only point before the court was the liability over to the county, of the township in which one acquitted of a crime on the ground of insanity had his last legal settlement, for his maintenance in an insane asylum to which he was committed. The court, however, said that a commitment to the asylum for the insane, of one charged with a criminal offense and acquitted on the ground of insanity at the time of the alleged offense, was not a sentence of the court, as, if it was, the courts would be sentencing the innocent, which they do not often knowingly do; but that such commitment was only part of the duty cast on the court.

In Hadfield's Trial, 27 How. St. Tr. 1281, the jury found defendant, charged with shooting at the King, not guilty by reason of insanity when the act was committed, such finding being made on the suggestion of one of the counsel for the Crown, who stated that such a finding would be a legal and sufficient reason for his future confinement. At the close of the report of such case, the statement is made that this gave rise to the act of 39 & 40 Geo. III. chap. 94, by virtue of which the defendant was continued in custody.

II. Necessity of finding as to continuance of insanity.

The statutes of the different states vary

& Eng. Enc. Law, p. 1073; Davis v. Catron, 22 Wash. 183, 60 Pac. 131.

Hadley, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The petitioner made original application in this court for a writ of habeas corpus directed to the sheriff of Lewis county. He asserts that he is unlawfully detained and imprisoned. His petition shows that he was regularly tried in the superior court of said county on the charge of murder in the first degree, to which charge he had interposed the plea of not guilty. The verdict returned was as follows: "We, the jury, find the defendant not guilty by reason of insanity." Immediately after the return of the verdict, on the 1st day of May, 1905, the trial court ordered the sheriff to return the petitioner to the county jail to await the further order of the court. He was accordingly detained in jail until the 8th day of said month, when the trial judge ordered him to be brought into court. The petition alleges that the court thereupon, without any hearing or trial, and without giving the petitioner any opportunity to be heard in his own behalf, arbitrarily and of its own motion announced that, because of the verdict of the jury, which established that the petitioner was not guilty by reason of insanity, the court considered that his discharge and going at large would be manifestly dangerous to the peace and safety of the community. It is further shown that, for the above reasons, an order was materially in their requirements as to a finding as to the continued existence of insanity at the time of the trial.

In some states the jury are required by their verdict to find as to defendant's insanity not only at the time the offense was committed, but also at the time of the trial. In other states another jury may be summoned, or, according to the statutes in other states, proceedings may be taken against the defendant to determine whether he still continues insane. The statutes in all, or nearly all, of these cases provide that the verdict of acquittal shall be prima facie evidence of defendant's insanity. Other statutes provide that the court shall ascertain, or be satisfied, that the defendant's insanity still continues. The larger number of statutes provide, like the Washington statute, for defendant's confinement if the court considers his going at large to be dangerous to the public peace and safety. Still other statutes direct the confinement of defendant without any provision whatever as to a finding as to his present condition other than may be implied in a further provision in some of such statutes for his confinement until restored to his right mind.

Many of these statutes were evidently passed for the purpose of subjecting to imprisonment persons who escaped conviction by falsely setting up a plea of insanity. No statute, however, providing for the confinement of one found not guilty of crime by reason of insanity at the time the offense was committed can properly be sustained in the absence of any provision for a finding as to the continuance of the insanity at the time of the trial. It would also seem that those statutes which, like the Washington statute, provide for the confinement of one so acquitted if the court consider him dangerous to the public peace and safety cannot be upheld if they are so construed, as was done in EX PARTE BROWN, as to authorize the court to order a person so acquitted to be imprisoned on a mere arbitrary finding by the trial court that his discharge and going at large will be manifestly dangerous to the public peace and safety, based solely on the verdict of acquittal on the ground of insanity and the 1 L.R.A. (N.S.) proceedings in the criminal trial, together with the presumption of the continuance of insanity once shown to exist, without any judicial hearing as to his present condition. The contrary holding in BROWN v. UNQUHART, that such statute does not authorize the trial judge to commit the defendant to jail after such verdict of acquittal without a new arraignment on a formal complaint and an opportunity to defendant to be heard, and that an imprisonment on an order made without them is without due process of law and in violation of the Federal Constitution, seems to be supported by the better reasoning and weight of authority so far as direct adjudications go.

Thus, in Underwood v. People, 32 Mich. 1, 20 Am. Rep. 633, the court passes upon the validity of Mich. Laws 1873, act No. 168, requiring the court to sentence to confinement in the insane hospital of the state prison one acquitted of murder or other high crimes on the ground of insanity at the time of committing the offense, the statute containing no provision for any finding as to the continuance of the insanity. The court holds the statute unconstitutional on the ground that, under it, the "prisoner is sent into confinement without any legal investigation into his condition at that time when he may be perfectly sane, and when, having been acquitted, he is entitled to all the privileges of any innocent man." The statute has since been changed so as to require the court to inquire and ascertain whether defendant's insanity in any degree continues, before ordering him into custody.

And in Re Boyett, 136 N. C. 415, 67 L. R. A. 972, 103 Am. St. Rep. 944, 48 S. E. 789, the court holds N. C. Pub. Laws 1899, chap. 1, § 85, providing that, when anyone accused of murder shall have been acquitted on the trial on the ground of insanity, the court before which such proceedings are had shall, in its discretion, commit such person to the hospital for the dangerous insane, to be kept in custody therein for treatment and care as therein provided, void as depriving defendant of liberty without due process of law in that no provision for legally determining his mental condition at the entered to the effect that the petitioner shall be, by the sheriff, confined in the county jail until the further order of the court. The sheriff made return to the petitioner by way of answer. The answer avers that the petitioner was charged with murder in the first degree, for the killing of his father; that he pleaded and urged as a defense to said charge insanity caused by epilepsy, cruel treatment by his father, and the degeneracy of the latter prior to the birth of the petitioner; that he offered proof, during the trial, of continuous and permanent insanity from said causes; and that his demeanor during the trial appeared to be consistent with his claim of general insanity. The above alleged facts are not controverted by the petitioner.

time of his commitment is contained therein. The court says: "It is well settled that a person acquitted by a jury upon the ground of insanity existing at the time of the commission of the act is entitled to all of the protection and constitutional rights as if acquitted upon any other ground." The court further says that the trial judge, in strict compliance with the statute, exercised a sound discretion in ordering his commitment, but that the difficulty lies in the fatal infirmity of the statute in authorizing such commitment without notice to the prisoner, or giving him an opportunity to be heard, or for investigation as to his present mental state.

But in Jenisch's Case, 3 Abb. N. C. 200, defendant had been indicted for murder of her infant child. The defense of insanity was set up, and commissioners in lunacy were appointed to determine as to her insanity. They found her to have been insane and irresponsible, by reason of epilepsy, at the time of the commission of the offense, but made no finding as to the continuance of the insanity. The presiding justice, without any written opinion, approved their finding, and ordered her removal to the state lunatic asylum. State commissioner in lunacy, Ordronaux, in a note to the report, states that the commissioner inserted no finding as to the continuance of the insanity, because the statute did not require it, and because the continuance of the insanity arose as a conclusion of law, the report of the commissioners being made less than two months after the commission of the offense, and there having been another seizure in the intervening time.

And see, also, Gleason v. West Boylston, 136 Mass. 489, and People ex rel. Mooney v. Walsh, 21 Abb. N. C. 299, 15 N. Y. Civ. Proc. Rep. 19, 1 N. Y. Supp. 143, supra, I. No appeal from the latter decision, however, seems to have been taken, and no attempt to bring the validity of such commitment to any other court was made than the ineffectual attempt, in the supreme court at chambers, to compel the sheriff to make a return to the writ of habeas corpus for his release, and, in the former, as there

The court acted on the authority of a statute of this state which is set forth in § 6959, 2 Ballinger's Anno. Codes & Statutes. It is as follows: "When any person indicted or informed against for an offense shall, on trial, be acquitted by reason of insanity, the jury, in giving their verdict of not guilty, shall state that it was given for such cause; and thereupon, if the discharge or going at large of such insane person shall be considered by the court manifestly dangerous to the peace and safety of the community, the court may order him to be committed to prison, or may give him into the care of his friends, if they shall give bonds, with surety to the satisfaction of the court, conditioned that he shall be well and securely kept; other-said, the validity of the statute was not directly raised, the question before the court being the liability for the expenses of the support in an insane hospital of one committed thereto after acquittal of homicide by reason of insanity.

In Rex v. Little, Russ. & R. C. C. 430, the statement was made that the defendant was found to have been insane both at the time the offense was committed and at the time of the trial, and in Lower Augusta Twp. v. Northumberland County, 37 Pa. 143, supra, I., the statement was made that a jury impaneled to determine the present sanity of a defendant, acquitted by reason of insanity, found her insane before an order for her committal to the lunatic asylum was made.

But in Reg. v. Oxford, 9 Car. & P. 525; Hadfield's Trial, 27 How. St. Tr. 1281; United States v. Lawrence, 4 Cranch, C. C. 518, Fed. Cas. No. 15,577; People v. Griffen, 1 Edm. Sel. Cas. 126; and Com. v. Meriam, 7 Mass. 168, supra, I.—no statement appears as to any finding of present insanity having been made.

III. Place and nature of confinement.

The statutes of nearly all the states provide for confinement in the insane asylum, or hospital, of one acquitted of crime by reason of insanity, if still insane. A few, like the Washington statute, provide for confinement in prison, or in jail. A few others provide for commitment to the care of the sheriff; others, for their being kept in strict custody, without any provision as to the place; and a few, for their being kept in such place as the court shall direct. A few, also, contain a provision in the alternative, like the Washington statute, authorizing the court to give such person into the care of his friends on their giving proper security. And the Vermont statute authorizes the court to put to such reasonable labor as he is capable of performing, and to subject to such reasonable discipline as his condition and circumstances require, one so acquitted who is sent to the state prison.

No objection to any statute because of wise he shall be discharged." The petitioner contends that the statute violates the following portion of the 14th Amendment to the Constitution of the United States: "Nor shall any state deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws." It is further insisted that the statute violates the following provisions of §§ 3, 14, 21, and 22 of article 1 of our state Constitution:

"Sec. 3. No person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law."

"Sec. 14. Excessive bail shall not be required, excessive fines imposed, nor cruel punishment inflicted."

the place in which a person so acquitted was ordered to be confined seems to have been raised prior to EX PARTE BROWN, which holds that no cruel punishment is inflicted by committing to prison one acquitted of the crime of murder on the ground of insanity, stating that, although such confinement is ordinarily in an asylum, there is no reason why the court may not require that those whose dangerous tendencies have been manifested by the perpetration of acts imperiling the safety of the community shall, after a full hearing establishing the fact of insanity, be confined in prison while that condition continues.

In most of the cases cited in this note the commitment was to a lunatic asylum, but in Underwood v. People, 32 Mich. 1, 20 Am. Rep. 633, supra, II., the commitment was to the state prison hospital; in Reg. v. Oxford, 9 Car. & P. 525, supra, I., the commitment was to prison; in Rex v. Little, Russ. & R. C. C. 430, supra, I., the commitment was to jail; in Com. v. Meriam, 7 Mass. 168, supra, I., the prisoner was remanded to the house of correction; in United States v. Lawrence, 4 Cranch, C. C. 518, Fed. Cas. No. 15,577, supra, I., the report merely states that the prisoner was remanded; and in Hadfield's Trial, 27 How. St. Tr. 1281, supra, I., a note at the close of the report states that, by virtue of the act of 39 & 40 Geo. III. chap. 94, passed after the trial, the prisoner was continued in custody.

Most of the statutes provide for keeping the prisoner in "strict custody;" and Com. ex rel. Bickel v. Bennett, 18 Phila. 432, holds that the authorities of an insane asylum have no discretion, as they have in case of other patients, to permit one to leave the asylum without a keeper, who, after being acquitted of murder on the ground of insanity, has been sent to such asylum under an order of the court requiring her to be kept in "strict custody" so long as she continues of unsound mind.

IV. Removal to place of confinement.

"Sec. 21. The right of trial by jury shall remain inviolate," etc.

"Sec. 22. In criminal prosecutions, the accused shall have the right to appear and defend in person, and by counsel, to demand the nature and cause of the accusation against him, to have a copy thereof, to testify in his own behalf, to meet the witnesses against him face to face, to have compulsory process to compel the attendance of witnesses in his own behalf, to have a speedy public trial by an impartial jury of the county in which the offense is alleged to have been committed, and the right to appear in all cases," etc.

Has the petitioner been deprived of due process of law in the premises? He was tried before a jury, to whom he himself only the court or law judge of the county in which an accused was tried and acquitted on the ground of insanity has jurisdiction to appoint a commission to remove him to the hospital for the insane, under Pa. act May 14, 1874, P. L. 160, providing that application for such removal may be made to any judge learned in the law, of "any court within this commonwealth having immediate cognizance of the crime with which such prisoner is charged."

V. Time for which sentenced.

Most of the states provide by statute for confinement until restoration to sanity. Some, however, provide for confinement until further order of the court, and some until the prisoner is discharged by due course of law. In England the confinement is to be until His Majesty's pleasure is known, and in Canada until the pleasure of the lieutenant governor is known. In a few states the confinement is to be until the prisoner is discharged by the governor, or by an act of the legislature. And in Massachusetts one acquitted of murder or manslaughter by reason of insanity is to be committed during his natural life, with a provision that he may be discharged by the governor, with the advice and consent of the council, when they are satisfied that he may be discharged without danger to others.

In Com. v. Meriam, 7 Mass. 168, supra, I., the defendant was remanded to the house of correction until he should be discharged by due order of law; and in Gleason v. West Boylston, 136 Mass. 489, supra, II., the defendant was committed to the insane asylum for life in accordance with the provisions of the Massachusetts statute supra; but in neither case does there seem to have been any objection on the part of defendant, nor in any other case reported until that of EX PARTE BROWN, in which the court holds that an imprisonment to continue until the further order of the court is not void for uncertainty or indefiniteness as to time; as the statute provides no time for the duration of the imprisonment, and it was the undoubted intention of the legislature submitted the issue that he was insane when the crime was committed. He was permitted to fully introduce his evidence upon that subject, and the jury were instructed as to their duty in the premises. The verdict returned was in his favor upon the issue which he tendered, and he was therefore accorded due process of law and the right of trial by jury upon that subject. The jury found that he was insane, and it was the manifest duty of the court to enter some kind of a judgment upon the finding of the jury. The petitioner erroneously assumes that it was a judgment entered in a new and original proceeding without due process of law and without opportunity for a hearing. It was, however, a judgment rendered upon the verdict of a jury which had been regularly returned in a proceeding wherein all constitutional rights had been accorded. Should it have been a judgment of discharge, according to petitioner his liberty? He does not allege that he is now sane. The solemn verdict of a jury, after due trial, establishes that he was insane when the killing occurred. The record before us shows that the character of insanity considered was not of a temporary sort, but was, rather, progressive and permanent in its nature, by reason of epilepsy and congenital conditions. "The presumption being that general insanity, once shown to exist, still continues, unless of a temporary sort, like the delirium of drunkenness or a fever, the burden of proof to establish that the imprisonment should not be continued after the restoration to sanity, and that the court should so retain control of its order in the premises that it might afterwards modify it to suit changed conditions of mind or body as they might be made to appear.

VI. Right to, and proceedings for, discharge after restoration to sanity.

The statutes of most of the states provide, as said in V., supra, for confinement until the prisoner is restored to sanity, showing an intent that he shall be discharged as soon as it is made to appear that he has been thus restored. In some states, however, it is provided that he shall be discharged when it appears that the public peace and safety will not thereby be endangered; and in a few states confinement in case of one acquitted of murder is to be for life, unless discharged by the governor or by act of the legislature. There seems, however, no justification for keeping the prisoner in custody after his restoration to sanity is shown.

Thus, in EX PARTE BROWN the court says that it was the undoubted intention of the legislature that imprisonment should not be continued after restoration to sanity.

And in Underwood v. People, 32 Mich. 1, 20 Am. Rep. 633, supra, II., the court says that it would be attributing more than folly to the legislature to assume that they would intentionally pass a law which would leave a sane man liable to perpetual imprisonment where he has been acquitted of crime.

But see Gleason v. West Boylston, 136 Mass. 489, supra, I. In this case, however, as was said before, the question at issue was not the validity of the statute, but merely the liability for the expense of his support while in the asylum.

Com. ex rel. Bickel v. Bennett, 18 Phila. 432, holds that, under Pa. act March 31, 1860, § 66, the finding of the jury that defendant was insane at the time of the commission of the offense is evidence of her continued insanity, on an application for her discharge on the ground that she is no longer of unsound mind, in the absence of evidence of any substantial change in her condition.

The same case also holds that a person acquitted of murder on the ground of insanity, who, previous to such homicide, had made at least two dangerous attacks on other persons, one of them with a deadly weapon, is not entitled to a discharge on the ground that she is no longer of unsound mind, where the managers of the hospital do not certify that she is safe to be at large, and no such change appears to have taken place in her condition, and for such length of time, as to make it seem to the court safe for her to be at large, under Pa. act April 20, 1869, P. L. 79, providing that, where any person is acquitted on the ground of insanity, if the judge is satisfied that the paroxysm of insanity in which the criminal act was committed was preceded by at least one other such paroxysm, the prisoner shall not be discharged in cases of homicide, or attempted homicide, unless, in the unanimous opinion of the superintendent and managers of the hospital, and the court before which he or she was tried, he or she has recovered and is safe to be at large.

Comparatively few of the statutes provide as to the nature of the proceedings for the discharge of one restored to sanity. In Connecticut the prisoner, or the officers of the institution in which he is confined, are authorized to petition for his discharge; and in Maryland the court is specially authorized to discharge him on habeas corpus proceedings; while in Georgia and North Carolina a special act of the legislature is necessary for his discharge in case of murder; and in Massachusetts, in such case, he may be discharged by the governor, with the advice and consent of the council, when he is satisfied, after a hearing, that such person may be discharged without danger to others. It would seem clear, however, that there must be some provision for a direct application to the judicial department by the prisoner or his friends if the statute is to be upheld, and this has been the holding in all the cases where the question has been directly before the court.

a lucid interval c. mental restoration rests upon the party who asserts it." Schouler Wills, 3d ed. § 189, and cases cited. In the chapter on the subject of "Insanity" in volume 16, Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. under the discussion of the continuance of insanity of a permanent nature, at page 604 of said volume, the following statement of the rule as to presumption is made: "When habitual insanity in the mind of the person whose act is in question is once established, then the party who would take advantage of the fact of restoration to a sane condition, or of an interval of reason, must prove it, for insanity of that character is presumed to continue until the contrary is shown." Decisions from 26 of the American states are cited in support of the above text, as well as a long list of English decisions. With such an array of citation, it would seem that the rule is well established, and that a review of the decisions is unnecessary. We have examined a number of the authorities cited, and find that they fully sustain the rule announced by the text writer—that, when insanity of a permanent character is once established, it is presumed to continue, and the presumption prevails until the contrary is shown; the burden of showing which is upon him who asserts sanity. Therefore, inasmuch as it was a fact established after a full hearing, that the petitioner was insane at the time of the homicide, the presumption is that the same condition continues, and the burden is upon him to show to the contrary. The record does not show that he has ever offered to make such showing to the court below, but rather that he demands his release as an absolute right.

We have thus seen that, as to the issue of insanity, the petitioner was accorded the constitutional rights of due process of law, trial by jury, and the privilege of appearing and presenting his case in person and by counsel. The additional constitutional objection urged is that no cruel punishment

Thus, in Underwood v. People, 32 Mich. 1, 20 Am. Rep. 633, the statute provided that no person committed to the insane hospital of the state prison after acquittal of murder, or other high crimes, on the ground of insanity, could be discharged, unless the prison inspectors summoned the circuit court judge of the circuit from which he was sent, and the medical superintendent of the Kalamazoo insane asylum, to determine his condition as to sanity. The court states that there is nothing in such law which could compel the performance of the functions necessary to release a sane person committed to the insane asylum; that the prison inspectors could act, or not, as they saw fit, and that neither the prisoner, nor his friends, could compel action, the statute practically leaving the person confined to depend upon the uncontrolled pleasure of such inspectors; and accordingly held the statute to be in violation of the constitutional provision securing to everyone the protection of due process of the law.

And in Re Boyett, 136 N. C. 415, 67 L. R. A. 972, 103 Am. St. Rep. 944, 48 S. E. 789 the court considers the constitutionality of N. C. Pub. Laws 1899, chap. 1, § 67, providing that no person acquitted of murder on the ground of insanity, and committed to the hospital for the dangerous insane, shall be discharged therefrom without the passage of an act by the general assembly authorizing his discharge. The court says that it is a fundamental principle that every person restrained of his liberty is entitled to have the cause of such restraint inquired into by a judicial officer; that the judicial department of the government cannot, by any legislation, be deprived of this power, or relieved of this duty; and that every citizen must be afforded a prompt, complete, and adequate remedy by due process for every unlawful injury to his person or property; and that it was inconceivable that a person restrained of his liberty must await the action of the legislature before having the cause thereof inquired into.

But in Gleason v. West Boylston, 136 Mass. 489, supra, I., the court states that a person committed to the lunatic hospital for life, on acquittal of murder by reason of insanity, must, under Mass. Stat. 1873, chap. 227, be detained in confinement until it appears to the governor and council that he may be discharged and set at large without danger to others, and does not suggest in any way that such statute is unconstitutional; but that question was not before it at the time, the only issue being, as heretofore said, the liability for the expenses of such person's support while in the lunatic hospital.

In Brown v. Urquhart the remedy by habeas corpus was accepted without question as being the proper one for raising a right to discharge on the ground that the defendant is not then insane. And in Re Boyett, 136 N. C. 416, 67 L. R. A. 972, 103 Am. St. Rep. 944, 48 S. E. 789, supra, the same remedy was held to be a proper one.

And in People ex rel. Mooney v. Walsh, 21 Abb. N. C. 299, 15 N. Y. Civ. Proc. Rep. 19, 1 N. Y. Supp. 143, the defendant was tried after he had been reported restored to sanity by the authorities of an insane asylum to which he was committed after indictment and before trial, and on such trial he was acquitted on the ground of insanity when the offense was committed, whereupon the court again ordered him to be committed to the insane asylum, notwithstanding the contention on his part that the court, having tried him as a sane person, could not immediately thereafter commit him to an asylum as insane. A habeas corpus pro-shall be inflicted. The statute authorizes the court, among other things to commit one acquitted by reason of insanity to prison. No particular prison is specified, and it may be reasonably inferred that any prison coming within the committing jurisdiction of the court trying the cause may be selected, such as the county jail of the proper county or the state penitentiary. In this instance the commitment was to the county jail. May the state, in the exercise of its sovereignty and in its endeavor to protect its people from dangerous insane characters, provide for their confinement in a prison? It is the policy of the state to confine such persons, but it is ordinarily done in an asylum, and not in a prison, so called. We know of no reason, however, why the state may not classify insane persons, and require that those whose dangerous tendencies have been manifested by the perpetration of acts imperiling the safety of the community shall, after a full hearing establishing the fact of insanity, be confined in prison while that condition continues. While confinement of any character may in a sense contain elements of cruelty, yet the safety of the people requires that such persons shall be confined.

It is urged that the order of the court is void for uncertainty, in that it is indefinite as to time. The imprisonment is to continue until the further order of the court. The order conforms to the statute in that particular. No time is specified in the statute for the duration of the imprisonment. In the nature of the subject treated by the statute, it must be so. It was the undoubted intention of the legislature that imprisonment shall not be continued after restoration to sanity, and that the court shall so retain control of its order in the premises that it may afterwards modify it to suit changed conditions of mind or body as they may be made to appear. Such an order is analogous to one disposing of the custody of the children in ceeding for his discharge was instituted, and a motion to make the sheriff having him in custody make a return to the writ was subsequently denied on the ground that the writ had not been personally served upon him, no objection being made that the writ of habeas corpus was not a proper proceeding.

But in Re Underwood, 30 Mich. 502, the court held that habeas corpus was not the proper remedy to inquire into the legality of imprisonment of one acquitted of murder by reason of insanity under a commitment by the trial judge to a lunatic asylum, but that the question must be raised by writ of error or other appropriate remedy.

In People v. Griffen, 1 Edm. Sel. Cas. 126, the superintendent of the state lunatic asylum, to which one acquitted of murder on the ground of insanity had been committed, reported to the judge before whom the trial was had that such person had been restored to sanity, and that the public would not be endangered by his release, and applied for an order for his discharge, which order the judge granted, requiring, however, a petition from the prisoner for such release, and a statement from the superintendent and one of the managers of the asylum as to the nature and progress of the disease since his reception into the asylum, and his present condition.

And Luken's Petition, 11 Pa. Dist. R. 146, 27 Pa. Co. Ct. 3, was a petition for a discharge from a state lunatic asylum to which the petitioner had been committed on acquittal on the ground of insanity. The district attorney urged that the proper remedy was by habeas corpus. The court held that the right of a prisoner held in custody, as petitioner was, to petition for his discharge, was at least doubtful, and that he should refuse to entertain the petition.

if it were not that the certificates and the evidence left no doubt that the petitioner was entirely sane; but, as there was no question as to his restoration to sanity, and the proper officials had had notice of the proceeding, the court ordered him to be discharged.

VII. Summary.

The right to confine one acquitted of crime by reason of insanity if the insanity still exists at the time of acquittal seems never to have been questioned. The right to a discharge if the insanity no longer exists at the time of the acquittal would seem equally true, though the Massachusetts statute providing for confinement of one acquitted of murder or manslaughter by reason of insanity, without any provision for inquiry as to the continued existence of the insanity, has been stated by the supreme court, in a case in which the validity of the statute was not directly involved, to require commitment by the trial court, even though the defendant is sane at the time of the acquittal. Before the defendant can properly be committed, it is also necessary that the continuance of the insanity at the time of the acquittal shall be found in some proper judicial manner, though a finding by the jury does not seem to be necessary. The ordinary provision is for confinement in an insane asylum, though the provision for confinement in prison, contained in some statutes, seems never to have been held improper. It is further necessary to the validity of such a statute that it shall contain a provision for a direct application to the judicial department for a discharge, by the prisoner or his friends, on his restoration to sanity; and a proceeding by habeas corpus is a proper method of making such application.

a divorce proceeding, which is made to continue until further order of the court, and subject to modification with changed conditions. Although the fact of insanity has been regularly established, and that condition is presumed to continue until the contrary is shown, yet the petitioner has the undoubted right at any time to assert that he is restored to sanity, and to demand that the court shall duly investigate that subject. The statute in no way attempts to prevent such a demand upon his part, and cannot be held to be invalid on the ground that it prevents him from exercising such privilege. The petitioner cites Underwood v. People, 32 Mich. 1, 20 Am. Rep. 633, in support of his contention against this legislation; but an examination of that case discloses that the Michigan statute provided that one acquitted on the ground of insanity should remain confined in an asylum until an investigation as to his restoration should be set in motion by the prison inspectors. The court said: "It practically leaves the liberty of the person confined to depend upon the uncontrolled pleasure of the inspectors." Under that statute, the prisoner could take no step on his own initiative, but was left entirely to the will of others. Such a provision manifestly violated a personal right. But our statute makes no such attempt to prevent the exercise of a fundamental privilege. The petitioner quotes extensively in his brief from a note in Cooley on Torts, 2d ed. pp. 206, 207. The quotation does not, however, conflict with our argument above,—that, with the presumption of insanity continuing, confinement is enforceable when the law does not attempt to prevent a judicial investigation as to restored sanity, and which may be initiated at the pleasure of the one confined. We find no constitutional objections to the statute, and the order of the court is in strict conformity with its provisions.

For the foregoing reasons, we think the petitioner has not shown sufficient grounds for his discharge, and the writ is denied.

Mount, Ch. J., and Fullerton, Crow, and Rudkin, JJ., concur.

NOTE.—After the rendition of the above decision petitioner presented a petition to District Judge Hanford, of the United States court, who, after holding that the decision of the state court was not binding on the Federal court, and setting out the provision of the statute under which the state court had presided, continued as follows (139 Fed. 849):

I disapprove of that part of the argument made before this court in support of the petition which denounced this law. On the contrary, I regard it as legitimate and wise. It would certainly be unwise to discharge from legal restraint a person acquitted of a criminal charge by reason of insanity, if, in the opinion of the court in which the case was tried, the defendant, by reason of insanity, will probably be a menace to the peace and safety of the community. The court in which such a trial has been concluded is the appropriate tribunal to assume the responsibility of dealing with the defendant in a manner to protect the community from such mischievous conduct as may be expected to follow his release from restraint. The court, however, in the exercise of the power and discretion conferred by this statute, must dispose of the defendant upon due consideration of the facts and conditions existing subsequent to the time of acquittal, and, instead of punishing him by imprisonment for the injurious act constituting the basis of the criminal charge of which he has been acquitted, must find sufficient ground for committing him to prison in a then manifest necessity to restrain him in order to protect the community; and the conclusion of the court should be arrived at by means of orderly proceedings, and as a result of a judicial hearing, in which the defendant shall have a full opportunity to submit a legal defense if he has one. It is my opinion that the constitutionality of this law depends upon the true interpretation of its provisions. If this statute must be construed, as it seems to have been by the supreme court of this state, as a law authorizing the judge of the trial court to commit a defendant to jail after a verdict of acquittal on the ground of insanity, without a new arraignment upon a formal complaint or information setting forth the specific facts constituting cause for committing him to jail, and an opportunity given to controvert the averments of such complaint or information, or interpose a lawful defense, it is, in my opinion, unconstitutional and void. But I deem such an interpretation of the law to be unwarranted. The authority to commit to prison, conferred upon the court by this statute, is predicated upon the rendition of a verdict of acquittal on the ground of insanity, and other facts, viz., the actual insanity of the defendant, and probability that the peace of the community will be endangered by permitting him to go at large. This point may be concisely stated thus: The law does not authorize a judgment adverse to the defendant upon the verdict alone. This law is one section of the Criminal Code of this state, originally enacted by the legislature of Washington territory at its first session. See Laws of Washington Territory, 1854, p. 121, § 126. It does not, in terms, except cases which may be prosecuted under it from the general provisions of the same statute, intended to insure orderly proceedings and a fair trial, and conviction preliminary to the rendition of any judgment of the court under which an offender may be imprisoned. To assume that this section confers extraordinary power upon the courts to condemn a man, after he has been acquitted of crime, without an accusation, and without a fair trial, requires reconstruction, so that there shall be read into it words conferring that power, or excepting cases arising under it from the provisions of the same statute prescribing the procedure to be observed in dealing with offenders. That, however, would be construction of the law, in the sense of building or creating law by the addition of matter not conceived by the legislature, instead of construing the law in a way to effect the object intended, and the product would be a strange and noxious excrescence upon the jurisprudence of the country. Neither administrative officers, nor the courts, have any authority to construct laws by adding to the statutes, or reading into their provisions new or original ideas. The interpretation of all statutes should be harmonious with the general plan of our government and the explicit requirements of the Constitution, unless the words of the statute plainly express a contrary intention of the legislature. To make my meaning plain, I will, for an illustration, refer to § 1836 of Pierce's Code, which is the law defining criminal libel and prescribing the punishment therefor. Without any suggestion of judicial proceedings, this section declares that every person who composes, dictates, publishes, or wilfully circulates a libel, or in any way knowingly and wilfully aids or assists in doing so, shall be imprisoned in a county jail. If, by virtue of this particular section of the Criminal Code of this state, sheriffs were authorized to seize violators and imprison them without indictment, arraignment, plea, or trial and conviction and sentence duly pronounced by a court of competent jurisdiction, all newspaper men in this state would spend most of their time in jail, and the liberty of the press would soon become a mere phantasm; and to enforce the libel law in such an unheard-of manner would not be more despotic and subversive of constitutional rights than would be the substitution of a judge's fiat condemning an untried victim as a maniac in place of a judgment rendered pursuant to customary and lawful proceedings.

I consider that this law can be administered and full effect given to its provisions according to the intention of the legislature in its enactment without overstepping the limitations of power ordained by the Constitution. Therefore the court is not required, nor authorized, to pronounce it unconstitutional. I also consider that the law was not so administered by the superior court in rendering its judgment, and that the imprisonment of the petitioner with sanction of the judiciary of the state, without arraignment and a fair opportunity to defend himself against charges lawfully preferred, and to produce evidence in his defense, is deprivation of liberty by the state, without due process of law, and violates the national 1 L.R.A. Constitution, and for that reason his application for a writ of habeas corpus will be granted.

WASHINGTON SUPREME COURT.

1. Divorce decree—vacating.

A decree for divorce cannot be vacated after the death of one of the parties.

2. Void decree—effect on property rights.

A void decree of divorce will not affect the property rights of the parties.

(November 7, 1905.)

A PPEAL by defendant from an order of the Superior Court for King County refusing to set aside a decree for divorce. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. J. W. Langley and Robert D. Hamlin, for appellant:

A void judgment may be set aside on motion at any time.

Case Note.—NOLAN v. DWYER is the first reported decision of a Washington court on the question of the right to vacate a decree of divorce after the death of one of the parties. The application to set aside the decree was denied in this case on the ground that an action for divorce is a purely personal action, that nothing is sought to be affected but the marital status of the husband and wife, that the distribution of property in such an action is merely incidental, and that upon the death of either party, whether before or after the decree, the subject of the controversy is eliminated. A similar contention was made in Israel v. Arthur, 6 Colo. 85, where it was argued that, inasmuch as a decree of divorce concerned only the marriage relation of the parties thereto, after the death of one party there was no one who could represent him; and that, if the decree were adjudged erroneous, the court would be without jurisdiction to retry the cause, for the reason that the bonds of matrimony had been dissolved by death and the marriage relation no longer existed. In reply, the court said: "If a decree of divorce affected the marriage relation only, there would be great force in the argument. But when it is considered that the decree in this case, as in other cases, affects the property rights of the parties as well as their marital rights, it would seem that the same reasons exist for determining its validity as in civil cases generally, notwithstanding the death of one of the parties, and regardless of the fact that the primary relief sought by the bill and afforded by the decree has been confirmed by death."

In the absence of any statute, the court has the right to set aside a void judgment. The power is inherent in the court itself.

NOLAN v. DWYER stands almost alone, since the authorities, as shown by the note in 57 L. R. A. 583, where the subject is treated at length, are practically unanimous that, in the absence of statutory qualifications, a decree of divorce may be vacated for lack of jurisdiction or for fraud, notwithstanding the death of one of the parties thereto, where property rights are involved. See Shafer v. Shafer, 30 Mich. 163; Boyd's Appeal, 38 Pa. 241; Wren v. Mossa, 7 Ill. 72; Danforth v. Danforth, 111 Ill. 236; Israel v. Arthur, supra; Johnson v. Coleman, 23 Wis. 452, 99 Am. E. 387; Lawrence v. Nelson, 113 Iowa, 277, 57 L. R. A. 583, 85 N. W. 84.

Even after the lapse of thirty years from the time the divorce was granted, and long after the death of the successful party, a decree of divorce in favor of a husband was set aside, in Gambe v. Gambe, 22 Pa. Co. Ct. 23, at the suit of the wife, because of lack of jurisdiction.

So, in Fidelity Ins. Co.'s Appeal, 93 Pa. 242, a decree of divorce was vacated for fraud in obtaining it, notwithstanding the rule to vacate it was not filed until thirteen years after the decree was entered, and until after the death of the party obtaining it.

And in case of the death of one of the parties pending an appeal from a judgment granting divorce it is held that the action

Dunbar, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This case is appealed from the order of the superior court of King county refusing to vacate a judgment in a divorce case. The divorce action was brought by John M. Nolan, and the decree was granted on November 20, 1899. On April 6, 1905, the appellant appeared in this action by motion and affidavits in support of the same, and sought to have the decree of November 20, 1899, set aside and vacated. The plaintiff, John M. Nolan, having died in January, 1905, his executors were substituted as parties plaintiff. The contention of the appellant does not abate where property rights are involved. Nickerson v. Nickerson, 34 Or. 1, 48 Pac. 423, 54 Pac. 277; Thomas v. Thomas, 57 Md. 504; Danforth v. Danforth, supra; Mead v. Mead, 1 Mo. App. 247.

Even in states where there are statutory provisions forbidding the review of a judgment of divorce after the term in which granted, it is usually held that such statutes do not prevent the vacation of a decree after the death of one of the parties, if the court granting it had no jurisdiction; although some cases decide that fraud in any other matter than in obtaining jurisdiction is not sufficient to justify a review in defiance of the statute. See Richardson v. Stowe, 102 Mo. 33, 14 S. W. 810; Rine v. Hodgson, supra.

In some cases a decree of divorce has been set aside after the death of one of the parties without anything being said as to the effect of the death on the right to set aside the decree. So, the question of the validity of a divorce often arises after the death of one of the parties in collateral proceedings; and in such cases the effect of the death has usually not been directly passed upon, the validity of the decree being decided on its merits, or the attempt to impeach it being defeated by laches or estoppel. In such cases the question of the validity of the decree is often raised by one not a party to the divorce proceedings.

Where the courts have refused to set aside, after the death of one of the parties, a decree of divorce obtained by fraud, it has usually been because of laches in bringing the action to vacate the decree, or because is that the court acted without competent jurisdiction of the party defendant in the divorce proceeding, and that the judgment was therefore void. We will not enter into an investigation of the question presented as to whether or not the service in the divorce proceeding was sufficient to give the court jurisdiction of the person of the defendant, for the reason that there are no proper parties to this proceeding, and in the nature of things, the plaintiff having died, that the question of divorce cannot be relitigated. It will not be gainsaid that an action for divorce is a purely personal action. Nothing is sought to be affected but the marital status of the husband and wife. The distribution of property in such an action is incidental, and it is clearly incontestable that upon the death of either party, whether before or after the decree, the subject of the controversy is eliminated. If the death of the plaintiff in this case had occurred before judgment, it will not be urged that there could have been a substitution of his executors to represent him in the prosecution of the case. Such a proposition, for manifest reasons, would not be entertained by a court for a moment. What additional authority or power did they have to represent him in the same case, when he died after judgment? Manifestly none. They cannot stipulate with reference to the decree. They cannot consent to setting aside the judgment. There is no conceivable particular in which they represent the deceased or the heirs with reference to the subject-matter of the action in the slightest degree. The very nature of the action renders this impossible. In the light of this fact, a service upon them of a motion to vacate the judgment is farcical, and the case proceeded, if it proceeded at all, without notice and on a purely ex parte basis.

An argument of necessity is presented by the appellant to the effect that it is impossible, in view of the death of the plaintiff, to get service on anyone else. But this argument defeats itself, for, if there is anything which is the subject of litigation, there must of necessity be someone who is interested in that thing and represents it, and upon whom service can be made. If there is no such thing, it is equally plain that there is no subject of legal controversy. Something has been said of the inherent jurisdiction of the court to set aside void deof estoppel by having accepted the benefits thereof; though in a few cases (as in Watson v. Watson, 1 Hun. 267, 47 How. Pr. 240; Groh v. Groh, 35 Misc. 354, 71 N. Y. Supp. 985; and Zoellner v. Zoellner, 46 Mich. 511, 9 N. W. 831) the court has refused to entertain a proceeding to set aside a decree on the ground that the party seeking to have the decree vacated had not pursued the proper remedy.

In case of a divorce obtained by fraud, it would seem, as stated by Nelson on Divorce & Separation, § 1054, that "the same rule of public policy that requires the decree to be vacated, although a second marriage has taken place, will require the same relief although one of the parties is dead;" though "the fact that the party is dead who is alleged to have procured the decree by fraud should justify the court in requiring clear and satisfactory evidence of the fraud, for the dead can make no denials or explanations."

The only cases in which the right to vacate a decree of divorce after the death of one of the parties is denied where property rights are involved and the party seeking to set aside the decree has not estopped himself or been guilty of laches, are Owens v. Sims, 3 Coldw. 544, and Kirschner v. Dietrich, 110 Cal. 502, 42 Pac. 1064. In Owens v. Sims the court refused to review a decree of divorce against a wife after the death of the husband, on the ground that by his death the suit had abated and passed beyond the limits of revivor. But, as in Tennessee there is a statute providing that the only method for reviewing a decree of divorce shall be by appeal, and as in this case the 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

time for appeal had expired, so that the suit must have been dismissed even if both parties had been living, it is possible that, in the absence of the statute, the court might have reached a different conclusion as to the effect of the husband's death. And in Kirschner v. Dietrich the judgment of divorce was silent on the question of property, though a question of property was suggested by the husband in the answer which he asked leave to file; and there is some indication in the opinion that, if there had originally been an issue as to property rights, the decision as to the right to reopen the decree might have been different, since the court, in deciding that the effect of the wife's death upon the action was not changed by the question of property, suggested by the husband in the answer which he asked leave to file, said that, "if there was originally no issue on the subject," the action could not be revived for the purpose of having a question of property rights adjudicated.

In Barney v. Barney, 14 Iowa, 189, it was held that, where complainant in a divorce suit died after a decree in her favor, but before the expiration of the time for an appeal, the action ended at her death, and could not be revived. But in this case no property rights were involved and no fraud was alleged. And the same court, in the case of Lawrence v. Nelson, 113 Iowa, 277, 57 L. R. A. 583, 85 N. W. 84, allowed a decree of divorce to be set aside after the death of the successful party because of lack of jurisdiction in the court granting it.

crees. Inherent jurisdiction is no more potent than jurisdiction that is conferred by statute, and it is as much prescribed by orderly methods. It is not a loose, arbitrary, and unlicensed jurisdiction that the court can exercise without restraint, untrammelled by the observance of the methods prescribed by law, but it is simply jurisdiction, and no more. In fact, the court should be more careful, if any distinction is to be made, in the exercise of jurisdiction which is evolved from the decisions of courts, and therefore in a measure self-assumed, than in the exercise of jurisdiction that is conferred by the lawmaking power. But there is no jurisdiction in courts, inherent or otherwise, to adjudicate the rights of litigants without notice, actual or constructive. It is suggested that, if the court, upon an examination, finds that the judgment was void for want of service, it will vacate the judgment for the purpose of clearing its records of void judgments. But the parties to an action have as much right to be heard upon that question as on any other. Our statute provides (Pierce's Code, § 362; Ballinger's Anno. Codes & Statutes, § 4886a) that, when a party to an action has appeared in the same, he should be entitled to at least three days' notice of any trial, hearing, motion, application, sale, or proceeding therein, etc. If this court should enter a judgment of vacation without having jurisdiction of the parties to the judgment, it would be guilty of the same illegal action with which the lower court is charged. So far as the property rights are concerned, if there are any, if the judgment is void, such rights are in no way affected by it, and all the avenues are open for the determination of such rights, where the parties affected can all be heard.

The judgment is affirmed.

WASHINGTON SUPREME COURT.

STATE OF WASHINGTON ex rel. A. S. GIBSON et al.

v.

SUPERIOR COURT FOR PIERCE COUNTY et al.

(.... Wash.)

Injunction—appeal—supersedes.

The right to supersedeas pending appeal does not extend to an appeal from an order enjoining continued operation of a shooting gallery and mechanical musical instruments.

(May 29, 1905.)

PETITION for a writ of mandamus to compel the Superior Court for Pierce County to fix the amount of, and accept, a supersedeas bond to stay proceedings under an order enjoining petitioners from continued prosecution of a business alleged to be a nuisance. Denied.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Williamson & Williamson and J. W. A. Nichols, for relators:

If the order is one changing the status of the parties, then it can be superseded.

State ex rel. Commercial Electric Light & P. Co. v. Stallcup, 15 Wash. 263, 46 Pac. 251; State ex rel. Byers v. Superior Court, 28 Wash. 408, 68 Pac. 865.

Mr. H. H. Johnston for respondents.

Fullerton, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

On April 14, 1905, one John Grantham brought an action in the superior court of Pierce county to enjoin the relators from operating, in connection with their business, a shooting gallery and two certain instruments known respectively as a "tonophone" and an "orchestron," alleging that their operation constituted a public nuisance specially injurious to himself. At the time of commencing his action Grantham applied for a temporary injunction pending the final determination of the action. Notice of this application was given the relators, and a hearing had thereon, at which hearing the court granted the injunction applied for, in which it restrained the relators from operating the shooting gallery and the tonophone and orchestron until the final determination of the action. The relators gave notice of appeal from the order, and applied to the court to fix the amount of the bond it would require to supersede the order pending the appeal. The court declined to fix the amount of the bond on the ground that the order was not one that could be superseded. The relators thereupon applied to this court for a writ of mandate to compel the trial court to fix the amount of such bond.

From the petition for the writ, and the return thereto, it is gathered that Grantham for some years last past has held a lease upon a part of a certain building in the city of Tacoma in which he has conducted a hotel and lodging house under the name of "Hotel Gordon;" that, about a year preceding the commencement of this action, the predecessors in interest of the relators leased the remaining part of the building (being a room on the ground floor), and fitted it up for the exhibition of pictorial views enlarged and made attractive by means of electrical contrivances. The tonophone was put in at or near the time the business was first opened, the shooting gallery was put in about December 4, 1904, and the orchestration about one week prior to the commencement of the action. It will be observed, therefore, that the order of the court had the effect of changing the status quo of the parties, as it prohibited the relators from conducting a part of their business and from operating the so-called musical instruments, all of which they were doing at the time the injunction issued.

The relators contend that, when considered with reference to the right of supersedeas, there is a distinction between an injunction that merely restrains the commission of an act the defendant is about to commit, or attempting to commit, and one that restrains the continuance of an act which he is performing at the time of the issuance of the order; that the one cannot be superseded on an appeal, for the reason that the status quo of the parties is not changed by the injunction, the effect of the same being in fact to maintain the status quo of the parties, while the other can be superseded for the very reason that the injunction does not maintain, but actually changes, the status quo. The distinction here sought to be drawn between injunctions that can be superseded and those that cannot is not the distinction ordinarily drawn by the cases. According to the usual classification, injunctions are either mandatory or prohibitory,—a mandatory injunction being one that compels the performance of some affirmative act, while a prohibitory injunction is one that operates to restrain the commission or continuance of an act;—and it is only the former that is superseded by taking an appeal and giving the supersedeas bond provided by statute. The reason usually given for this distinction is that an appeal and supersedeas does not destroy the intrinsic effect of a judgment; that, notwithstanding the appeal, the judgment is still the measure of such of the rights of the parties as it adjudicates, and, until reversed, it operates as an estoppel and a res judicata as effectively as it would had no appeal therefrom been taken and no supersedeas bond given. In other words, the appeal and supersedeas operates as a stay of affirmative action upon the judgment, as a supersedeas of execution, but does not destroy the judgment in so far as it can operate without the aid of an execution.

While there are cases to the contrary, this distinction is supported by the great weight of authority. In the Slaughterhouse Cases, 10 Wall. 273, 19 L. ed. 915, Mr. Justice Clifford, speaking for the court, said: "It is quite certain that neither an injunction, nor a decree dissolving an injunction, passed in a circuit court, is reversed or nullified by an appeal or writ of error before the cause is

Case Note.—That an appeal from a final decree granting a perpetual injunction and the giving of a supersedeas bond will not have the effect of modifying or suspending the decree, so as to permit the doing of the act enjoined pending the appeal, is said, in High on Injunctions, 4th ed. § 1098a, to be the well-established doctrine, supporting such statement by a large number of citations, including most of those cited in STATE EX REL. GIBSON v. SUPERIOR COURT. The same rule is said, in § 1698, to apply in the case of preliminary injunctions, the reason given being that, if it were otherwise, there would be no material advantage in obtaining an injunction in any case, as it would be in defendant's power to avoid its effect by appealing.

In support of this statement the author cites State ex rel. Commercial Electric Light & P. Co. v. Stallcup, 15 Wash. 263, 46 Pac. 251, which is cited in STATE EX REL. GIBSON v. SUPERIOR COURT, and several other cases.

State ex rel. Matthews v. Chase, 41 Ind. 356, states that an interlocutory order granting a temporary injunction against one partner continuing to sell the partnership goods is not suspended by an appeal therefrom. Green v. Griffin, 95 N. C. 50, holds that an appeal from an interlocutory order for an injunction against joining the walls of a store, which defendants were putting up, with plaintiff's walls, does not vacate such order.

an ex parte order, granted by the circuit court judge at chambers, enjoining the sheriff from putting a purchaser of land sold by him into possession, is not suspended by an appeal therefrom.

The case of State v. Johnson, 13 Fla. 33, is, however, cited by High on Injunctions in § 1698, in support of the statement that, if a supersedeas is granted upon an appeal from an order granting an interlocutory injunction and appointing a receiver pendente lite, it has the effect of suspending the order, where such an appeal is allowed under the practice of the state; and in Powell v. Florida Land & Improv. Co. 41 Fla. 494, 28 So. 700, citing this case with approval, it is held that, so long as an appeal with supersedeas from an order granting an injunction is pending, the power of the courts to enforce the injunction, or punish as contempts acts in violation of its terms, is suspended.

In 2 Spelling on Injunctions and Extraordinary Remedies, § 1141, it is also said that, as a general rule, a judgment granting, or refusing to dissolve, an injunction, or dissolving one already granted, is not affected by an appeal from it prior to reversal in the appellate court.

In § 1142, however, the statement is made that the authorities are not uniform on this point, and several cases in support thereof are cited, most of which relate to appeals from orders dissolving injunctions. One case, Osborne v. Williams, 40 N. J. Eq. 490, 4 Atl. 439, holds that an appeal from a final heard in this court;" and it was held that the same rule applied to writs of error from state courts in equity proceedings. To the same effect is Hovey v. McDonald, 109 U. S. 150, 27 L. ed. 888, 3 Sup. Ct. Rep. 136. In Leonard v. Ozark Land Co. 115 U. S. 465, 29 L. ed. 445, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 127, it was said: "The injunction ordered by the final decree was not vacated by the appeal. Slaughterhouse Cases, 10 Wall. 273, 297, 19 L. ed. 915, 922; Hovey v. McDonald, 109 U. S. 150, 161, 27 L. ed. 888, 891, 3 Sup. Ct. Rep. 136. It is true that in some of the Slaughterhouse Cases the appeal was from a decree making perpetual a preliminary injunction which had been granted at an earlier stage of the case; but the fact of the preliminary injunction had nothing to do with the decision, which was 'that neither an injunction, nor a decree dissolving an injunction, is reversed or nullified by an appeal or writ of error before the cause is heard in this court.' This doctrine, in the general language here stated, was distinctly reaffirmed in Hovey v. McDonald, and it clearly refers to the injunction contained in the decree appealed from, without reference to whether that injunction was in perpetuation of a former order to the same effect, or was then for the first time granted. The injunction, therefore, which was granted by the final decree in this case, is in full force, notwithstanding decree advising that injunctions shall issue restraining defendants from carrying on their trade in a particular manner suspends the operation of the writ ipso facto, unless the other party comes in and shows good cause why it should not be stayed.

Northern C. R. Co. v. Canton Co. 24 Md. 500, also holds that the operation and effect of an injunction against proceeding with a reference entirely cease until the decision on appeal, where an appeal is taken and bond given, under Md. Code, art. 5, § 23, providing that on giving such bond the appeal shall stay the operation of the order appealed from in the same manner as do appeals from final decrees.

And Gelston v. Sigmund, 27 Md. 345, holds that the taking of an appeal from an order granting an injunction, and the giving of an appeal bond, stay the injunction, and suspend its operation pending the appeal.

The claim was made in STATE EX REL. GIBSON V. SUPERIOR COURT that there is a distinction between an injunction which merely restrains the commission of an act which defendant is about to commit, or attempting to commit, and one which restrains the continuance of an act he is performing at the time the order for injunction is issued; and that the order in the latter case may be superseded because the injunction in that case changes, instead of maintaining, the status quo. In support of the holding of the court that there is no distinction between these two classes of cases, as to the ing the appeal." And in Knox County v. Harshman, 132 U. S. 14, 33 L. ed. 249, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 8, it was said: "The general rule is well settled that an appeal from a decree granting, refusing, or dissolving an injunction does not disturb its operative effect." In Central U. Teleph. Co. v. State, 110 Ind. 203, 10 N. E. 922, 12 N. E. 136, the rule is stated in the following language: "The effect of a supersedeas is to restrain the appellee from taking affirmative action to enforce his decree, but it does not authorize the appellant to do what the decree prohibits him from doing. The doctrine which our decisions have long maintained is thus stated in Nill v. Comparet, 16 Ind. 107, 79 Am. Dec. 411: 'Indeed, the only effect of an appeal to a court of error, when perfected, is to stay execution upon the judgment from which it is taken. In all other respects the judgment, until annulled or reversed, stands binding upon the parties as to every question directly decided.'"

In National Docks & N. J. Junction Connecting R. Co. v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 54 N. J. Eq. 167, 33 Atl. 936, it was said: "Moreover, I find no warrant for the insistence that the mere existence of an appeal suspends, or in any manner affects, the present inherent validity and force of the decree appealed from. The person in whose favor it is rendered is denied process to enforce right to a supersedeas, may be mentioned State ex rel. Matthews v. Chase, 41 Ind. 356, supra, in which the injunction was against the continuance of the sale of goods.

And Lindsay v. Clayton Dist. Court, 75 Iowa, 509, 30 N. W. 817, holds that the taking of an appeal from a decree for the abatement of a liquor nuisance and restraining the continued sale of liquor, and the filing of a supersedeas bond, suspend the abatement of the nuisance, but do not suspend the injunction of the sale of the liquor.

And in Genet v. Delaware & H. Canal Co. 113 N. Y. 472, 21 N. E. 390, cited in STATE EX REL. GIBSON V. SUPERIOR COURT, it is said that a judgment prohibiting defendant from using its structures on plaintiff's land in the mining of coal in the way in which it had been accustomed to use them for years, and from depositing culm on the surface, operates of its own force as a prohibition against continuing the act enjoined; and that an appeal therefrom does not, of itself, relieve defendant from the duty of obeying the judgment. The court, in this case, sustains the power of the special term, which rendered the judgment, to suspend its operation after affirmance in the general term, pending the appeal to the court of appeals.

But the court, in STATE EX REL. GIBSON V. SUPERIOR COURT, expressly stated that it did not decide that question, the only point decided being that the defendant was not entitled, as a matter of right, to supersede the injunction order.

it, and that is all. Consequently, where the decree is itself an injunction, that injunction is in force and must be obeyed, unless, to continue the status quo of the parties pending the determination of the appeal, this court, or the court of errors and appeals, shall order a suspension of its effect. And it is not necessary to issue a writ to bind the parties to the suit to obedience to such a decree. Being before the court, they are bound, at their peril, to take notice of the provisions of any decree rendered in due course upon the issues tendered." In State ex rel. Busch v. Dillon, 96 Mo. 56, 8 S. W. 781, where the effect of the statutory provision is that a perfected appeal shall stay execution and all further proceedings upon a judgment appealed from, it is said: "Our law regulating practice in injunction and appeals is essentially the same as that prevailing in the Federal courts and those of the other states; and the overwhelming weight of authority is that injunctions ordered on final hearing on the merits are not vacated by an appeal from that decree. A stay of proceedings, from its nature, operates only on orders and judgments commanding some act to be done, and does not reach injunctions." To the same effect are the cases of Gardner v. Gardner, 87 N. Y. 18; Genet v. Delaware & H. Canal Co. 113 N. Y. 475, 21 N. E. 390; Hawkins v. State, 126 Ind. 296, 26 N. E. 43; Sixth Ave. R. Co. v. Gilbert Elev. R. Co. 71 N. Y. 430; James v. Markham, 125 N. C. 145, 34 S. E. 241; Bullion, B. & C. Min. Co. v. Eureka Hill Min. Co. 5 Utah, 151, 13 Pac. 174.

The only cases we find supporting the relators' contention are from California. In that state all the decisions lay down the general rule that a mandatory injunction can be superseded by an appeal and supersedeas bond, while a prohibitory injunction cannot; but they do not agree on the question whether it is the status quo at the time of the commencement of the action, or at the time of taking the appeal, that is maintained by the stay of execution when a stay is effected. In Merced Min. Co. v. Fremont, 7 Cal. 130, it is said that "a stay of proceedings, from its nature, only operates upon orders or judgments commanding some act to be done, and does not reach a case of injunction;" and, further, that "the stay of proceedings pending an appeal has the legitimate effect of keeping them in the condition in which they were when the stay of proceedings was granted; it operates so as to prevent any future change in the condition of the parties." This case was approved on both propositions in the cases of Dewey v. Superior Court, 81 Cal. 64, 22 Pac. 333, and in Schwarz v. Superior Court, 111 Cal. 106, 43 Pac. 580. On the other hand, in the cases of Dulin v. Pacific Wood & Coal Co. 98 Cal. 304, 33 Pac. 123; Foster v. Superior Court, 115 Cal. 279, 47 Pac. 58, and Mark v. Superior Court, 129 Cal. 1, 61 Pac. 436, the court, while adhering to its holding that a prohibitory injunction could not be superseded, says that the effect of a stay of proceedings is to leave the parties in the same situation with reference to the rights involved in the action as they were prior to the granting of the injunction. These cases make no mention of the contrary rulings, and it may be that the statement was made through inadvertence, as the question does not seem to have been involved in either of them. But, be this as it may, it seems to us that the cases first cited state the rule in accordance, not only with the great weight of authority, but with the better reason.

In this state, while no case presenting the precise facts of this case has been determined, it seems to us that the question presented has been determined in principle. In State ex rel. Commercial Electric Light & P. Co. v. Stallcup, 15 Wash. 263, 46 Pac. 251, we held that a temporary injunction restraining and enjoining the defendant from stringing electric wires on the streets of the plaintiff city could not be superseded on an appeal therefrom. In State ex rel. Flaherty v. Superior Court, 35 Wash. 200, 77 Pac. 33, we held the same way with reference to a final order of injunction enjoining the appellant from fencing up and otherwise obstructing a roadway. In these cases the question presented differed from the question in the case before us, in that the injunctive orders restrained the commission of an act, while the one before us restrains the continuance of an act. But according to all of the definitions, an injunction which restrains the continuance of an act or a series of acts is just as much a preventive or prohibitory injunction as is one which restrains the commission of an act; and, this being so, neither can be superseded on an appeal.

It is thought, however, that the case of State ex rel. Byers v. Superior Court, 28 Wash. 408, 68 Pac. 865, lays down a different rule. But it will be seen on an examination of that case that the injunctive order there in consideration was a mandatory injunction, as it commanded the defendant to deliver to the appellant certain books of account, moneys, and other property of which he was in possession, belonging to a corporation. While the court said that the effect of a stay of proceedings was to preserve the status quo of the parties, it is clear that it meant nothing more than that a mandatory injunction could be superseded.

It may be that the court itself has inherent power to suspend the effect of a prohibitory injunction, when the purposes of justice require it, pending a decision of the merits on an appeal (Hovey v. McDonald, 109 U. S. 150, 27 L. ed. 888, 3 Sup. Ct. Rep. 136); but this question we do not decide. The relator insists that he is entitled to supersede the order appealed from as a matter of right, and this we hold he cannot do, as the order is a preventive, and not a mandatory, injunction.

The application is denied.

It is not contrary to natural justice that a man who has agreed to receive a particular mode of notification of legal proceedings should be bound by a judgment in which that particular mode of notification has been followed, even though he may not have had actual notice of the proceedings. Vallee v. Dumergue, 4 Exch. 290.

The law may, and ordinarily does, designate the agent or officer on whom process is to be served. For the purpose of receiving such service, and being bound by it, the corporation is identified with such agent or officer. The corporate power to receive and act on such service, so far as to make it known to the corporation, is thus vested in such officer or agent. Lafayette Ins. Co. v. French, supra; *Gillespie v. Statutes requiring the appointment of a state officer as the agent of a foreign corporation, upon whom service of process may be made, have generally been upheld upon the grounds above stated.

Ex parte Schollenberger, 96 U. S. 369, 24 L. ed. 853, sustains the validity of a statute of Pennsylvania prohibiting any foreign insurance company from doing business within that state until it has filed with the insurance commissioner a written stipulation that legal process served on "the insurance commissioner, or the party designated by him, or the agent specified by said company to receive service of process for the said company, shall have the same effect as if served personally on the company within this state;" and providing that, if the company cease to maintain an agent so designated, process may be served on the insurance commissioner. The court held that the condition imposed by the statute is not an unreasonable one, and that, the defendant companies having agreed that they might be "found" in Pennsylvania for the purpose of the service of process, they were bound by service in accordance with the statute. "If the legislature of a state requires a foreign corporation to consent to be found within its territory, for the purpose of the service of process in a suit, as a condition to doing business in the state, and the corporation does so consent, the fact that it is found gives the jurisdiction notwithstanding the finding was procured by consent."

The validity of the foregoing Pennsylvania statute is recognized in a very recent case by the supreme court of Indiana. An Indiana insurance corporation was sued in the state of Pennsylvania, by service of process upon the insurance commissioners of the latter state, and judgment was rendered 1 L.R.A.(N.S.)

against the corporation by default. In an action on such judgment in Indiana, it was held that the statute was not a denial of due process of law, the court saying: "It is well settled that, when a state has prescribed conditions upon which foreign corporations may do business within it, any such corporations thereafter doing business in the state will be presumed to have assented to such conditions." Foreign corporations having a place of business in Massachusetts are required, as a condition to doing business in the state, to appoint the commissioners of corporations their attorney on whom service of process may be made; and such statute has been 1 L.R.A.(N.S.) in fact for every foreign corporation doing business in this state, and for every non-resident domestic corporation; and every such corporation is required, by power of attorney duly executed by it, to appoint the auditor its attorney in fact to accept service of process and notice in this state for it, and, by the same instrument, to declare its consent that service of any process or notice in this state on said attorney, or his accepting, shall be equivalent to, and shall be, due and legal service upon the corporation. The act requires the corporation to pay yearly $10 to the auditor for acting, to be turned into the treasury by him. The defendant refusing to execute such power of attorney, the state asks a mandamus to compel it to do so.

The corporation asserts that no duty rests upon it by reason of said act, because it is unconstitutional. The corporation says that the act denies it freedom of contract and freedom of choice of its agent, compels it to pay money, and deprives it of property without due process of law, contrary to both the state and Federal Constitutions. We cannot concede this. We shall not discuss the general power of a state over corporations taking charters under it, or foreign corporations coming to the state by its held constitutional. Wilson v. Martin-Wilson Automatic Fire Alarm Co. 149 Mass. 24, 20 N. E. 318; Youmans v. Minnesota Title Ins. & T. Co. 67 Fed. 282.

While provisions for service of process upon a state officer in actions against non-resident domestic corporations are not so common as those affecting foreign corporations, there seems to be no difference in principle as to their validity. The power of a state over corporations of its own creation is certainly as extensive as that over foreign corporations.

While in Pinney v. Providence Loan & Invest. Co. 106 Wis. 396, 50 L. R. A. 577, 80 Am. St. Rep. 41, 82 N. W. 308, cited in the dissenting opinion in STATE v. ST. MARY'S FRANCO-AMERICAN PETROLEUM CO., a statute providing for service of process on corporations which neglect to file lists of the names of officers upon whom service may be made, by leaving copies with the register of deeds where the corporation has its principal place of business, is held not to constitute due process of law, it will be observed that the register was not made the agent of the corporation; nor was any provision made for bringing the fact of service to the notice of the corporation. And the court seems to have based its decision upon the ground that the mode of service prescribed was not "reasonably calculated to bring notice home to some of the officers or agents of the corporation."

On the other hand, a statute providing for service on domestic corporations having no officers in the state, by depositing a copy of the summons in the office of the secretary grace to do business in it. It might be plausibly said that, a foreign corporation, or a nonresident domestic corporation, having no office or officers in the state, the state, under power to regulate corporations, and particularly to see to it that judicial process to answer suits by proper means be made available, has the power assumed in the statute. It is a duty, and must be a legitimate power, that the state render effective the jurisdiction of its courts against corporations accepting its charter and doing business in the state, or chartered by another state and doing business in the state, but having, perhaps, no officer to be readily found in the state. We can see how often the service of process, without which court procedure would be ineffectual and not due process, may be delayed, or be inconvenient, or be frustrated; and we can see how the state must have wide power in such case to secure service of the process of its courts, so its legislation do not deprive of the just right of the corporation. It ought to answer suitors in the courts. If the state deprives the corporation of an essential right, its action would not be held good. But what right does this act take away? If the auditor were clothed with the discretion to do an act harmful to the corporation, complaint might be justly made; but the auditor does nothing but accept service, a mere ministerial act. He does not confess judgment; nor does he do any discretionary act. Doubtless, if he fail to warn his corporation of the suit, he would be liable on his bond, just as to any person for failure to perform a legal duty. Before the act of 1905, the Code required the corporation to appoint such attorney. This act changes this so far as to make the auditor such attorney, thus taking from it the choice of person, sometimes a valuable right, but in this instance not so. But whether, but for § 8, chap. 53, Code 1899, this act would be valid, we need not, do not, say. That section reads thus: "Where the legislature has the right to alter or repeal the charter or certificate of incorporation heretofore granted to any joint stock company, or to alter or repeal any law relating to such company, nothing contained in this chapter shall be construed to surrender or impair such right. And the right is hereby reserved to the legislature to alter any charter or certificate of incorporation hereafter granted to a joint-stock company, and to alter or repeal any law applicable to such company."

of state, and imposing upon such officer the duty of immediately mailing a copy to the office of the company, or to the president, secretary, or any director or officer of said corporation, as may appear from the articles of incorporation on file in his office, is held to constitute due process of law. Hinckley v. Kettle River R. Co. 70 Minn. 105, 72 N. W. 835. This holding is reaffirmed in 80 Minn. 35, 82 N. W. 1088; Hodge v. Eastern R. Co. 70 Minn. 193, 195, 72 N. W. 1074.

That a statute changing the law for the service of process upon nonresident corporations by designating an agent for that purpose, not appointed by the corporation, does not infringe any right of contract, is decided in Connecticut Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Spratley, 172 U. S. 602, 43 L. ed. 569, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 308. The situation there was the reverse of that complained of in STATE v. ST. MARY'S FRANCO-AMERICAN PETROLEUM CO. A Tennessee statute enacted in 1875 required foreign life insurance companies to make the secretary of state their attorney in fact to accept service of process, which the complaining company had done. In 1887 a statute was passed providing that, in actions against foreign corporations, process might be served upon any agent found within the county where suit is brought, no matter what character of agent such person might be. A judgment by default having been taken against the complainant, based upon a service of process upon an agent of the company temporarily within the state, and after it had ceased to do business there, it commenced an action to enjoin the enforcement of the judgment, contending that 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

the appointment of the secretary of state as its agent to receive process under the act of 1875 constituted a contract between the state and the company which the subsequent statute violated. But the correctness of this position is denied in that case, the court saying: "The act of 1875 stated the term, upon compliance with which a foreign corporation should be permitted to do business within the state of Tennessee. There was, however, no contract that those conditions should never be altered, and when, pursuant to the provisions of the act of 1875, this power of attorney was given by the corporation, the state did not thereby contract that, during all of the period within which the company might do business within that state, no alteration or modification should be made regarding the conditions as to the service of process upon the company. When, therefore, in 1887, the legislature passed another act, and therein provided for the service of process, no contract between the state and the corporation was violated thereby, or any of its obligations in any wise impaired, for the reason that no contract had ever existed. Instead of a contract, it was a mere license given by the state to a foreign corporation to do business within its limits upon complying with the rules and regulations provided for by law. That law the state was entirely competent to change at any time by a subsequent statute without being amenable to the charge that such subsequent statute impaired the obligation of a contract between the state and the foreign corporation doing business within its borders under the former act."

When the defendant obtained its charter, that section was in force, and this charter is subject to it. Under such a reservation of right, either to amend a charter or to change the law regulating it, there is no limit to legislative power. It even includes right of repeal. In this instance the state has simply amended the law as to the appointment of an agent: has only made a public officer attorney, so that there be one particular person, at a fixed place, always to be found, and known to all to be the attorney, dispensing with the inconvenience and uncertainty of ascertaining persons for service. 7 Am. & Eng. Law, 2d ed. p. 671; Citizens' Sav. Bank v. Owensboro, 173 U. S. 636, 43 L. ed. 840, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 571, and other cases cited in Brannon's 14th Amendment, 365. When a charter issues under such law, the state has this right of amendment of the law in force before the charter. It is a condition of the charter as fully as if that right were in words in the charter. The law inserts or reads it into the charter. 10 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 1087; Cross v. West Virginia C. & P. R. Co. 35 W. Va. 177, 12 S. E. 1071. If the corporation do not see proper to conform to it, it must discontinue business, as the legislature cannot force it to do business under the change. Yeaton v. Bank of Old Dominion. 21 Gratt. 593. It cannot be said that the 14th Amendment is violated because the act discriminates, requiring certain corporations, and not others, to appoint the auditor. As to domestic corporations having offices and officers in the state on whom service of process can be had, there is not need of such a statute; but as to those not so situated there is need. The classification is based on the reason of their being differently circumstanced, and this justifies such discriminating classification. Blue Jacket Consol. Copper Co. v. Scherr, 50 W. Va. 533, 40 S. E. 514; Magoun v. Illinois Trust & Sav. Bank, 170 U. S. 283, 42 L. ed. 1037, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 594. As to the exaction of $10 for the service of the auditor, if his appointment is valid, this feature cannot render the statute invalid as taking property without due process. The auditor is paid by the state, and the state, by its officer, renders valuable service to the corporation. South Carolina instituted a commission for regulation of railroads, and required the company to pay salaries of its members, on the theory that the state had power of regulation and the service redounded to the benefit of the railroad company. The act was held not to violate the 14th Amendment, either as taking property without due process of law, or as denying the company the equal protection of the law. Charlotte. C. & A. R. Co. v. Gibbes, 142 U. S. 386, 35 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

L. ed. 1051, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 255. To the same effect, New York ex rel. New York Electric Lines Co. v. Squire, 145 U. S. 175, 36 L. ed. 666, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 880. That feature of the act providing that the corporation shall not be required to pay any fee to anyone who may have been before appointed such attorney was mentioned in oral argument as violating the Constitution in impairing the obligation of a contract. That does not arise in this case. It is a matter between different persons. Further, that is a provision separable from the clause requiring the corporation to appoint the auditor, and, if unconstitutional, would not touch or infect that provision. 26 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 570.

Sanders, J., dissenting:

I cannot concur in holding that chap. 39, p. 401, Acts 1905, wherein it requires nonresident domestic corporations to appoint the auditor attorney in fact to accept service of process and notice, is constitutional. The defendant here was organized and now exists by virtue of a charter issued to it by the secretary of state on the 18th day of January, 1902; and on the 17th day of February, 1902, by power of attorney duly executed, filed, and recorded, as provided by § 24, chap. 54, of the Code of 1899, it appointing Wm. M. O. Dawson, a resident of the county of Kanawha, in this state, its attorney in fact to accept service of process and notice in its behalf and as a person upon whom service might be had. There is no complaint that the defendant did not fully comply with the statute as it existed prior to the passage of chap. 39, p. 401, Acts 1905; but it is the provisions of this act it is alleged to have violated, and application is made to this court for a writ of mandamus to enforce compliance therewith. The defendant contests the right of the state to compel it to comply with the provisions of chapter 39, and urges as the reason why it should not be compelled to do so that it is in violation of both the Federal and state Constitutions, in this: That it deprives it of the liberty to contract and select its own attorneys and agents, and that it is calculated to deprive, and may deprive, corporations of their property without due process of law. The law, prior to the passage of this act, was entirely adequate to make process available against foreign and nonresident domestic corporations, and completely protected suitors against such corporations by providing for the appointment of an attorney in fact to accept service of process, etc., and by requiring the power of attorney by which the appointment was made to be recorded; and just what called for the passage of chapter 39 is difficult to determine, unless it was for the purpose of increasing the state's revenues. It does not afford any additional or more efficacious means of serving process than existed prior to its enactment. Therefore the act under consideration could be declared unconstitutional without in the least impairing the rights of any person who may desire to resort to the courts of this state for the enforcement of his rights against such corporation.

The selection by a corporation of its officers and agents for the purpose of managing and conducting its business, of all kinds whatsoever, is the highest and most important right which can be exercised by it, because its business is conducted solely by its officers and agents; and, under the provisions of the act in question, the defendant is deprived of this paramount right, and, instead thereof, the state has imposed upon it the duty of selecting the state auditor as such agent. The right to have notice of suit brought against it is an exceedingly important right,—so important that it should have the right of selecting its own agents for this purpose. It should be left to the corporation to determine whether or not the agent is competent to transact the business, and one in whom it would repose so important a trust; and to deny it this right is to clearly invade that constitutional provision that no person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law. When the state selects one of its officers and compels his appointment as attorney in fact for the corporation, any judgment obtained against such corporation under a service upon such agent is not a judgment obtained by due process of law. Judge Brannon, in delivering the opinion of the court, says: "If the state deprives the corporation of an essential right, its action would not be held good." In determining the rights of a corporation, I fail to see what right or power is more essential to the successful management and safety of its business than the selection of its agents and servants, and especially in the selection of an agent to accept service of process for it, or upon whom service of process may be had in any suit which may be filed against it. A failure to notify a corporation of a suit pending against it may mean absolute destruction to the corporation, without remedy. If the act in question is constitutional, and the state has the power to select an agent to accept service of process, then where does such power end? Would it not have the power to select any other officer or agent of the company? If the corporation can be deprived of the agent of its own choosing in the one instance, why cannot the state deprive it of the selection of all its agents? There is as much reason to say that the state can appoint all as to say it can appoint one. There is no public necessity for the appointment of an agent to receive service of process until after the right of selection has first been given to the corporation and it fails or refuses to exercise it. What remedy is given the corporation, where the auditor fails to notify it of any suit brought against it? Judge Brannon says: "Doubtless, if he [the auditor] fail to warn his corporation of the suit, he would be liable on his [official] bond." I know of no law that fixes any such liability on the auditor. The act in question does not do so. While it is true he is a state official, yet he is not a state official when acting as attorney in fact for the corporation. The corporation is required to appoint him as its agent, and, in this respect, he is not the agent of the state nor acting for the state. But, suppose he could be held liable on his bond; the penalty of it, as fixed by statute, is $20,000. Is this adequate to meet any such liabilities as may arise by reason of his failure to perform his duties in this respect? In what way can it be determined? The statute does not contemplate that the auditor's bond is taken to cover any such liability.

None of the authorities cited by the attorney for the state apply to this case. They refer to foreign corporations entirely, and in some of the cases the power of selection is first given to the corporation, with the provision that, if it fail to make the appointment, service may be had upon some state official, while in the other cases it is held that a foreign corporation can exercise the right to do business in a state only by comity, or as an act of grace on the part of the state, and the condition upon which the power is extended goes with it, and cannot be separated from it, so that, if the privilege is enjoyed, the condition must be performed; and all corporations referred to in these cases were permitted to do business in the state upon the express condition that they appoint a certain person to accept service of process, etc. The case of Fisher v. Traders' Mut. L. Ins. Co. 130 N. C. 217, 48 S. E. 667, is attempted to be applied here. It has no application, because it gives the corporation first the power to select its own agent, and provides that, if it fails to make the selection, process may be served on the secretary of the corporation commission. No such right was extended to this defendant. If so, it would have no just ground of complaint, and doubtless would not be complaining. And, upon an examination of all the authorities cited by counsel for the state, it will be found that they do not support the state's contention. The state should have the right to require nonresident domestic corporations to appoint an agent or representative in the state to receive service of process and notices in legal proceedings instituted against them, and to provide, upon their failure to make such appointment, that service may be had upon a public official designated for that purpose, or in some other prescribed way. But the state has no power to compel a nonresident domestic corporation to appoint any particular officer or person as its agent to accept service of process etc., until it has been given the right to select someone of its own choosing, and a failure upon its part to do so. "Judgment against corporation on leaving summons with register of deeds, though authorized by statute, is not by due process under the 14th Amendment." Brannon's 14th Amendment, 263. And the author cites Pinney v. Providence Loan & Invest. Co. 106 Wis. 396, 50 L. R. A. 577, 80 Am. St. Rep. 41, 82 N. W. 308, which decides that a statute authorizing service of process on a corporation by leaving a copy of such process with the register of deeds is unconstitutional, as in violation of the Constitution of the United States, declaring that no state shall deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law. There are much stronger reasons for holding in this case that chapter 39 is unconstitutional than there were for holding unconstitutional the act in the case just cited; for by the Wisconsin statute it was required that on or before October 1, 1898, the corporation file in the office of the register of deeds a list of the names of its officers therein mentioned on whom service of process, notices, or orders might be made, as provided by another section of the statute, and provided, further, that in all cases where such list of officers was not filed as aforesaid service of all legal process, notices or other legal proceedings might be lawfully and effectually made upon any such corporation by giving to and leaving with said register of deeds true copies of such legal process, orders, notices, or proceedings, in which case service so made should be valid.

Then, again, the defendant is required by this act to pay to the auditor, as its attorney, the stipulated sum of $10 for his services. Not only is the right to select its own agent taken away from the corporation, but it is deprived of the liberty to contract with its agent as to the compensation which such agent is to receive for his services. Judge Brannon says: "The auditor is paid by the state, and the state, by its officer, renders valuable service to the corporation." This may be true; but still it is no reason why the defendant can be deprived of the liberty to contract, as guaranteed to it by the Constitution. In Brannon's 14th Amendment, p. 110, the author says: "But what does the word 'liberty' mean in American Constitutions? This is the test question here, for it means in the 14th Amendment just what it means in the state Constitutions. It means personal liberty. This includes more than mere exemption from imprisonment. I should say that it means exemption or immunity from unlawful imprisonment or detention of the body, freedom to go and come on lawful business or pleasure, commonly called the right of locomotion; the right to acquire, hold, and convey property; the right to make contracts and to labor in any lawful calling to earn a living," etc. In State v. Peel Splint Coal Co. 36 W. Va. 856, 17 L. R. A. 385, 15 S. E. 1018, Judge Brannon, in delivering the opinion of the court, says: "The word 'liberty' as here used, does not mean simply exemption from bodily imprisonment, but liberty and freedom to engage in lawful business, to make lawful contracts therein, to the ends of earning a livelihood for self and family, and of acquiring and enjoying property, and of obtaining happiness. The right to contract and be contracted with is indispensable to these indispensable objects. . . . Vain would be the pursuit of happiness if the right of contract necessary to secure the bread of life and raiment and home be taken away. Scarcely any of the great cardinal rights are more universally recognized and vindicated under our system—indeed, under all civilized governments—than this right of contract." I fully concur with the court in construing this constitutional provision and defining the word "liberty" as embracing the right to contract and be contracted with; and, if this is the proper construction, then it seems to me that no argument is necessary to show that the act in question is unconstitutional, because it deprives the defendant of its right to contract with its agent.

The validity of the act in question is upheld by the court by virtue of § 8, chap. 53, Code 1899; for Judge Brannon, speaking for the court, says: "But for said § 8, we need not, do not, say whether or not the act would be valid." If chapter 39, p. 401, Acts 1905, is unconstitutional but for said § 8, I fail to see how this section can rob it of its unconstitutional features and render constitutional an unconstitutional act. It is true the state, in said § 8, reserved the power to alter any charter or certificate of incorporation, and to alter or repeal any law applicable to a joint-stock company. This is a legislative, and not a constitutional, reservation; and, while the state has reserved such powers, yet it cannot reserve to itself the right to pass an act in derogation of the Constitution. Therefore § 8, chap. 53, Code 1899, cannot relieve the act in question of its unconstitutional features. Mr. Justice Cooley, in Detroit v. Detroit & H. Pl. Road Co. 43 Mich. 140, 5 N. W. 275, speaking of the provision of the Constitution of the United States which forbids the impairment of obligations of contracts, says that, but for this provision, "the power to amend and repeal corporate charters would be ample without being expressly reserved. The reservation of the right leaves the state where any sovereignty would be, if unrestrained by express constitutional limitations and with the powers which it would then possess. It might therefore do what it would be admissible for any constitutional government to do when not thus restrained; but it could not do what would be inconsistent with constitutional principles." In Citizens' Sav. Bank v. Owensboro, 173 U. S. 636, 43 L. ed. 840, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 530, and many other cases, it is said, in upholding the reserved powers to alter or repeal the charter of a corporation, that under such reservation the legislature may exercise the right without impairing the obligation of the contract. This is because the reservation qualifies the grant, and, whenever the legislature exercises the power which it has expressly reserved, it does not impair the obligation of its contract, because it is a part of the contract that it shall be at liberty to exercise that power. It is not claimed that chapter 39 is invalid because it impairs the obligation of a contract, but because it is in conflict with the 14th Amendment to the Constitution of the United States. The state cannot reserve unto itself the power to pass an unconstitutional act. Whatever power the state may possess over corporations in their creation, or in passing or amending the laws under which they are formed, it cannot withdraw from them the guaranties of the Federal Constitution.

The object of the reservation, in whatever form expressed, was to preserve to the state control over the corporate franchise, rights, and privileges which in her sovereign or legislative capacity she had called into existence; in other words, to enable her to annul or modify that which she had created. It was not its object to interfere with contracts which the corporation, when once created, might make, nor with the property which it might acquire. With respect to everything else, it gives no power that the state would not have had without it. The artificial body created by the legislature is composed of natural persons who have combined their property to obtain an object 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

beyond their individual resources, and who are clearly entitled, under the guaranties of the Constitution, to be secured in the possession and use of their property thus held, with the liberty to contract in regard thereto, as before they had associated themselves together. Mr. Justice Field says: "Whatever the state may do with the creations of its own will, it must do in subordination to the inhibitions of the Federal Constitution. It may confer by its general laws upon corporations certain capacities of doing business and of having perpetual succession in its members. It may make its grant in these respects revocable at pleasure. It may make it subject to modifications. It may impose conditions upon its use and reserve the power to change these at will. But whatever property the corporation acquires in the exercise of these capacities conferred it holds under the same guaranties which protect the property of individuals from spoliation. It cannot be taken for public use without compensation. It cannot be taken without due process of law. Nor can it be subjected to burdens different from those laid upon the property of individuals under like circumstances."

For the foregoing reasons, I would refuse the writ.

SALLY ANN PRITCHARD, Appt.,

v.

THOMAS G. LEWIS et al., Respts.

(.... Wis.)

1. Deed—ambiguity—evidence.

Where, by deeds executed the same day, land is granted to one person, "excepting and reserving therefrom a strip of land" of certain width, "to be used as a right of way," and this strip, "being the same premises as described in the other deed as a right

Case Note.—That possession, to be adverse, must be inconsistent with the right which is sought to be extinguished, is a proposition too well established to need the citation of authority. Upon this principle hinge the decisions in the cases subjoined, in which the question whether inclosure of a right of way by the owner of the servient tenement constitutes a possession adverse to such right is involved.

A right of passage may exist, though subject to the limitation of bars and gates. Hinks v. Hinks, 46 Me. 423.

The building of a fence across a road running along the line of a farm, which is made movable so that it can be opened and closed by travelers, does not make the owner's possession adverse. Hempsted v. Huffman, 84 Iowa, 398, 51 N. W. 17.

The erection of a gate, continued for more of way," is granted to another, reserving the timber thereon, sufficient ambiguity exists as to grantor's intention to admit extraneous evidence in explanation.

2. Same—right of way.

The fee will pass to the second grantee where, in one deed, land is granted to one person, "excepting and reserving" therefrom a strip of certain width, "to be used as a right of way," which strip is granted to another, reserving the timber thereon to the grantor; where it appears that the grantor removed the timber therefrom, the second grantee paid the taxes thereon, and the wife of the grantor refused to sign the first deed until the strip had been conveyed to the second grantee.

3. Adverse possession—inclosed right of way.

Mere possession under a deed which includes a strip belonging to a stranger for a right of way, but which the grantor had a right to fence in, is not sufficient to ripen into an adverse title, since it is consistent with the title of the true owner.

4. Mortgage—cloud on title—equitable relief.

A mortgage which includes a strip of land the title to which is in a third person for right of way, but which the mortgagor has the right to fence in, is a cloud on the title than twenty years by the owner of the soil across a neighborhood road or private path which gate is opened and shut at pleasure and hinders no one from the use of the road does not amount to an extinguishment, though it may to a modification, of the public easement. State v. Pettis, 7 Rich. L. 390.

The maintenance of sliding bars across a private or byroad, instead of the swinging gates permitted by statute, for thirty or forty years, during which time the road has been continually used, does not raise the presumption that the right to the road has ceased. Van Blarcom v. Frike, 29 N. J. L. 517.

Proof of the erection of a gate and bars across a lane, and of plaintiff's forbidding individuals, in two or three instances, to pass over the lane, is not a continuous, exclusive, open, and adverse enjoyment for any period of twenty years, where the public have exercised and claimed the right to pass and re-pass over the premises at their own will and pleasure, and they have done so without any continued interruption or hindrance. Mowe v. Stevens, 61 Me. 592.

But the inclosure of a private right of way within a field, and cultivating the ground over which it once ran, for the statutory period of limitation, bars the right to the easement. Bowen v. Team, 6 Rich. L. 298, 60 Am. Dec. 127.

Where a right of way granted to a railroad is inclosed and cultivated with the rest of a farm, such possession is adverse. Maysville & B. S. R. Co. v. Holton, 100 Ky. 665, 39 S. W. 27. Contra, Virginia & S. W. R. Co. v. Crow, 108 Tenn. 17, 64 S. W. 485.

of the true owner, which entitles him to equitable relief.

(October 3, 1905.)

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Racine County in favor of defendants in an action brought to remove an alleged cloud from the title of certain real estate. Reversed.

Statement by Kerwin, J.:

This is an action to remove a cloud from title to real estate, created by mortgage from defendant Lewis and wife to defendant Adams. Plaintiff claims through deed from the common grantors, Evan Jones and wife, to Owen P. Pritchard, and defendant Lewis, through deed from said Jones and wife to John G. Lewis. The deeds are as follows:

This indenture, made this 11th day of November, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and seventy-two, between Evan Jones, of Racine county, Wisconsin, and Ellen, his wife, parties of the first part, and Owen P. Pritchard, of the same place, party of the second part, witnesseth: That the said parties of the first Fencing across a street does not make the possession adverse when it is done by permission of the municipal authorities. Taylor v. Philippi, 35 W. Va. 554, 14 S. E. 130; Carter v. La Grange, 60 Tex. 636.

But where a person has been permitted to remain in the continued, adverse, and actual possession of a public street, by actual inclosure, for more than thirty years, the title vests absolutely in him. Cornwall v. Louisville & N. R. Co. 87 Ky. 72, 7 S. W. 553.

Other instances of the application of the rule are found in cases of encroachment by a fence upon the side of a highway, inclosing a portion not used or required for public travel, which it is held does not, of itself, amount to an adverse possession of the land so inclosed. Lane v. Kennedy, 13 Ohio St. 42; McClelland v. Miller, 28 Ohio St. 502.

There is a conflict of opinion as to whether the fencing and cultivation by the owner of the fee in land over which a railroad company has a right of way, of such portions thereof as are not covered by the tracks of the company, is so inconsistent with the company's easement therein as to amount to an adverse possession which will destroy the easement. That it is not adverse is held in East Tennessee, V. & G. R. Co. v. West, 89 Tenn. 293, 10 L. R. A. 855, 14 S. W. 776; Northern Counties Invest. Trust v. Enyard, 24 Wash. 360, 64 Pac. 516; Contra, Illinois C. R. Co. v. Houghton, 126 Ill. 233, 1 L. R. A. 213, 9 Am. St. Rep. 581, 18 N. E. 301; Illinois C. R. Co. v. O'Connor, 154 Ill. 550, 39 N. Lewis. Excepting and reserving from above-described premises all the timber thereon situated, with the right to said party of the first part to go upon said land and remove said timber for the term of ten years. Together with all and singular the hereditaments and appurtenances thereto in any wise appertaining, and all the estate, right, title, possession, claim, and demand, in law or in equity, of the said parties of the first part therein and thereto. To have and to hold the same unto said party of the second part, his heirs and assigns, to his and their sole use, forever. And the said Evan Jones, one of the parties of the first part, for himself, his heirs, executors, and administrators, doth hereby covenant with the said party of the second part, his heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, that at the time of the delivery of these presents he is well seised of the above-granted premises as of an indefeasible estate of inheritance in fee simple, that the same are free and clear from all liens and encumbrances whatever, and that the same in the quiet and peaceable possession and enjoyment of the said party of the second part, his heirs and assigns, forever, against all persons lawfully claiming the same, or any part thereof, he will warrant and forever defend.

In witness whereof, the said parties of the first part have hereunto set their hands and seals the day and year first above written.

This indenture, made this eleventh day of November, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and seventy-two, between Evan Jones, of the county of Racine, state of Wisconsin, and Ellen, his wife, party of the first part, and John G. Excepting and reserving from the above-described premises a strip of land two (2) rods in width off the north side thereof, to be used as a right of way. The party of the second part, however, to have the privilege of fencing said right of way into his inclosure, and being required only to maintain a gate at each end thereof for the use of said party of the first part, his heirs and assigns. The main controversy is whether the deed from Jones and wife to Pritchard, of the strip, conveyed the fee or an easement for right of way. The case was tried by the court, and the court found as facts, in effect, that the plaintiff and defendant Lewis respectively derived their title through deeds hereinbefore set forth; that at the time of the execution of the deeds, November 11, 1872, Owen P. Pritchard then, and prior to the time of his death, was the owner, and plaintiff since has been and is the owner, of the 20 acres of land adjoining the strip in controversy at the east end thereof; that said strip was used by said Pritchard in his lifetime, and by the plaintiff since his death, as a passageway to reach said 20 acres; that on the execution and delivery of the partition deed from William Beatty, as referee, to defendant Lewis, May 5, 1894, defendant Lewis entered into possession under said deed, and held adversely for ten years, subject to the easement of Pritchard; that the mortgage referred to in the complaint was given and taken with full knowledge that the plaintiff had a right of way or easement over the strip of land in question and that the rights of the plaintiff were prior and superior to the lien of the mortgage. And, as conclusions of law: That the defendant Lewis is the owner in fee simple of the land in controversy, subject only to right of way or easement over the same to the plaintiff, her heirs and assigns; that the mortgage does not constitute a cloud upon the title of the plaintiff; that defendants are entitled to judgment against plaintiff, and to recovery of their costs. Judgment was entered accordingly, from which this appeal was taken.

Error is assigned: First, in the admission and exclusion of testimony; second, in finding that defendant Lewis had been in the continual occupation and adverse possession of the premises for more than ten years prior to the commencement of the action; third, in the conclusions of law that defendant Lewis is the owner in fee of the land in question, and that the reservation by grantor Jones, his heirs and assigns, in the Pritchard deed, was an easement merely; that defendants' claim, under §§ 4211 and 4212, Rev. Stat. 1898, is established by the evidence, that the mortgage does not constitute a cloud upon the rights of the plaintiff, and in ordering judgment for defendants.

Kerwin, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

1. The first and important question for consideration is, What title passed by the deed of November 11, 1872, from Evan Jones and wife to Owen P. Pritchard? The two deeds from Jones to Lewis and Pritchard upon their face indicate that they were executed upon the same day. The deed to Lewis in plain terms excepts and reserves the 2 rods for a right of way, not a right of way over the 2 rods, but "a strip of land 2 rods in width off the north side thereof, to be used as a right of way," which quite plainly imports that the fee was intended to be reserved. Cincinnati v. Newell, 7 Ohio St. 37. The language used is in form an exception and reservation. A marked distinction exists between the terms "exception" and "reservation" as used in deeds; the distinction being that a reservation is something taken back from the thing granted, while an exception is some part of the estate not granted at all. Rich v. Zeilsdorff, 22 Wis. 544, 99 Am. Dec. 81; Fischer v. Laack, 76 Wis. 313, 45 N. W. 104. True, the terms "excepting" and "reserving" are often used indiscriminately, and sometimes in a deed what purports to be a reservation has the force of an exception, when such appears to be the clear and obvious intention of the parties. 2 Devlin, Deeds, § 980; Fischer v. Laack, supra; Gould v. Howe, 131 Ill. 490, 25 N. E. 602. The deed of Pritchard is a warranty deed, conveying by metes and bounds the strip of land in question, referring to it as "being the same premises described as a right of way 2 rods wide, reserved by said parties of the first part in a deed this day executed by them to one John G. Lewis;" and it further excepts and reserves the timber situated upon said strip, with the right of the grantor to go upon the land and remove said timber for the term of ten years.

It is contended on the part of the respondent that the language of the deed to Lewis excepting and reserving the premises for a right of way, shows upon the face of the deed that the fee was not reserved, but only a right of way, and that, while the deed to Pritchard was an absolute conveyance of the premises by metes and bounds, still the reference to the Lewis deed made it a part of the Pritchard deed, and constituted notice to Pritchard that only a right of way was reserved; and, the fee having passed to Lewis, Pritchard only got by his deed the right of way reserved in deed to Lewis. This argument is based upon the theory that the fee passed to Lewis. Hence, grantor Jones could only convey in his deed to Pritchard the remaining estate in him, which was only a right of way. The court below held, in a written opinion filed, that the reservation to Jones in deed to Lewis and subsequent grant to Pritchard was of an easement merely, and that the deeds were not so ambiguous as to require parol evidence to aid their interpretation; and the argument of counsel for respondent here is grounded upon the assumption that the deed to Lewis upon its face conveyed the fee and reserved the right of way only, and cannot be aided by extrinsic evidence; and several cases are cited upon this proposition, which will be considered.

Winston v. Johnson, 42 Minn. 398, 45 N. W. 958, is a case where it was held that the words "excepting and reserving," in a deed, constituted a reservation, and not an exception. But a careful examination of this case will show that it did not turn altogether upon the words of the deed, but upon the intention of the parties as gathered from their acts, the surrounding circumstances, as well as the physical condition of the property and the practical interpretation of the reservation by the grantee. In Bolio v. Marvin, 130 Mich. 82, 89 N. W. 563, there was no express reservation, the language being, "saving and preserving, however, from the operation hereof, the road running along the southerly line of said parcels," etc.; and here the court recognizes the well-settled doctrine that the intention of the grantor is to be gathered from the whole instrument, and says (p. 83, of 130 Mich., p. 563 of 89 N. W.): "There was not the slightest occasion to include this land in the deed, unless some interest was intended to be vested in the grantee." The court also refers with approval to Reynolds v. Gaertner, 117 Mich. 532, 76 N. W. 3, where the words used were held to create an exception, and not a reservation, and says (at p. 84, of 130 Mich., p. 562 of 89 N. W.): "But the language employed in the deed construed in that case is very different from that which we are now construing. In that case the language was, 'except two and forty-six hundredths acres to the Chicago & Canada Southern Railroad.'" In Wellman v. Churchill, 92 Me. 193, 42 Atl. 352, the language of the deed was, "with the reservation of a road 2 rods wide over the northerly side of said lot." Here the language plainly indicated a reservation, not an exception, and the court refers to the distinction between exception and reservation, and says (p. 195 of 92 Me., p. 353 of 42 Atl.): "Exception is always a part of the thing granted, and of a thing in being; and a reservation is of a thing not in being, but is newly created out of the land and tenements devised, though exception and reservation have often been used promiscuously. Co. Litt. 47a. A construction given to a clause called a reservation is that it is an exception if it fall within that definition, and if such was the design of the parties." Elliot v. Small, 35 Minn. 396, 59 Am. Rep. 329, 29 N. W. 158, is where the clause was in form a reservation, and not an exception, and was a reservation for a public street. In this case much stress is placed upon the apparent intention of the grantor, and it is said (at p. 397 of 35 Minn., p. 330 of 59 Am. Rep., and p. 159 of 29 N. W.): "The so-called reservation was not, strictly speaking, an exception of anything; for an exception is of a part of the thing granted, and 1 L.R.A. (N.S.) of something in esse at the time of the grant." So this case appears to turn upon the intention of the grantor and the wording of the reservation. In Towne v. Salentine, 92 Wis. 404, 66 N. W. 395, this court clearly recognizes the distinction between the words "exception" and "reservation," when used in a deed, and holds that, while a reservation for a right of way carries only an easement, an exception for the same purpose excludes the fee from the grant. In Patrick v. Young Men's Christian Asso. 120 Mich. 185, 79 N. W. 208, the language used in the deed was "excepting and reserving," and it was held to be an exception, and not a reservation.

Many cases might be cited in support of the doctrine that excepting land from a deed for right-of-way purposes withholds the fee from the grant, and that the fee in such land excepted does not pass to the grantee, unless it appears that the intention of the parties was that the right of way only should be reserved. The question, therefore, arises here, whether the language of the deeds in question is so ambiguous or indefinite as to admit of extrinsic evidence. As before observed, the Lewis deed upon its face appears to except the fee and burden it with a right of way in favor of Pritchard, as well as the right in the grantee to keep it inclosed and maintain gates. No reason is perceived why the grantor, Jones, did not have the right to except the fee, and so burden it. Nothing appears upon the face of the deed to Lewis showing a contrary intention. Now it appears very clearly from the deed to Pritchard, which on its face purports to have been executed upon the same day as deed to Lewis, that the grantor had reserved the fee to this strip in deed to Lewis, because he reserves to himself the timber situated thereon, which clearly he could not have done if the deed to Lewis had conveyed the fee; although he also refers to the property as the premises reserved for right of way. Counsel for respondent says, in his brief, that the two deeds should be construed together; and in so doing it is not easy to see how it can be gathered from the deeds that the intention of the grantor was to convey the fee to Lewis. Besides, the interpretation put upon these deeds by practical construction indicates quite plainly that the fee in this strip was reserved in the deed to Lewis and passed to Pritchard. Immediately upon the execution of these deeds, Jones swept the timber, which was valuable, from the strip, without any objection on the part of Lewis, which would be wholly inconsistent with the passing of the fee to Lewis; also the payment of taxes on this strip by Pritchard, and the fact that Mrs. Jones, one of the grantors, refused to sign deed to Lewis until Pritchard got his deed of the 1 acre, very strongly indicate that the fee to the strip was reserved, and intended to be reserved, in deed to Lewis, and transferred to Pritchard. In conveyances of this character, the question of exception or reservation being largely one of intention, and the court always determining from the nature and effect of the provision itself, the subject matter, and the situation of the parties, we are inclined to the opinion that sufficient ambiguity existed to warrant the admission of the testimony offered. Fischer v. Laack, 76 Wis. 313, 45 N. W. 104; Stone v. Clark, 1 Met. 378, 35 Am. Dec. 370; Miller v. Miller, 17 Or. 423, 21 Pac. 938. And, considering the deeds in the light of the competent testimony produced, there is no room for doubt that Jones reserved, and intended to reserve, the fee in the conveyance to Lewis, and that he conveyed the same to Pritchard.

2. The next question for consideration is whether the sixth finding is supported by the evidence. It is, in effect, that the defendant Lewis entered into possession of the strip in question May 5, 1894, under deed from Wm. Beatty, referee in the partition suit, and acquired title thereunder by adverse possession. Through the partition deed defendant Lewis got the interest of John G. Lewis. This was 24 acres; the 1-acre strip in question being owned in fee by plaintiff, subject to the right of Lewis to fence the same into his inclosure and maintain gates. The partition deed describes the tract by metes and bounds, and gives it as 24 acres, more or less, although it includes within the boundaries the 24 acres owned by Lewis and the 1-acre strip owned by plaintiff. The plaintiff, being the owner in fee of the strip in question at the time of the execution of the partition deed, is entitled to the benefit of the presumption created by § 4210, Rev. Stat. 1898. It is claimed on the part of the respondent that at the time of the execution of partition deed, May 5, 1894, defendant Lewis entered into possession under such deed, and continued to hold adversely; but the evidence fails to establish such claim. The possession by Lewis after May 5, 1894, as shown by the evidence, was perfectly consistent with title to the fee in plaintiff and her ancestor. The evidence does not establish that the defendant Lewis, or his father, held the strip in question in hostility to the plaintiff. Evidence of adverse possession must be clear and positive, and should be strictly construed. Lampman v. Van Alstyne, 94 Wis. 417, 69 N. W. 171; Fuller v. Worth, 91 Wis. 406, 64 N. W. 995. Upon the facts proved, the possession of the defendant Lewis was simply permissive, as well from the time of execution of partition deed as before. 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

The actual occupation by defendant Lewis of the 24 acres, although the 1-acre strip was inclosed therewith, was perfectly consistent with the ownership of plaintiff, and not in hostility to her. Stewart v. Harris, 9 Humph. 714; Nau v. Brunette, 79 Wis. 604, 48 N. W. 649; Lampman v. Van Alstyne, supra; Woods v. Montevall Coal & Transp. Co. 84 Ala. 560, 5 Am. St. Rep. 393, 3 So. 475; Bailey v. Carleton, 12 N. H. 9, 37 Am. Dec. 190. We must therefore hold that the sixth finding is not supported by the evidence.

3. Upon the question of the mortgage to defendant Adams creating a cloud upon the plaintiff's title, little need be said. The mortgage claimed to be a cloud upon the plaintiff's title in this case was executed by defendant Lewis and his wife to defendant Adams in December, 1903, and included therein the strip of land owned by the plaintiff, without any reservation whatever. The mortgage was executed upon the theory that defendant Lewis owned the fee. Since he did not, the mortgage is a cloud upon the plaintiff's title, and she is entitled to relief. It therefore follows that the judgment of the court below must be reversed.

The judgment of the court below is reversed, and the cause remanded, with instructions to enter judgment for the plaintiff.

Corporations—fraudulent reduction of stock—relief.

Equity will interfere to prevent the majority stockholders of a corporation from exercising their statutory power to reduce its capital stock, where the purpose is to Case Note.—The decision in THEIS v. DURR is a distinct addition to the list of adjudicated cases dealing with the validity of proceedings for the reduction of capital stock, including the power of a court of equity to supervise and review such proceedings where the proceedings themselves conform to statute, but have back of them an improper purpose. It will be noted that the court has not contented itself with restraining the proceedings subsequent to the reduction of the capital stock which gave effect to the improper purpose, but held that the reduction of the stock and the purpose back of it were inseparable, and affirmed the judgment annulling the entire proceedings, including the reduction of the capital stock. It is evident from reading the opinion of the

A PPEALS by defendants Durr et al. from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Milwaukee County in favor of plaintiffs in a suit to annul proceedings for the reduction of the capital stock of a corporation. Affirmed.

Statement by Marshall, J.:

Appeals from the circuit court for Mil-court that it would not have annulled the reduction of the capital stock had the subsequent proceedings for carrying into effect the reduction been just and fair to all the parties.

In Niagara Shoe Co. v. Tobey, 71 Ill. App. 250, cited by the court in the THEIS CASE, the question arose in an action of assumpsit to recover on a stock subscription, and the defendant, by way of defense, alleged that, subsequent to his subscription, the capital stock of the corporation had been improperly reduced at a meeting of the stockholders, by releasing the subscription of a particular stockholder, and not by a pro rata reduction; and the defense was sustained by the court. This case is authority for the general proposition to which the court cites it,—that equality between the stockholders should be preserved in the reduction of the capital stock; but does not involve the question as to the scope of the judgment to be rendered in a direct proceeding to annul a reduction of the stock where the illegality consists in the improper method giving effect to the reduction.

The case of Currier v. Lebanon Slate Co., 56 N. H. 262, cited by the court in the THEIS CASE, was a suit in equity, by stockholders, to annul the purchase by the corporation of shares of its stock, which was made for the purpose of relieving the subscriber from the payment of assessments made upon the stock; the court saying that it amounted to a reduction of the capital stock in a manner unfair to other stockholders.

The general rule that the courts will not interfere with the internal management of corporations in the absence of fraud is thus stated in 4 Thompson on Corporations, § 4487: "Other decisions emphasize the principle that courts of equity cannot undertake the management of all the private corporations in the country; that, in the absence of usurpation, of fraud, or of gross negligence, they will not interfere, but will allow the majority to rule, and leave dissatisfied stockholders to redress their grievances through ordinary corporate methods." See also Ellerman v. Chicago Junction R. & Union Stockyards Co. 49 N. J. Eq. 217, 23 Atl. 287, and 10 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 969.

In Berger v. United States Steel Corp. 63 N. J. Eq. 809, 53 Atl. 68, where a scheme for waukeee county. This was an equitable action to annul proceedings of the majority of the stockholders of the defendant corporation, reducing its authorized capital stock for the special advantage of those who had not paid in full their subscriptions therefor.

The issues and the nature of the evidence, so far as necessary to the questions raised upon the appeal, are indicated by this summary of facts found by the court: November 3, 1897, plaintiffs, G. Podoll and H. W. Theis, with the defendants, C. J. Fox, D. H. May, and one C. L. Clason as the parties of the first part, contracted with the redeeming and retiring preferred stock of the corporation out of the proceeds of bonds of the corporation was attacked, the court, after upholding the validity of the corporate proceedings, took up the contention that the manner in which the conversion planned was to be carried through and consummated was illegal, and furnished sufficient ground for the injunction, and said: "Individual stockholders cannot question, in judicial proceedings, corporate acts of directors if the same are within the powers of the corporation and in furtherance of its purposes. are not unlawful or against good morals, and are done in good faith and in the exercise of an honest judgment;" citing Ellerman v. Chicago Junction R. & Union Stockyards Co. supra.

In Lowe v. Pioneer Threshing Co. 70 Fed. 646, the court, while specifically recognizing the rule of noninterference in the internal policy and management of corporations, held that the rule did not apply where fraud had been practised on the rights of dissenting stockholders.

In Coquard v. St. Louis Cotton Compress Co. (Mo.) 7 S. W. 176, it was held that a corporation could not reduce its capital stock, and borrow money on its bonds, and distribute the same among its stockholders in payment of the portion of the capital stock canceled by such reduction. This case resembles the THEIS CASE in that the formal method prescribed for the reduction of the capital stock was pursued, and the attack upon the scheme was in the purpose back of it rather than the formal reduction of the capital stock itself. As in the THEIS CASE, there were two resolutions, one reducing the capital stock one-half, another to pay the stockholders the amount of the surplus thus created, and to cancel existing certificates and issue new ones. The court, in speaking of this phase of the case, said: "The case must be considered as a whole, and not in its detached portions;" and that, "when you place these resolutions in juxtaposition,—when you compare them together,—is it not plain that the supposed reduction is one in name, and not in nature?" The court therefore held the act sought to be enjoined ultra vires, and that the plaintiff, though but a holder of a few shares of stock, was entitled to equitable relief.

defendants, Emil Durr and W. D. Halstead, the second parties, to this effect: The former, who were the owners of a patent process for making pneumatic tires for vehicles, vested in the latter and such others as they might associate with them a thirty-day option to acquire, in a specified manner, a one-half interest in such patent process and the manufacturing plant to be established to produce tires pursuant thereto. The second parties for themselves and their associates agreed to proceed at once to equip a plant, in or near the city of Milwaukee, for manufacturing such tires, and to enlarge the plant from time to time or otherwise provide for supplying the trade. It was mutually agreed that, upon the acceptance of the option by the second parties, they would join with the first parties in organizing a corporation with an authorized capital stock of $40,000, divided into 400 shares of $100, each, and subscribe for one half such stock, and pay therefor the full face value thereof as fast as the corporation required the same for its business, and the second parties would subscribe for the other half of the stock, and pay therefor by conveying their said patented invention to the corporation for the consideration of $20,000. The second parties in due time exercised their option. A corporation was accordingly organized as agreed upon. Podoll, Fox, May, and. Theis each subscribed for 40 shares, Clason subscribed for 25 shares of the stock and L. L. Caufy was permitted to join and subscribe for 15 shares thereof, making the half to be paid for with the patent right. The second parties and others associated with them, including defendants, Durr, Halstead, Benzenberg, Spence, and Joys, subscribed for the other half of the stock agreeing in accordance with the aforesaid contract to pay therefor. At a corporate meeting of such subscribers a resolution was unanimously adopted authorizing and directing the purchase of said patent right for the sum of $20,000. The purchase was accordingly made, the property being accepted by the corporation as full payment for the stock subscribed for by the said first parties. Certificates were duly issued therefor. The other subscribers paid into the corporate treasury 40 per cent of their indebtedness, and received certificates of stock for the amount thereof. C. L. Clason assigned in trust 20 shares of his stock to L. L. Caufy, certificates of stock being issued to the latter and the stock accordingly transferred on the books of the corporation as if he were the owner thereof. The trust agreement was verbal. Thereafter Caufy assigned his certificates in blank to Clason. Before the commencement of this action Clason sold such stock to 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

William H. Momsen, who applied to have the same transferred to him upon the books of the corporation and a new certificate issued therefor. Such demand was made after the proceedings to change the authorized capital stock. The demand was refused. The said second parties did not establish a manufacturing plant as they agreed to do. The corporation supplied the trade with its patented device by procuring the manufacture of tires by the special process. It now has a contract with a concern to manufacture and sell tires, using said patented process on the royalty plan. Three of those who were indebted upon subscriptions for stock and two persons who held full paid stock composed the board of directors for the first year. Thereafter it was composed of four of the former and one of the latter. The debtor members so controlling the corporate affairs neglected and refused to make any calls upon stock subscriptions although the corporation needed money to carry on its business. Instead of making such calls, they borrowed money against the protest of the director who held full paid stock. Only 40 per cent has been paid upon any of the subscriptions for stock made by such second parties or their associates. Prior to the 13th day of January, 1903, the holders of full paid stock insisted upon the others paying the 60 per cent due thereon, and the latter refused upon the ground that the former had not paid in full for their stock, except in form. On said date, at a meeting of the stockholders then held, the debtor subscribers, who still insisted upon having some relief from their agreement to put their liability for $20,000 in money against the said patent right, proposed the passage of a resolution reducing the stock of the corporation 60 per cent with a view of thereby creating a basis for extinguishing their subscription indebtedness and making a 60 per cent reduction in the stock held by the others. The resolution was lost, but at an adjourned meeting it was carried by the necessary two-thirds vote. The form of the resolution was as follows:

"Be it resolved by the stockholders of the Milwaukee Puncture Proof Tire Company that the capital stock of said corporation is hereby reduced from forty thousand dollars ($40,000) to sixteen thousand dollars ($16,000), and that article 3 of the articles of incorporation be and the same is hereby amended so as to read as follows: 'The capital stock of said corporation shall be $16,000, which shall be divided into one hundred and sixty (160) shares of $100 each.'"

cordance with the statutes. When the resolution was adopted 20 shares of stock voted by L. L. Caufy was required to make the necessary two-thirds vote. He was the holder of the stock of record, but the owner was C. L. Clason, as before stated. Neither of the plaintiffs at any time consented to the reduction of the capital stock as proposed, or to a release of the debtor stockholders. After the passage of the resolution and compliance with statutory forms for reducing the capital stock, the corporation, acting by its board of directors, composed as aforesaid, in the main, of persons who were designed to be beneficiaries of the proceedings complained of, sent to each stockholder a letter containing these words:

"Pursuant to the resolution of the stockholders of the Milwaukee Patent Puncture Proof Tire Company, adopted on the 16th day of January, 1903, at its annual meeting, the articles of incorporation of said corporation have been duly amended reducing the capital stock of said corporation from $40,000 to $16,000. You will therefore please present your certificates of stock in said corporation on or before March 1st for cancellation and for the reissue of the proper number of shares of stock to you in accordance with the resolution so passed diminishing the capital of said corporation."

None of the plaintiffs complied with such request. Before the commencement of this action they caused a demand in writing to be made upon the directors of the corporation to set aside all proceedings theretofore had with a view to reducing the authorized stock of the corporation, and to proceed to call the $12,000, due upon stock subscriptions and collect the same, asserting as a reason therefor that the debtors had for five years refused to recognize any liability in the matter. The demand was refused.

Upon the facts stated, the court decided, as matters of law, that the subscribers to the capital stock of the corporation who paid therefor by a conveyance of the patent rights, as contemplated in the preliminary contract, became thereby owners of 200 shares of such stock, fully paid, the same in all respects as if $20,000 in cash had been rendered therefor; that the attempted reduction in the authorized capital stock to $16,000, divided into 160 shares of $100, each, was in violation of the rights of the holders of full paid stock who did not consent thereto, was contrary to law, and ought to be declared void and canceled of record; that judgment should be rendered accordingly with costs in favor of plaintiffs; and that the judgment sought in favor of the corporation against the debtors on stock subscriptions should be denied without prejudice of the right of the corporation to proceed independently for the collection of such indebtedness. Judgment was rendered accordingly.

Mr. M. T. Halphide for respondents.

Marshall, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

According to the facts found as indicated,—and they are not only well supported by the evidence but in the main are admitted by the answer,—the dominating spirits among appellants conceived that by the preliminary contract mentioned in the statement they got the worst of the bargain in agreeing to contribute $20,000 in money against, as an equivalent, the patent right, to make up a capital of $40,000, in a corporation organized to acquire and use in all legitimate ways such patent right, and sought by means of the statutory authority to reduce capital stock in such an organization to even up with the respondents, to accomplish that under the guise of statutory authority, by arbitrarily extinguishing their liability for $12,000, upon their capital-stock subscriptions, and canceling a corresponding amount of full-paid stock as if the same had no consideration to support it. By that it was supposed the $20,000, agreed in the preliminary contract, and in effect in the corporate organization, to be contributed as an equivalent for the patent right, would be reduced to $8,000, regardless of the wishes of respondents.

While appellants' claim, as regards advantage having been taken of them in the preliminary contract and partial execution thereof, is referred to upon appeal as explaining, and perhaps palliating, the proceedings to enable them to obtain without the aid of any court, and without the consent of the other stockholders, a satisfactory measure of redress for their supposed misfortune, counsel do not venture to suggest that such claim, if it were in all respects well founded, warranted using, as they did, the statutory authority relating to the reduction of capital stock against the protest of respondents.

It must be conceded that liability to pay a subscription indebtedness for stock in a corporation can only be rightfully satisfied as to a stockholder not consenting, by payment according to the subscription contract. No reduction of authorized and subscribed for capital stock can be accomplished except by voluntary surrender by subscribers pro rata, or some method which will not prefer one stockholder over another. Corporate power in that regard does not authorize an arbitrary preferential cancelation of stock, or cancelation of a subscription liability for stock without in some proper manner treating all stockholders with like favor. The idea with which appellants started out, that they could effectively use their superior voting power to obtain an advantage over the holders of full-paid stock, has no support in reason or in law, and, as we understand it, no one connected with the case ventures to claim to the contrary. If the majority of stockholders of a corporation could so treat its assets, and be immune from judicial interference in respect thereto, there would be no protection for the minority but the conscience of the majority, which would be a very uncertain reliance. The law in respect to the matter is well stated in Purdy's Beach on Private Corporations at § 195, thus: "A statute which authorizes a corporation at any meeting called for the purpose, to reduce its capital stock and the number of shares therein, does not empower it to effect a reduction by purchasing shares of a particular subscriber. Unless such a course is adopted as will work exact and even justice to all owners of stock, the statute is inoperative. When the purpose is to reduce the capital stock by purchase of shares, they may not be purchased from any particular stockholder alone without consent of all; but each stockholder is entitled to share pro rata, with all the others, in his surrender of shares for such purchase. No stockholder can be forced to sell his shares for reduction of the capital stock. Therefore when the transaction would operate for the relief and benefit of those from whom the stock is purchased, and would increase the liability of the remaining stockholders, it is invalid."

It is argued on behalf of appellants that, conceding they could not rightfully force an adjustment of their differences with respondents in the manner attempted, the statute gave them the right to reduce the authorized capital stock, which was the only thing really accomplished by the proceedings annulled by the judgment; that the real wrong from the respondents' standpoint was, or will be, effected, if at all, by executing the purpose of the resolution; that, so far as appellants had a right to do what was done, their motives in the matter cannot be judicially inquired into, and their acts condemned upon the ground that such motives were bad. Counsel invoke the rule that the motives of members of a legislative body in doing what they may rightfully do are not a subject for judicial inquiry. That at least, has its limitations as regards private corporations, if it has any application thereto at all. Dill. Mun. Corp. 4th ed. § 311.

We do not intend by the foregoing to suggest that a court of equity can supervise or revise corporate action within the scope of the corporate power where there is no bad faith in the matter; only error of judgment. In such matters the members of a corporation, as to authority lodged with them, and the board of directors in the field where that is the governing body, are supreme within the limits of honest administration and of the boundaries of discretion. But where the act of either such body, though lawful in itself, is designed to accomplish some illegitimate object,—the mainspring of the transaction is some ulterior motive,—and the result, if permitted to operate, will be injurious to the corporation or members not concerned in the transaction, such a member may successfully invoke equity jurisdiction for protection of the corporation where the proper officers will not do it. That cannot be too strongly impressed upon the minds of those in control of corporate affairs. Wildes v. Rural Homestead Co. 53 N. J. Eq. 425, 32 Atl. 676; Berger v. United States Steel Corp. 63 N. J. Eq. 506, 53 Atl. 14; Robotham v. Prudential Ins. Co. 64 N. J. Eq. 673, 53 Atl. 842.

In the last case cited it was distinctly held that the purpose of the governing body of a corporation in determining upon a particular line of action may of itself render such action invalid and subject to annulment at the suit of stockholders. This language was used in the opinion: "It is well settled that an act may be intra vires or ultra vires, according to the purpose which the directors have in view in doing it. The expenditure of the money of a corporation by its directors is, per se, often a neutral act; whether such expenditure is intra vires or ultra vires must, in large numbers of instances, depend upon the pur-

There was no need in this case to go very far to discover that the purpose of appellants in passing the resolution complained of was entirely illegitimate. Such purpose clearly appeared by the records of the corporation. They showed that, while the formal resolution voted on and certified to be filed as required by law did not disclose its real object, an amendment thereto covering the matter was in due form adopted, and was in reality made a part thereof. The resolution so amended was acted upon the first time the matter was up for consideration, and lost for want of the requisite two-thirds vote in favor thereof. The same resolution as amended was reconsidered and passed on the second occasion of the matter being taken up. If there was any question as to the scope of the amended resolution, it would be solved by the subsequent resolution instructing the board of directors how to carry out the reduction of stock.

So it comes down to this: The authority to reduce authorized capital stock was in form exercised for the wrongful purpose of creating a basis for favoring the majority of stockholders at the expense of the minority. In short, a statutory authority given for one purpose was abused by being used for another and clearly illegitimate purpose. The doctrine advanced, that if stockholders, by combining a ruling majority, exercise a corporate power with bad motives to the pecuniary loss or prejudice of the corporation and outside stockholders, only the mere consequences in that regard, not the wrongful use of power, is open to judicial investigation and redress, has no foundation here. Abuse of power to the direct or indirect injury of stockholders in a corporation, as well as usurpation of power with like effect, as we have seen, is a subject that may be dealt with by courts and by the remedies which equity affords when there is no other remedy, or no other remedy which is reasonably effective. It would be difficult to conceive a plainer, more wrongful, obviously fraudulent abuse of corporate power than the one under consideration. The authority to reduce capital stock is limited by its purposes. When it is exercised clearly for an illegitimate purpose, especially when such purpose is fraudulent, as in this case, the act is void. In Niagara Shoe Co. v. Tobey, 71 Ill. App. 250, it was held that a statute like ours contemplates a reduction of capital stock only on a basis which deals with all stockholders alike, and that any other attempted reduction is void as to a nonconsenting stockholder. Currier v. Lebanon Slate Co. 56 N. H. 262, is to the same effect.

We view the resolution, in form reducing the capital stock as the statute authorizes, the same as if the amendment referred to, and the real purpose as plainly indicated by the corporate proceedings had both before and after such passage, were embodied therein by express words. It is quite clear that, in the absence of such purpose, such passage would not have occurred. The elements in the transaction are inseparable. Each was a part of a single scheme conceived by appellants to benefit themselves at the expense of the corporation and of the respondents. If they had any claim against the first parties to the preliminary contract, the way attempted was not the proper one to enforce it. They directly and indirectly wronged respondents and wronged the corporation beyond the power of redress, efficiently, at the suit of respondents by any other remedy than that which a court of equity affords. Appellants, through a board of directors composed mostly of their own number, were in control of the corporation. They insisted upon carrying out their scheme of so converting its assets to their own use as to put themselves on the ground floor, so to speak, as they viewed the matter, with holders of full-paid stock. Presumably, before this action was commenced they in form took to themselves the corporate assets represented by their subscription liabilities. The directors refused to recognize the holders of full-paid stock to any greater extent than 40 per cent of their holdings. They insisted that they were justified in so doing by the resolution reducing authorized capital stock. There was no reason whatever to expect that the wrongs committed would be remedied by those in control of the corporate affairs. All of respondents were united in interests and similarly affected. The situation was one which in its entire scope could only be dealt with in an equitable action. There may not be any precedent for just such an action as this, and none is necessary to sustain it. Since it is clearly within the principles of equity jurisprudence, that is sufficient.

As to the form of the relief, it may be that some other would have been more orderly, but, as at present advised, it would seem that, since the proceedings were mere steps in the execution of a wrongful purpose to change the relations of one class of stockholders of the corporation to their advantage, and those of another to their disadvantage, and so not to any extent within the statute relating to the reduction of authorized corporate stock, there could not be a more direct way to remedy the mischief than by judicially declaring the whole of such proceedings void, and directing their cancellation of record. In any event, the remedy which the court awarded was efficient. Appellants were not prejudiced by any mere matter of form.

The judgment is affirmed on both appeals.

WISCONSIN SUPREME COURT.

GEORGE R. BEST, Respt.,
v.

MARY THORNCRAFT GUNTHER et al.,
Appts.

(.... Wis.)

Power of sale—record—notice of revocation.
The common-law rule that notice to the agent is necessary to revoke a power of attorney to convey real estate is not abrogated by a statute which merely authorizes the recording of such a power, and provides that, if recorded, the instrument of revocation must also be recorded to be valid; and, therefore, merely recording a revocation of a recorded power without notice to the agent does not revoke his authority.

(Cassoday, Ch. J., dissents.)

(June 23, 1905.)

A PPEAL by defendants Mary Thorncraft Gunther et al., from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Waukesha County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to foreclose a mortgage. Affirmed.

Statement by Siebecker, J.:

An action to foreclose a mortgage upon real estate. It appears that the defendants, Arthur W. Gunther and Mary T. Gunther, are husband and wife, and that at the time in question Mary T. Gunther owned the real estate involved in this litigation. There is

Case Note.—It is unquestioned that, at common law, notice to the agent is essential to the revocation of a power of attorney. Story, Agency, 9th ed. § 470; 1 Clark & Skyles, Agency, p. 417.

The decision in BEST v. GUNTHER is important in the states which have adopted statutes requiring the recording of instruments revoking powers of attorney. This is especially true in view of the fact of its possible conflict with the broad doctrine of Arnold v. Stevenson, 2 Nev. 234, which has heretofore been cited by text-books and encyclopedias as representing the law upon the proposition that notice need not be given where the revocation has been recorded under a statute requiring the same.

The court attempted to distinguish the Arnold Case on the ground of difference in the statutes of the two states, and stated that the Nevada statute "expressly provides that the recording of the instrument shall 'impart notice to all persons of the contents thereof.'"

no dispute but that on November 21, 1898, she executed a general power of attorney to sell, to convey, and to mortgage her real estate, in favor of her husband, Arthur W. Gunther; giving and granting to him as full power and authority to do everything necessary for such purposes as she could exercise if she acted personally in the matter. This power was executed in the form to entitle it to record, and, on December 1, 1898, it was recorded in the office of the register of deeds for Waukesha county, where the real estate affected is situated. It also appears that on August 11, 1899, the defendant Mary T. Gunther executed an instrument purporting to revoke the power of attorney granted to her husband, and on the following day she caused the same to be recorded in the office of the register of deeds for Waukesha county. Arthur W. Gunther was at no time personally notified that his wife had revoked the agency created by the power of attorney, nor was the plaintiff in any manner informed, before the mortgage in question was executed, that she had revoked or intended to revoke it. On November 14, 1900, the defendant Arthur W. Gunther, as attorney of Mary T. Gunther, and in his proper person, made and executed and delivered to the plaintiff a note and mortgage to secure the sum of $2,000 with interest, which mortgage covered the real estate of Mary T. Gunther in Waukesha county, and was recorded in such county November 16, 1900. There was default in payment of interest and the principal under the terms of the note and mortgage, and this action was commenced. The court awarded judgment to plaintiff for the amount due, with costs and solicitor's fees, and directed a sale of the premises covered by the mortgage in

An examination of the Arnold Case hardly bears out this statement, as the provision declaring that the recording of certain instruments shall constitute notice does not expressly refer to instruments revoking powers of attorney; but such instruments were considered by the court as coming within the general language of the provision declaring that the recording of any instrument in writing, "whereby any real estate may be affected," shall "impart notice to all persons of the contents thereof."

After thus considering the Nevada statute, the court, in the Arnold Case, makes the suggestion that there is no necessity for recording the instrument unless it is to operate as a notice of its contents; and says: "The judge below concludes that the deposit for record is an act to be done in addition to those required by the common law. We think not. Unless the intention of the legislature be obvious, no statute should be so construed as to make it impose onerous duties upon individuals, in addition to those

Other facts of record in the case are not material to the disposition of rights of the parties on this appeal, and need not be stated. This is an appeal from the judgment.

Messrs. Frame & Blackstone and Ritscher, Montgomery, & Hart, for appellants:

Argument for rehearing.

Present necessity and custom, if not statute, have absolutely done away with the common-law rule requiring notice to the agent.

This power of attorney is an instrument whereby the title to real estate may be affected.

Rev. Stat. 1898, § 2242; Arnold v. Stevenson, 2 Nev. 234.

Subsequent purchasers in good faith for value are bound to take notice of all instruments, properly of record, affecting the title to the real estate they are dealing with.

required by the common law, unless it be for the purpose of curing some defect, or affording some remedy, in which the common law is deficient. The law upon this subject was complete and perfect, so far as the agent and the public were concerned, before the passage of the act. It threw every safeguard around the public, and gave the agent ample protection from any negligence or imposition on the part of the principal. The only material defect which seemed to exist in the common law was the failure to give the principal a speedy and convenient means of revoking the power of his agent." The court further argued that, unless the recording of the instrument operated as a notice, the statute required "a superfluous and useless act to be done; for we can see no other object to be accomplished by it." The court, having thus discussed the effect of the recordation upon third parties, takes up the question of its effect as a notice to the agent; and says: "Though the intention of the legislature is 1 L.R.A. Siebeck, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The question presented is whether the re-not very clearly expressed, we conclude that the revocation is complete when the instrument of revocation is filed for record, and that no actual notice to the agent is required." The court also said that, inasmuch as the statute provides that the power of attorney shall not be deemed revoked by any act of the party by whom it was executed, until the instrument containing such revocation shall be recorded, the inevitable conclusion from the language is that, when the instrument of revocation is so filed, the revocation shall be deemed complete; and that, as all persons dealing with the agent after the instrument of revocation has been filed for record are chargeable with notice of the fact, it could see no great necessity for notifying the agent.

The Nevada case does not appear to have been cited up to this time in any other case, except in BEST v. GUNTHER; and, so far as can be found after considerable search, these are the only cases directly on the question.

cording of the instrument signed by Mary T. Gunther, purporting to revoke the power granted to her husband to convey her lands, operated to terminate this agency. The common law required that a revocation of such authority be brought to the personal notice of the agent. Kelly v. Phelps, 57 Wis. 425, 15 N. W. 385; Walker v. Denison, 86 Ill. 142. It is not claimed that, at the time he executed the mortgage here involved, Arthur W. Gunther had been actually notified that his authority under the letter of attorney had been revoked; nor is it claimed that plaintiff had actual notice that the defendant Mary T. Gunther had taken any steps to revoke it. It is urged that the statutes providing that letters of attorney and other instruments containing a power to convey lands as agents or attorneys for the owner may be recorded in the office of the register of deeds of the county wherein the lands to which they relate are situated, and that the authority granted by such a letter or other instrument shall not be deemed revoked by any act of the party who executed it, unless the instrument containing such revocation be also recorded in the same office, are an abrogation of the common-law rule; and that the recording of an instrument of revocation in itself effects a termination of the agency, and serves as a notice to all persons. This contention is, however, not justified by the terms of the recording statutes. The extent to which the recording of instruments, under the statutes, shall be deemed notice thereof, is specified by these enactments, and they contain no provisions declaring, expressly or by implication, that the recording of these instruments shall be deemed an abrogation of the common-law rule which requires the giving of notice to terminate the authority granted by them. Section 2242, Rev. Stat. 1898, defining what the term "conveyance," as affecting title to land, shall be construed to embrace, clearly indicates that a letter of attorney and an instrument revoking the authority conferred thereby are not included within the terms used in this chapter, and they can therefore not be affected by the provisions of the statutes which declare the effect of recording conveyances of real estate, and which were enacted for the purpose of protecting subsequent purchasers in good faith and for a valuable consideration. Fallass v. Pierce, 30 Wis. 443; Gilbert v. Jess, 31 Wis. 110; Pringle v. Dunn, 37 Wis. 449, 19 Am. Rep. 772; Girardin v. Lampe, 58 Wis. 267, 16 N. W. 614; Edwards v. McKernan, 55 Mich. 520, 22 N. W. 20; Bailey v. Galpin, 40 Minn. 319, 41 N. W. 1054.

The context of §§ 2237, 2246, Rev. Stat. 1898, providing that letters of attorney and other instruments containing powers to convey lands may be recorded as therein prescribed, and, when so recorded, shall not be deemed revoked by any act of the party who executed them, unless the instrument of revocation be also recorded in the same office, contains nothing to the effect that such recording is necessary to give them validity; and it is not prescribed that the recording of the instrument of revocation shall take the place of the actual notice to the agent required at common law to terminate it. The case of Arnold v. Stevenson, 2 Nev. 234, is relied on as authority to the effect that the recording of the instrument of revocation operates, under the statute, as a notice to the agent and all persons dealing with him that the authority is terminated. The decision cannot serve as an authority for the construction of our statute, for the reason that the Nevada statute on the subject expressly provides that the recording of the instrument shall "impart notice to all persons of the contents thereof," and, as above stated, our statute contains no such provision. It is manifest that, since the statute does not operate to give such notice, it is necessary to comply with all the requirements of the common law for revoking the authority granted by a letter of attorney or other instrument containing a power to convey land; but, when such instrument has been recorded, a common-law revocation shall be ineffectual unless the instrument of revocation shall also be recorded in the same office. Applying this rule to the facts of the case, we must hold that Arthur W. Gunther had power to execute the mortgage which plaintiff now seeks to foreclose, and that the judgment appealed from was properly awarded. No other question arises for consideration.

Judgment affirmed.

A petition for rehearing having been filed, the following Per Curiam order was entered on October 3, 1905:

Rehearing denied, with $25 costs.

Cassoday, Ch. J., dissenting:

I disagreed with the decision of this case at the time it was made, but, through some inadvertence, I failed to state the fact at the time the decision was announced. On this motion, I feel at liberty to briefly and respectfully state my views of the law applicable to the undisputed facts of this case. The question presented is whether the mortgage made and recorded November 16, 1900, and here sought to be foreclosed, is valid and binding as a security, although never executed by the defendant Mary T. Gunther, the sole owner of the land described in the mortgage, nor by anyone else with her consent or knowledge. True, the mortgage purports to have been executed by Arthur W. Gunther, assuming to act for and in the name of Mary T. Gunther, under and by virtue of a power of attorney executed by her and recorded about two years prior to the making of the mortgage. But within a year after the execution of that power of attorney, and about fifteen months prior to the making of the mortgage, Mary T. Gunther, under her hand and seal, duly executed a written instrument in terms expressly revoking, counterminding, annulling, and making void that power of attorney; and the same was duly acknowledged, witnessed, and recorded August 12, 1899. The contention is, and, as I understand, the court held, that such revocation was ineffectual and void, for the reason that the fact of such revocation was not "brought to the personal notice of the agent." Two cases are cited in support of such contention: Kelly v. Phelps, 57 Wis. 425, 426, 15 N. W. 385; Walker v. Denison, 86 Ill. 142-145. In the first of these cases the agent sued his principal for commissions on the sale of personal property by him, but which the principal refused to deliver. No such controversy is here presented. But the only object of such notice to the agent is to protect the agent. It is no protection to third persons dealing in good faith with the agent and without notice. 1 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 1220. In the other case, a patentee, after having given a power of attorney to Walker and another to sell the letters patent in certain territory named, sold and assigned all his interest therein to other parties, "who were aware at the time of the existence of the power of attorney," and two months thereafter the attorney under such power sold and conveyed the same interest in the patent to Denison, and took from him therefor a deed of the premises therein described; and the action was to set aside that deed, and the same was decreed by the trial court as prayed, and the judgment was affirmed by the supreme court, which held that the power was not coupled with an interest; "that the principal might revoke the power at any time, leaving the attorney to his action for breach of the covenant not to revoke;" that "when the principal, who has given a power of attorney to sell, himself sells and disposes of the thing before a sale by the agent, this will be a revocation of the power, by operation of law; . . . that, as the sale of the territory by the agent was without right and authority, and the conveyance of the land was made without consideration, a court of equity would require the agent and his wife, to whom the deed was made, to reconvey the land to the grantor." That case seems to be in line with 1 L.R.A. (N.S.) my contention. See Mechem on Agency, §§ 219, 220.

Obviously the power of attorney in question was not coupled with an interest, as indicated in the case last mentioned. The statute prescribes how all conveyances of lands within this state or any interest therein should be executed. Rev. Stat. 1898, § 2216. Mrs. Gunther was expressly authorized by the statute to "convey her lands in this state, or any interest therein," by her "separate deed." Rev. Stat. 1898, § 2221. So the statute authorized her "by letter of attorney, executed and acknowledged in the manner" therein prescribed, to authorize her attorney to convey any interest in any of her real estate. Rev. Stat. 1898, § 2223. So it authorized her alone to execute and acknowledge "every such conveyance and letter of attorney" of or relating to her real estate. Rev. Stat. 1898, § 2224.

The important question is whether, prior to receiving the note and mortgage, the plaintiff had constructive notice that the power of attorney under which Arthur W. Gunther assumed to act in making them had in fact been revoked. The statute provides that "a letter of attorney or other instrument containing a power to convey lands as agent or attorney for the owner thereof when executed, acknowledged, and proved" as therein prescribed, may be "recorded." Rev. Stat. 1898, § 2237. Another section of the Revised Statutes provides that "no letter of attorney or other instrument containing a power to convey lands, when executed, acknowledged, and recorded as provided in this chapter, shall be deemed to be revoked by any act of the party by whom it was executed, unless the instrument containing such revocation be also recorded in the same office in which the instrument containing the power was recorded." Rev. Stat. 1898, § 2246. The obvious meaning of this section, to my mind, is that such power of attorney "shall be deemed to be revoked" in case "such revocation be also recorded in the same office in which" the power of attorney is recorded. But it is said that "a letter of attorney and an instrument revoking the authority conferred thereby are not included within the terms used in" chapter 100 of the Revised Statutes. The statute declares that "every conveyance of real estate within this state, . . . which shall not be recorded as provided by law, shall be void as against any subsequent purchaser in good faith and for a valuable consideration of the same real estate or any portion thereof whose conveyance shall first be duly recorded." Rev. Stat. 1898, § 2241. Another section declares that "the term 'conveyance,' as used in this chapter, shall be construed to embrace every instrument in writing by which any estate or interest in real estate is created, aliened, mortgaged, or assigned, or by which the title to any real estate may be affected in law or equity except wills and leases for a term not exceeding three years." Rev. Stat. 1898, § 2242. "Certainly the power of attorney was an "instrument in writing by which" an interest in real estate was authorized to be "created, alienated, mortgaged, or assigned, or by which the title to" Mrs. Gunther's real estate might "be affected in law or equity." The several sections cited are all contained in the chapter entitled "Of Alienation by Deed, and the Proof and Recording of Instruments Affecting Title to Land." "Authority to execute a deed must be given by deed." 2 Jones, Real Prop. in Conveyancing, § 1021. A mortgage thus purporting to be executed by a stranger to the title is on its face a mere nullity. Had the mortgage in question been so executed by Arthur W. Gunther before the power of attorney had been revoked, still it would have been valid only by virtue of the power of attorney. The power of attorney, therefore, would have been an essential part of such conveyance by way of mortgage. The sole object of the power of attorney was to affect the title to land; and hence, as indicated, the statutes fully provide for its being executed and recorded in the chapter "affecting title to land." The same is true of the revocation of the power, as appears from the statutes quoted.

The only object of recording such instruments is to notify persons subsequently dealing with the attorney or agent as to the extent of his power or want of power. Thus it was held in New York at an early day, under similar statutes to the sections here involved, that "a party dealing with an agent or attorney is bound to know the extent of his power, and is bound to inspect the instrument conferring it,—especially where there is but one transaction between them. . . . If, however, a power to convey is recorded, an instrument of revocation also recorded in the same county appears to be sufficient notice." Williams v. Birbeck, 1 Hoffm. Ch. 360. To the same effect is the decision in Arnold v. Stevenson, 2 Nev. 234, 239, where that case is cited approvingly. True, the statute of Nevada is slightly different from ours in its wording; but in my judgment it is the same in substance. The text writers seem to agree that the recording of such revocation pursuant to the requirement of a statute is constructive notice to all persons subsequently dealing with the attorney or agent. Thus, it is said by Mr. Jones that "it is provided by statute in nearly all the states, 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

though in somewhat varying terms, that a power of attorney to convey real estate must be executed, acknowledged, and recorded in the same manner that conveyances are. In several states a power of attorney to convey is not deemed to be revoked, until the instrument of revocation is deposited for record in the same office in which the power is recorded." 2 Jones, Real Prop. in Conveyancing, § 1022, citing statutes in many states. Another writer says that "in some states the revocation of a power is required to be deposited for record in the proper office; and, where the revocation is recorded according to the statute, the authority is terminated, although the agent has no actual notice." 1 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 1221. Referring to such statutes, Mr. Mechem says that "these statutes commonly provide, also, that any instrument, revoking such a power shall or may be recorded in the same office, and make such recording in either case constructive notice of the facts which the record discloses. Where such statutes prevail, the recording of a revocation of the agent's authority is notice to all who may subsequently have occasion to deal with him; and, where the statute is imperative, the revocation cannot be given effect in any other way, unless by express notice." Mechem, Agency, § 229. The rule seems to be universal that "the death of the principal terminates a power to convey, and a deed made by the attorney after such death is void, even if he was ignorant of the fact of the death; though, if the power be coupled with an interest, it survives, and may be executed after the death of the donor." 2 Jones Real Prop. in Conveyancing, § 1037.

Case Note.—The question, When may a license fee be imposed upon a telegraph or telephone company authorized by statute to use streets?—has arisen in relation to the act of Congress of July 24, 1866 (U. shall have the right to construct, maintain, and operate lines of telegraph over and along any of the military or post roads of the United States which have been, or may hereafter be, declared such by act of Congress. By Rev. Stat. § 3964, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 2707, all letter-carrier routes, and, by the act of March 1, 1884, all public roads and highways, are declared to be post roads.

It was held in St. Louis v. Western U. Tele. Co. 148 U. S. 92, 37 L. ed. 380, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 485, that such statute does not convey an unrestricted right to appropriate public property, but only a right to be exercised in subordination to public as well as private rights; and, hence, does not preclude the exaction of a reasonable sum per annum for every pole erected in the streets, for the privilege of using them.

This case is followed in Postal Tele. Cable Co. v. Baltimore, 79 Md. 502, 24 L. R. A. 161, 29 Atl. 819, Affirmed in 156 U. S. 210, 39 L. ed. 399, 15 Sup. Ct. Rep. 356.

In Western U. Tele. Co. v. Wakefield (Neb.) 95 N. W. 659, it was held that said act of Congress does not preclude the imposition of a reasonable occupation tax on telegraph companies.

Nor the exaction, under the police power, of a reasonable fee for each pole and mile of wire, to cover the expense of municipal regulation and inspection. Philadelphia v. Postal Tele. Cable Co. 67 Hun, 21, 21 N. Y. Supp. 556.

But, where permission to occupy streets is granted to telegraph and telephone companies by state legislation, a different question is presented, for, as is said in Dillon, Mun. Corp. 4th ed. § 656, "the legislature of the state represents the public at large, and has, in the absence of special constitutional restraint, and subject (according to the weight of more recent judicial opinion) to the property rights and easements of the abutting owner, full and paramount authority over all public ways and public places." It necessarily follows that, when the state has granted away the right of the public, its municipal subdivisions cannot impose a license tax for revenue purposes.

Stat. 1898; and that said plaintiff was so organized for the purpose of conducting a telephone business and maintaining telephone lines and exchanges, and in order to furnish lines of telephone communication to the public throughout the state of Wisconsin and other states. That, prior to the organization of plaintiff, the legislature of the state of Miss. 910, 29 L. R. A. 770, 18 So. 84, it was held that a municipal corporation, the power of which over its streets is derived solely from the legislature, cannot impose a rental for their use upon telegraph companies permitted by statute to occupy streets without compensation to the state or to the cities. But the court adds: "We are not to be understood as denying or restricting the power of the city to regulate the use of its streets within legal limits."

In Pennsylvania, where a state statute authorizes telegraph companies "to construct lines of telegraph along or upon any of the public roads, streets, or highways, by the erection of the necessary fixtures," it has been held that a reasonable license fee may be imposed by municipalities, under the police power, to cover the expense of supervision necessary to the safety of the highways. *Chester v. Whether the liability for damage to which the city is subjected by the presence of poles and wires in the streets, as well as the expense incident to the issuing of the license and to inspection and regulation, may be taken into account in determining the reasonableness of a license tax imposed under the municipal police powers, is a question on which the state and Federal decisions are in conflict. That it may be considered is affirmed in Western U. Tele. Co. v. Philadelphia, and Taylor v. Postal Tele. Cable Co. supra; and denied in Philadelphia v. Western U. Tele. Co. 40 Fed. 615, and Postal Tele. Cable Co. v. Taylor, 192 U. S. 64, 48 L. ed. 342, 24 Sup. Ct. Rep. 208.

Wisconsin, in prescribing the powers of telephone corporations, enacted a law which was re-enacted by § 1778, Rev. Stat. 1898, which was held by this court, in Wisconsin Teleph. Co. v. Oshkosh, 62 Wis. 32, 21 N. W. 828, to apply to the plaintiff corporation; and that said statute applies to city streets, and authorizes a Wisconsin telephone company, including plaintiff, to construct and maintain its telephone lines along the streets of Wisconsin cities without applying for or obtaining from any city any franchise; and that no such city has the power to add to or detract from such legislative grant; and that the police power vested in said city to regulate its streets can be exercised only in harmony with said franchise. That, under said power conferred upon plaintiff, it established in defendant, city of Milwaukee, a telephone exchange, which was a part of its system of telephone lines and exchanges throughout the state of Wisconsin, and connected with other exchanges throughout the United States. That as a part of plaintiff's system, and necessary thereto, it has erected poles in defendant city along the streets and alleys thereof, and placed cross-arms, so called, thereon for the purpose of stringing wires by means of which plaintiff is enabled to carry on its said business. That the poles within the limits of said defendant city number 6,900, and plaintiff intends to constantly increase said number as the demand requires, and that most of said poles bear cross-arms, ranging in number from one to eight. That plaintiff did not construct and operate, and is not maintaining and operating, its said system within said city pursuant to any grant of authority or permission by defendant city, but constructed, maintained, and operated, and continues so to do, its telephone system, in said city by virtue of the authority conferred upon it by statute similar to and re-enacted in §§ 1771 and 1778, Rev. Stat. 1898, and without objection on the part of the defendant. That the poles and lines of plaintiff in said city are so located, constructed, and maintained as not to interfere with public travel, and in no way affect public safety or convenience, and that plaintiff has at all times complied with the requirements of law regarding the location, maintenance, and operation of its poles and lines, and that its system in said city is safe and convenient for public use. That its property is not assessed and taxed the same as the property of individuals, but by legislative enactment has been exempted from taxation, but required, in lieu of taxation, to pay a license fee prescribed by § 1222a, Rev. Stat. 1898. That it has at all times paid said license fee provided by law. That on February 9, 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

1904, defendant adopted an ordinance which was thereafter approved and published, and which defendant claims has gone into force as a valid ordinance. The ordinance is entitled "An Ordinance Regulating the Construction and Maintenance of Poles and Their Attachments in or upon Any Street, Lane, Alley, Sidewalk, or City Property within the Limits of the City of Milwaukee, Wisconsin, for Telegraph, Telephone, Electric Light, or Other Poles in Said City, except Poles Owned by the Municipality Itself, and Providing a Penalty for the Violation Thereof." Sections 1 and 2 of said ordinance provide that such poles shall be designated by the name of such owners or lessees, and each pole shall have a distinct number not more than 10 feet from the grade of the street, and that such poles shall be placed, replaced, erected, and maintained only at such points as shall be designated by the board of public works; and that such board shall keep in its office an accurate record of the location of each pole as designated and permitted by it; and that such board at least once a year shall cause a thorough count, inspection, and record of the poles and cross-arms, and, if any shall be found defective, unsuitable, or unsound, it shall notify the owners or lessees to forthwith replace the same; and it shall be the duty of such owners or lessees to replace such defective, unsuitable, or unsound pole or cross-arm within forty-eight hours. Sections 3, 4, and 5 are as follows:

"Sec. 3. It shall be the duty of all such owners or lessees, on or before the first Monday in June, A. D. 1904, and annually thereafter, to apply in writing to the city clerk for a license to maintain for the ensuing year the poles and cross-arms then erected, specifying the poles to be maintained by their designation, as provided for in this ordinance, together with the number of cross-arms thereon; and the city clerk shall issue such license to such applicant upon presentation of a receipt from the city treasurer acknowledging payment to him, for the use of the city of Milwaukee, of $1 for each and every pole authorized to be maintained thereby, including one cross-arm, if any, thereon, and 10 cents for each additional cross-arm. Said license shall authorize the maintenance of the poles and cross-arms designated in such application only, for the period of one year, to be computed from the first Monday in June of each and every year, and no longer.

"Sec. 4. All revenues derived from licenses under this ordinance shall be credited to and become part of the general city fund.

"Sec. 5. Any person, firm, company, or corporation who shall violate any provisions of this ordinance shall be subject to a penalty of $100 for each and every offense, to be sued for and recovered in the manner now provided by law for the recovery of like penalties; and the erection or maintenance of any single pole or cross-arm in violation of the provisions of this ordinance shall constitute a distinct and separate offense thereunder."

That the charter of the city of Milwaukee, chap. 184, p. 311, laws of Wisconsin for 1874, and acts amendatory thereof, confer certain powers upon defendant respecting regulation of the streets in said defendant city, but that said streets belong to the public under the Constitution and laws of the state of Wisconsin. That the state has granted, by act of the legislature, to plaintiff, the franchise and right to use such streets under § 1778, Rev. Stat. 1898, and that said defendant has no police control over its streets, except the police control granted by the provisions of its charter. That the police power granted to defendant by its charter confers no authority to pass and enforce the ordinance. That the exaction of the license fee in said ordinance is not authorized by law, nor by the provisions of chap. 184, p. 311, Laws 1874, and acts amendatory thereof. That said ordinance is void as being in contravention of the Constitution of the United States and of the Constitution of the state of Wisconsin. That said license fee specified in said ordinance is a tax, and that said ordinance was not passed with a view of regulating plaintiff's business or property, but for revenue purposes only; and that said license fee is arbitrary and unreasonable in amount. The complaint further alleges that the defendant threatens to enforce the ordinance, which will cause a multiplicity of suits and irreparable injury to plaintiff; and prays that defendant be enjoined, and that the ordinance be declared null and void.

The answer admits the material allegations of the complaint, but denies that the poles are so located and maintained as not to affect public safety, denies that the ordinance was passed without authority of law, and that the exaction of the license fee was not authorized, and that the ordinance was invalid or contravenes any provision of the Federal or state Constitution, and denies that the license fee of $1 a pole is unreasonable.

Plaintiff demurred to the answer for want of facts sufficient to constitute a defense.

Messrs. Miller, Noyes, & Miller, for appellant:

The ordinance exacts a monetary consideration of plaintiff for the privilege of maintaining its poles and lines and conducting its business.

Kerwin, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The questions presented here upon the facts admitted by the demurrer are thus stated by respondent: "First. Has the city authority to exact a license such as is provided for in the ordinance, the enforcement of which the appellant seeks to enjoin? Second. Does the ordinance in question contravene the 14th Amendment of the Federal Constitution, and similar provisions of the Wisconsin state Constitution?"

The first proposition stated by counsel practically embraces the controversy before us, and we shall proceed to consider the right of the defendant city to exact the license fee. It is apparent from the argument of counsel for respondent, as well as from 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

the authorities cited, that the ordinance is sought to be upheld under power of the defendant city to license the plaintiff and exact the license fee provided for in the ordinance. It is, however, contended that the license fee is not exacted for any right or privilege conferred upon the plaintiff, but simply as a police regulation; and reference is made to the provisions of the city charter conferring power to prevent the encumbering of streets, lanes, and alleys, and giving the city the right to control and regulate the streets, alleys, and public grounds of said city; and, under these provisions, as well as under the general police power, it is contended that the ordinance is in the nature of a police regulation. No power is conferred upon the defendant under its charter, or by any law of this state, to grant to the plaintiff the privilege of constructing, maintaining, or operating its telephone lines upon the streets of defendant city. This authority is specifically conferred by the legislature of this state, subject only to the provision that it shall not "obstruct or incommode the public use of any road, highway, bridge, stream, or body of water." No authority is conferred upon the defendant to impose any other condition upon the plaintiff, except such as it may lawfully impose under its power to control and regulate the streets, alleys, and public grounds, and prevent the encumbering thereof, and its general police powers. Beyond this it has neither the right to confer any privilege upon the plaintiff in the use and occupation of streets, nor to impose conditions. State ex rel. Wisconsin Teleph. Co. v. Sheboygan, 111 Wis. 23, 86 N. W. 657; Marshfield v. Wisconsin Teleph. Co. 102 Wis. 604, 44 L. R. A. 565, 78 N. W. 735. It is very clear that the defendant had no power to exact a license fee from the plaintiff for the privilege of constructing, maintaining, or operating its telephone lines upon the streets of defendant city. Wisconsin Teleph. Co. v. Oshkosh, 62 Wis. 32, 21 N. W. 828. And it is conceded on the part of the respondent that the ordinance can only be sustained on the theory of a police regulation. It will be seen, however, that the cases cited by respondent are cases where the license fee was upheld upon the ground that the municipality had the right to grant some privilege to the company licensed, and for the granting of which a license fee was sustained, or where the purpose of the ordinance was to regulate, and not to license. Counsel for respondent frankly concedes that the city has no franchise to grant to the plaintiff and no power to confer under which the poles and wires may be maintained in streets; but contends that, under the broad power of regulation conferred by the legislature and the police power, it has the right to make and enforce reasonable regulations for the protection and safety of its citizens; and quotes at length from Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Philadelphia, 9 Sadler (Pa.) 300, 22 W. N. C. 39, 12 Atl. 144; but the case is not in point upon the proposition asserted, for the reason that the city of Philadelphia had the power to grant to the company the right to occupy the streets, and impose upon the company such conditions and regulations as the municipal authorities might deem necessary; and the court said: "That such is the relation of the city to the various companies which had been empowered to occupy its streets with a view to gain is to me abundantly clear, and they should not grudge a reasonable compensation for the space they occupy and the risks which she incurs on their account."

Counsel quotes from Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. v. Milwaukee, 97 Wis. 418, 72 N. W. 1118, to the effect that the charter of a corporation does not exempt it from police supervision and regulation, which is true as applied in that case, but the question here is not one of escape from police regulation, but whether the ordinance of the defendant is within it. People ex rel. New York Electric Lines Co. v. Squire, 107 N. Y. 593, 1 Am. St. Rep. 893, 14 N. E. 820, clearly involves a regulation under a statute of New York concerning such companies, and which provided for the removal of such wires and cables from the surface of the streets and laying the same under ground; and the court said (p. 602 of 107 N. Y., p. 899, 1 Am. St. Rep. and p. 823 of 14 N. E.): "The claim that this law is void because it imposes a tax on the companies referred to cannot be maintained. The act of 1884 imposes the duty upon such companies to remove and cause to be laid underground all such wires and cables as are required in their business; and there is no reason why such companies should not be subjected to the payment of all expenses incurred in the construction of works required to carry on their own business." In State ex rel. Wisconsin Teleph. Co. v. Janesville Street R. Co. 87 Wis. 72, 22 L. R. A. 759, 41 Am. St. Rep. 23, 57 N. W. 970, the question involved under the ordinance was one of reasonable regulation. The ordinance provided for the location and use of electric wires in the streets, reasonable safeguards for the same, and a penalty for the violation of the regulation. No license fee whatever was exacted. It was purely a regulation requiring safeguards and providing a penalty for failure to furnish the same. Marshfield v. Wisconsin Teleph. Co. supra, involved the question of the city's right to control its streets and prohibit the encumbering of the same; and it was held that, under this power, the city had the right to prevent the encumbering by telephone poles certain of its streets in the exercise of a reasonable discretion, and that the common council had a reasonable discretion in the location of such poles. The dominant purpose of the street being for public passage, any appropriation of it by legislative sanction to other objects must be deemed to be in subordination to this use. The decision only goes to the extent of authorizing a reasonable regulation on the part of the city. In Baltimore v. Baltimore Trust & G. Co. 166 U. S. 673, 41 L. ed. 1160, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 696, it was held that the street railway company, occupying the streets by permission of the municipality, was subject to reasonable regulations by subsequent ordinances, and that the city did not exhaust its power of regulation by one exercise of it. In Philadelphia v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 11 Phila. 327, the telegraph company commenced the construction of a new line on the streets, and the city sought to regulate such construction. Its right of regulation was sustained on the ground that the telegraph company was occupying the streets by permission of the city, under the restriction that it should not use the streets of Philadelphia without the consent of the mayor and city council first had and obtained. The cases generally cited by counsel for respondent from Pennsylvania and from the Supreme Court of the United States upon appeal from that state turn upon the laws of that state which authorize municipalities to grant permission to such companies to occupy the streets and impose such conditions and regulations as the municipal authorities may deem necessary. No such power is conferred upon municipal corporations in Wisconsin. State ex rel. Wisconsin Teleph. Co. v. Sheboygan, 111 Wis. 23, 86 N. W. 657. Ash v. People, 11 Mich. 347, 83 Am. Dec. 740, upholds the right of the city of Detroit to pass an ordinance prohibiting the keeping of stalls for the sale of fresh meats outside of the public markets without license and payment of license fee under its charter, which expressly empowered the common council to license and regulate butchers and the keepers of shops and stalls. Marmet v. State, 45 Ohio St. 63, 12 N. E. 463, is a case where right to license is upheld under express legislative authority given. Also, in State v. Herod, 29 Iowa, 123, power was conferred upon the city to license. In St. Louis the title to the streets being in the city, and the charter giving the right to license, tax, and regulate telegraph companies, it was held that, the city having the right to grant the use of the streets to telegraph companies, it regulates the use when it prescribes the terms and conditions upon which they shall be used. The case turns upon the power of the city to grant the right to use the streets to the telegraph company. St. Louis v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 149 U. S. 465, 37 L. ed. 810, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 990.

But we will not further extend discussion of cases cited by respondent. It is manifest they do not support the proposition that the defendant has authority to exact a license such as is provided for in the ordinance in question. The power rests in the state to determine what occupation shall be licensed. Wisconsin Teleph. Co. v. Oshkosh, 62 Wis. 32, 21 N. W. 828; State ex rel. Wisconsin Teleph. Co. v. Sheboygan, supra; Cooley, Const. Lim. 7th ed. p. 884. And it is not claimed that any power has been granted to the defendant by the legislature to license the plaintiff; nor is it claimed that the plaintiff has failed to comply with all regulations respecting its use of the streets, or that it has violated the law granting it the right to occupy the streets by obstructing or in any manner interfering with the public use of the streets of defendant. And, no power having been delegated to defendant to license plaintiff, it could not exact a license fee as a means of raising revenue. Wisconsin Teleph. Co. v. Oshkosh, and State ex rel. Wisconsin Teleph. Co. v. Sheboygan, supra; Marshfield v. Wisconsin Teleph. Co. 102 Wis. 604, 44 L. R. A. 565, 78 N. W. 735; State ex rel. Wisconsin Teleph. Co. v. Sheboygan, 114 Wis. 505, 90 N. W. 441; Michigan Teleph. Co. v. Benton Harbor, 121 Mich. 512, 47 L. R. A. 104, 80 N. W. 386. But it is claimed that the ordinance is a regulation, and not a revenue measure, and that it may be sustained upon the theory that the defendant has the right to impose such fee for supervision and inspection under the police power. Whether the city has power to impose any fee upon the plaintiff for inspection and supervision is not necessary to decide, and we do not decide, in this case, because it is clear that the ordinance was passed for no such purpose, but on the contrary, was an attempt to charge plaintiff for the privilege of maintaining its poles and wires in the streets. If the city had power to grant any privileges in the streets to the plaintiff, or had express authority from the legislature to license the plaintiff so as to bring its case within the authorities cited, the respondent's position would be quite different. But, as before observed, the defendant had no right or privilege to grant to the plaintiff, and no power to prevent its use of the streets in a reasonable manner consistent with the public use, and the provisions of 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

the ordinance set out in the statement of facts show that it is a revenue measure, and not a regulation.

The ordinance requires telephone and telegraph companies to apply annually for a license to maintain, for the ensuing year, the poles and cross-arms then erected, and provides for payment, for the use of the city, of $1 for each and every pole authorized to be maintained thereby. The ordinance further provides that all revenue derived from such license shall become part of the general city fund, and imposes a penalty for any violation; and further provides that the erection or maintenance of any single pole or cross-arm in violation of the provisions thereof shall constitute a distinct and separate offense thereunder. The plain import of this ordinance is that it grants the privilege to telephone and telegraph companies to occupy the streets of defendant city with their poles and cross-arms in consideration of the license fee exacted. Neuman v. State, 76 Wis. 112, 45 N. W. 30; Chilvers v. People, 11 Mich. 43; Home Ins. Co. v. Augusta, 50 Ga. 530. There is nothing in the ordinance indicating that the fee is exacted for inspection or supervision, or that it will be used for such purpose, or that any such amount is necessary to defray the expense of such inspection and supervision; and it is quite obvious that the aggregate amount sought to be collected would be far beyond the reasonable expense of such inspection and supervision. We think it safe to say that any reasonable cost of inspection and supervision would not exceed one tenth of the revenue chargeable according to the terms of the ordinance. True, where the power to license exists, a reasonable discretion is vested in the municipality; but courts have a right to look into ordinances with a view of determining whether they are passed for the purpose of revenue, although sought to be upheld as police regulations. Even if the city had the right to impose reasonable charges for inspection and supervision, it should not be permitted, under the guise of such power, to collect large amounts of revenue for the benefit of the city, regardless of the amount necessary for such inspection and supervision. And, where the court can clearly see that revenue, and not regulation, is the aim, and not the incident, and no power is given to license the occupation, the ordinance is void. Wisconsin Teleph. Co. v. Oshkosh, supra; State ex rel. Wisconsin Teleph. Co. v. Sheboygan, 111 Wis. 40, 41, 86 N. W. 657; Postal Telegr. Cable Co. v. Taylor, 192 U. S. 64, 48 L. ed. 342, 24 Sup. Ct. It follows from what has been said that the order must be reversed.

The order of the court below is reversed, and the cause remanded, with instructions to sustain the demurrer.

WYOMING SUPREME COURT.

STATE OF WYOMING ex rel. OCTAVIUS A. HAMILTON

v.

LEROY GRANT, State Auditor.

(.... Wyo.)

1. Mandamus—payment of salary—officer removed.

Mandamus will lie to compel payment of salary to a public officer who is alleged to have been removed from office, since his right to the salary may be determined without any determination of the question of the right to the office as between him and his alleged successor.

2. Officer—removal.

A superintendent of a water division, who is appointed by the governor with the consent of the senate, may be removed from office in any manner provided by law, under constitutional provisions for the impeachment of the governor and other state officers for high crimes and misdemeanors, or malfeasance in office, and that all officers not liable to impeachment shall be subject to removal for misconduct or malfeasance in office in such manner as may be provided by law.

3. Public office—property right in.

There is no property right in a public office, so as to require notice and a hearing before a removal therefrom, under a constitutional provision that no one shall be deprived of property without due process of law.

4. Officer—removal—notice.

Notice and opportunity to be heard are not necessary before the removal from office of a public officer, where the statute provides that the removal shall be made upon filing the reasons therefor in the office of the secretary of state.

(August 1, 1905.)

APPPLICATION for a writ of mandamus to compel the issuance of a warrant for the payment of relator's salary as a superintendent of a water division. Denied.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. H. W. Moore, for relator:

An act is a mere nullity which does not give plaintiff an opportunity to be heard and answer charges against him, and which does not provide for serving notice on him and allowing him to appear and make his defense.

Coleman v. Glenn, 103 Ga. 458, 68 Am.

Case Note.—Throop on Public Officers, §§ 825, 828, lays down the doctrine that mandamus will not lie to determine, either directly or indirectly, a disputed question of title to a public office. He says the authorities are not in perfect harmony upon this question, for some of them recognize mandamus as a proper remedy for settling a disputed title to an office; but an issue upon the eligibility of a person to hold an office of which he is in possession cannot be raised upon mandamus to compel payment of his salary.

In High on Extraordinary Legal Remedies, § 105, it is stated that, in proceedings for the payment of salary, the courts will not ordinarily inquire into the eligibility of the officer whose salary is in question; but that, if there be no other claimant of the office, it would seem to be proper for the courts to determine whether the appointment under which relator claims is void.

In Conlin v. Aldrich, 98 Mass. 557, it was held that mandamus lies to enforce the right of a member of a school committee to act as a member of the board to the exclusion of one whom the other members wrongfully permit to act. And in Keough v. Holyoke, 156 Mass. 403, 31 N. E. 387, the court upheld the use of mandamus to determine the title to a municipal office.

title to a public office, such as state librarian. Harwood v. Marshall, 9 Md. 83.

Also, in Eastman v. Householder, 54 Kan. 63, 37 Pac. 980, mandamus was recognized as an appropriate remedy to regain possession of the office of superintendent of an insane asylum, from which the petitioner had been arbitrarily removed without cause.

But in Cameron v. Parker, 2 Okla. 277, 38 Pac. 14, it was held that mandamus would not lie to try the title to a public office.

And in People ex rel. Nicholl v. New York Infant Asylum, 122 N. Y. 190, 10 L. R. A. 381, 25 N. E. 241, the court held that mandamus is not the proper remedy to restore to office a person who had been wrongfully removed, after a successor has been elected to fill the vacancy caused by his removal. An information in the nature of quo warranto must be resorted to. State ex rel. White v. Barker, 116 Iowa, 96, 57 L. R. A. 244, 93 Am. St. Rep. 222, 89 N. W. 204, is to the same effect.

The prevailing rule is that title to a public office will not be tried by mandamus. State ex rel. Butler v. Callahan, 4 N. D. 481, 61 N. W. 1025.

Some courts hold that mandamus will not lie when the title to a public office is incidentally involved. Thus:

In State ex rel. Addison v. Williams, 25 Minn. 340, the court held that mandamus does not lie to obtain possession of the records of the office of county treasurer when the title to the office is incidentally involved.

A statute providing for the removal from office of such an officer for inefficiency, incapacity, neglect of duty, or other cause; and which makes no provision for giving him notice, or for allowing him to be heard in his defense,—is contrary to the constitutional guaranty which declares that no person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law.

The plaintiff, being a state officer, is liable to removal only by the means pointed out by the Constitution, namely, impeachment; and the legislature was without authority to pass an act prescribing that "appointive state officers" could be removed by the governor; and such an act is absolutely void.

In Missouri the rule is well settled that a claimant of a public office cannot contest his right thereto by mandamus to enforce payment of his salary, the title to the office being necessarily involved. The court held that quo warranto must be resorted to. State ex rel. Simmons v. John, 81 Mo. 13. And in the case of State ex rel. Goodnow v. Police Comrs. 80 Mo. App. 206, it was held that the right to an office cannot be ascertained by the mere action for the salary, where the incumbent of the office cannot be made a party. These Missouri cases lay down the doctrine that the title to the office must be judicially determined before the question of the right to salary will be decided. In Kentucky the same doctrine is applied in the case of Gorley v. Louisville, 104 Ky. 372, 47 S. W. 263, in which it was held that a detective of a city police force, who has been removed, and whose position has been filled by another, cannot maintain an action against the city to recover his salary accruing after his removal, before there has been an adjudication showing him to be entitled to the office.

In Hartwig v. Manistee, 134 Mich. 615, 96 N. W. 1067, the court held that mandamus will not lie to compel the city to pay a street commissioner's salary during the period between his suspension and the date of removal, where his unfitness is assumed. The court refused to inquire into the regularity of the proceedings which resulted in removal, on the ground that, if the relator wished to raise that claim, he should proceed by quo warranto, as such an issue cannot be raised on an application for a writ of mandamus. In the case of STATE EX REL. HAMILTON v. GRANT, however, the court did, on the application for a writ of mandamus, consider the legality of the governor's action in removing the officer.

In Hagan v. Brooklyn, 126 N. Y. 643, 27 N. E. 265, a doctrine contrary to that established in STATE EX REL. HAMILTON v. GRANT is applied. In this case the court held that, in proceedings by a municipal officer, who has been removed, to recover his salary, the title to the office necessarily comes in question; and that question cannot be tried in such proceedings. In Hadley v. Albany, 33 N. Y. 603, 88 Am. Dec. 412, a similar doctrine is applied.

In Wenner v. Smith, 4 Utah, 238, 9 Pac. 293, a rule differing from that laid down in Hagan v. Brooklyn is applied. The court held that the title to the office of probate judge may be determined in an action by the claimant to recover the fees from an intruder. In this case the proceeding was not by mandamus, but by action against the intruder. The same rule is applied in Glascock v. Lyons, 20 Ind. 1, 83 Am. Dec. 299.

Beard, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a proceeding commenced in this court, as a court of original jurisdiction, by the relator against the state auditor, praying for a writ of mandamus to compel the auditor to allow, draw, and sign a warrant on the state treasurer for $100, being the amount of the salary claimed by the relator as superintendent of water division No. 4 of the state of Wyoming for the month of March, 1905. The relator presented his petition to Chief Justice Potter, and an alternative writ was issued by him and made returnable to this court.

The facts necessary to an understanding of the case, briefly stated, are as follows: On February 27, 1903, the relator was appointed, by the then governor of the state, superintendent of said water division for the term of four years, which appointment was confirmed by the state senate. He qualified, a commission was issued to him, and he entered upon the discharge of the duties of the office, and continued so to do until March 16, 1905, when he was removed from said office by the present governor of the state; the cause for such removal, as stated by the governor in writing and filed in the office of the secretary of state, being as follows: "Proof of Incompetency of O. A. Hamilton, Division Superintendent. Referring to tabulation of proofs taken in adjudicating rights on Green river and tributaries. Three hundred and thirty proofs submitted. Of these, 105 show no errors on face of tabulation; but of the 105 several petitions for corrections of descriptions of lands irrigated have been received and granted. Eighteen petitions for rehearing were received altogether from this work, and fully 200 would have been received if the errors had not been discovered in the office of the board of control prior to the issuance of final certificates of appropriation. The errors thus corrected by the board of control were of different character. Eighty-three per cent were in wrong descriptions of irrigated lands, 11 per cent in the date of priority, 4 per cent in the names of appropriators, and 2 per cent in unintelligible writing, miscalculations, etc. Owing to the necessity for reviewing the entire work, the state engineer and superintendent of water division No. 1 went into the field in pursuance of an order of the board of control reopening the decree for correction. The entire matter was gone over, and many more corrections were made than were brought to the attention of the board through correspondence. This work has cost the state over $200 in expense alone, besides the time of the administrative officers. It has cost the people much more in time and money. Similar errors have been found in all other proofs submitted by Mr. Hamilton. During the season of 1904 he spent a large part of his time mining along the Sweetwater river. He has never performed his part in the systemizing of the records pertaining to his division, and the card index belonging to that division is in the office of the board at Cheyenne. The photographic reproduction of a page of the Green river tabulation (a part of the records of the office of the board of control) is attached hereto. It is typical of the remainder of the tabulation." The photograph referred to was not attached to the pleadings, nor offered in evidence. On March 18, 1905, the governor appointed a successor to relator, until the convening of the next session of the senate, who immediately qualified. The relator was notified of his removal, but he was not notified to appear and show cause why he should not be removed; nor was he given a hearing upon charges before he was removed. He testifies, however, that, about February 20, 1905, he had a conversation with the governor about his resigning, and that he concluded not to resign; and that the governor then told him that, if he did not resign by March 15th, he would be removed; and that the governor gave, as his reasons for such contemplated removal, that relator's reports were erroneous, and that the state engineer and relator could not agree, and that it was not a good plan to have a board where its members were at loggerheads.

The claims of the relator are: (1) That he is a state officer appointed for a definite term, and therefore cannot be removed from office, except by impeachment; (2) that chapter 59, p. 101, Sess. Laws 1905, giving the governor power to remove from office appointive officers, is unconstitutional; (3) that, if said act is constitutional, such removal could not be made by the governor without charges being preferred, notice to relator, and a hearing, and that the attempted removal by the governor was null and void. On behalf of respondent, the attorney general objects to the consideration of the questions involved, on the ground that the title to the office is involved, and that mandamus is not the proper remedy; and cites Mechem on Public Officers, § 217, where the rule is stated as follows: "It is well settled that mandamus will not lie to try the title to the office, or to compel admission to it, or to obtain possession of it, or to oust an usurper from it. In all these cases the party must resort to his remedy by quo warranto." Numerous authorities are cited, which, however, add nothing to the above statement. But the present proceeding is not brought against the appointee to succeed the relator, nor is the prayer to restore the relator to office. It may be conceded that quo warranto is the proper remedy to try the title to office between contending parties. Mandamus would be unfair, as well as inadequate, for the reason that it would be an attempt to secure an adjudication with but one of the parties claiming the office before the court. An examination of the prayer of the petition, if the facts stated warrant the relief prayed for, is frequently the best test of the nature of an action or proceeding; and that test, applied to this case, indicates that the purpose of the proceeding is not to determine the right to the office as between the relator and the appointee, but to compel the auditor to issue a warrant. The relator claims to be in office and entitled to the salary, and that it is the duty of the auditor to issue a warrant therefor; while the respondent alleges that the relator has been removed from office, and is not entitled to its emoluments, and that he has no duty to perform. The court will go no further in its decision than is requisite to determine the precise question presented by the issues. A decision in favor of the relator could mean no more than that he is a de facto incumbent of the office, and entitled to the emoluments thereof. It could not adjudicate, as between relator and appointee, as to which has the better title to the office. It could not declare the relator's title unassailable. On the other hand, a decision adverse to the relator would doubtless mean that he had been effectively removed, and has no right to the office. But there is nothing unfair to him in deciding the question, for his claims have been fully presented and argued to the court. In either case the rights of the appointee, who is not a party, are not involved, and the case is not one to try the title to an office between contesting claimants. The right of the court to entertain mandamus proceedings for the determination of the questions properly presented, notwithstanding the incidental inclusion of other matters more fitly presented by a proceeding in quo warranto has been upheld. In Morton v. Broderick, 118 Cal. 474, 50 Pac. 644, the supreme court of California said: "An application for a writ of mandate to try title to office would be answered at once by the suggestion that the law affords adequate process and procedure by an action of quo warranto or usurpation of office. But, when the writ is invoked to enforce a specific duty, and remedies at law are not adequate, aid will not be refused merely because occupancy, or incumbency, or title, is incidentally involved. It will act under such circumstances, as does equity, and inquire into and determine rights so far as, but no further than, may be necessary to the granting of the relief sought." See also High, Extr. Legal Rem. 3d ed. § 108. We are therefore of the opinion that we are not going outside of established legal rules in entertaining the application to the extent merely of determining whether or not the relator is entitled to the relief prayed for. The relator is entitled to the salary if he is the officer he claims to be, and he is such officer unless he has been removed. Therefore the legality of the governor's action in that respect is the only question to be decided.

We will first consider the relator's contention that he is a state officer, and cannot be removed, except by impeachment. The constitutional provisions with regard to his appointment are found in article 8 of the Constitution, which provides that the legislature shall, by law, divide the state into four water divisions, and provides for the appointment of superintendents thereof; that there shall be a state engineer, who shall be president of the board of control, and shall have general supervision of the waters of the state and of the officers connected with its distribution. It further provides for a board of control, to be composed of the state engineer and the superintendents of the water divisions. In pursuance of these constitutional provisions, the first state legislature (Sess. Laws 1890, 1891, chap. 8, p. 91; Rev. Stat. 1899, §§ 848-850) divided the state into four water divisions, and provided for the appointment of a superintendent for each division by the governor, with the consent of the senate, who should hold his office for four years, or until his successor is appointed and shall have qualified, and providing that he shall have general control over the water commissioners of the several districts within his division, and shall, under the general supervision of the state engineer, execute the laws relative to the distribution of water in accordance with the rights of priority of appropriation, and perform such other functions as may be assigned to him by the state engineer. It was under these provisions that the relator was appointed. The constitutional provisions with regard to the impeachment and removal of officers are contained in §§ 18 and 19 of article 3, and are as follows:

"Sec. 18. The governor and other state and judicial officers, except justices of the peace, shall be liable to impeachment for high crimes and misdemeanors, or malfeasance in office."

"Sec. 19. All officers not liable to impeachment shall be subject to removal for misconduct or malfeasance in office, in such manner as may be provided by law."

The legislature passed an act (Sess. Laws, chap. 59, p. 101, approved February 20, 1905), as follows: "Any officer or commissioner of the state of Wyoming who shall hold his office or commission by virtue of appointment thereto by the governor, or by the governor by and with the advice and consent of the senate, may be removed by the governor from such office or commission for maladministration in office, breach of good behavior, wilful neglect of duty, extortion, habitual drunkenness, or any other cause deemed by the governor to justify and warrant such removal; Provided, reason for such removal shall be filed in the office of the secretary of state in writing, subject to inspection by any person interested." It was under the power conferred by this act that the relator was removed.

It will be observed that the causes for impeachment are "for high crimes and misdemeanors, or malfeasance in office," including only criminal conduct or positive wrongdoing; while officers not liable to impeachment may be removed for "misconduct or malfeasance in office;" thus very greatly extending the causes for removal authorized to be provided for by law. We are very clearly of the opinion that it was not the intention of the framers of our Constitution to require that the jurisdiction of the high court of impeachment should be invoked to try and remove minor and subordinate officers, especially as the term of office of many of such officers would expire by limitation during the session of the legislature at which they could be impeached; and, again, that court would have no jurisdiction in cases of "misconduct" not amounting to a high crime or misdemeanor or malfeasance in office. We are strongly inclined to the opinion, without deciding the point, that the officers liable to impeachment are the governor and other state officers mentioned in § 11, art. 4, of the Constitution, which does not include the officer in question. Certainly, and it has generally been so considered, only the superior executive and judicial officers of a state are subject to impeachment; and we have found no case where an officer holding by appointment, or an inferior officer of any kind, has been held subject to impeachment. On the other hand, it has been held that such officers are not so subject. 15 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. p. 1065; State ex rel. Hitchcock v. Hewitt, 3 S. D. 187, 16 L. R. A. 413, 44 Am. St. Rep. 788, 52 N. W. 875; State ex rel. Stearns v. Smith, 6 Wash. 496, 33 Pac. 974; State ex rel. McReavy v. Burke, 8 Wash. 412, 36 Pac. 281. The constitutional provisions of these states are similar to ours. The supreme court of South Dakota says: "The Constitutions of many of the states contain the same language as our own, defining what officers are subject to impeachment; but, so far as we have observed, such language has not been taken to include officers who hold by appointment, either by the governor or some supervising board authorized to make such selection and appointment." The supreme court of Washington has given us a rational view of the subject: "As a general rule, the term 'state officer' is only applied to those superior executive officers who constitute the heads of the executive departments of a state." Again: "The 2d section provides that the governor and other 'state' and judicial officers . . . shall be liable to impeachment; and the 3d section provides that all officers not liable to impeachment shall be subject to removal for malfeasance in office in such manner as may be provided by law. If 'state officers' should be taken to include all officers who have to do with the state's business, officers of all grades would be subject to removal by impeachment only, and there would be no use of § 3. But it is a matter of general as well as legal knowledge that impeachments do not lie against any but the superior officers of a state, and that it is usually limited to the executive and to the judiciary; and this was the intention in this article." Cases supra. Applying the reasoning of the Washington court, an interpretation of § 18, art. 3 of the Constitution, which would make it include minor and subordinate officers, would render § 19 meaningless and superfluous. There is no doubt in our minds but that the superintendent of a water division is such an officer as, under § 19, art. 3, of the Constitution, may be removed in the manner provided by law.

It is argued that the act under consideration (Sess. Laws 1905, chap. 59, p. 101,) contravenes the Bill of Rights, providing that no person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law. But the notion that there may exist a property right in a public office is not generally accepted. "The incumbent of an office has not, under our system of government, any property in it. His right to exercise it is not based upon any contract or grant. It is conferred on him as a public trust, to be exercised for the benefit of the public. Such salary as may be attached to it is not 1 L.R.A. (N.S.) given because of any duty on the part of the public to do so, but to enable the incumbent the better to perform the duties of his office by the more exclusive devotion of his time thereto." State ex rel. Atty. Gen. v. Hawkins, 44 Ohio St. 98, 109, 5 N. E. 228, 233. "A public office is not to be regarded as the property of the incumbent." Reals v. Smith, 8 Wyo. 159, 56 Pac. 690. "Subject to constitutional provisions or prohibitions, the authority of the legislature over public offices is complete and absolute." Ibid.; Lee v. Uinta County, 3 Wyo. 52, 31 Pac. 1045. It is well settled in this state that the Bill of Rights does not interfere with legislative control over public offices, and that such control is complete within the express constitutional limits. The legislature, however, under the provisions of § 19, art. 3, of the Constitution, did have express warrant for the passage of an act for the removal of officers not subject to impeachment and the method of procedure in effecting such removal is not limited by any other constitutional provision. Atty. Gen. ex rel. Rich v. Jochim, 99 Mich. 358, 23 L. R. A. 699, 41 Am. St. Rep. 606, 58 N. W. 611.

The only question that remains to be considered is the contention of counsel for relator that relator could not be removed, lawfully, without charges being preferred against him, notice of the time and place of a hearing upon such charges, and an opportunity to make defense. Counsel for relator has cited many authorities on this proposition, which sustain the rule as laid down in Mechem on Public Officers, § 454, which is as follows: "Where the appointment or election is made for a definite term or during good behavior, and the removal is to be for cause, it is now clearly established by the great weight of authority that the power of removal cannot, except by clear statutory authority, be exercised without notice and hearing; but that the existence of the cause, for which the power is to be exercised, must first be determined after notice has been given to the officer of the charges made against him, and he has been given an opportunity to be heard in his defense." In the two leading cases cited by counsel for the relator (Coleman v. Glenn, 103 Ga. 458, 68 Am. St. Rep. 108, 30 S. E. 297, and Dullam v. Willson, 53 Mich. 392, 51 Am. Rep. 128, 19 N. W. 112) the principle is recognized that, where the statute so provides, the removal may be made without notice. In the Georgia case, on page 460 of 103 Ga., page 108 of 68 Am. St. Rep., and page 297 of 30 S. E., the writer of the opinion quotes with approval the above quotation from Mechem; and in the Michigan case, on page 402 of 53 Mich., page 134 of 51 Am. Rep., and page 116 of 19 N. W., the court says: "Unless it is the manifest intention of the section under consideration that the proceedings should be ex parte, as well as summary, a removal without charges, notice, and an opportunity for defense cannot be upheld." It is true that the rule has been sometimes stated without the qualifying exception in the case of "clear statutory authority;" but such statements are evolved from cases where the question did not arise. The later Michigan cases show that officers may be removed without notice, where the statute gives such authority, and where there is no constitutional provision prohibiting it. Hallgren v. Campbell, 82 Mich. 255, 9 L. R. A. 408, 21 Am. St. Rep. 557, 46 N. W. 381; People ex rel. Clay v. Stuart, 74 Mich. 411, 16 Am. St. Rep. 644, 41 N. W. 1091; Trainor v. Board of Auditors, 89 Mich. 162, 15 L. R. A. 95, 50 N. W. 809. See also Trimble v. People, 19 Colo. 187, 41 Am. St. Rep. 236, 34 Pac. 981; People ex rel. Gere v. Whitlock, 92 N. Y. 101; State ex rel. Kennedy v. McGarry, 21 Wis. 496; State ex rel. Howlett v. Cheetham, 19 Wash. 330, 53 Pac. 349.

From an examination of the authorities, therefore, it seems correct to say that, when the legislature has conferred power on the governor to remove an appointive officer having a definite term, and the statute does not provide the procedure, it will not be presumed that such removal may be made without notice and a hearing; but, if the authority is expressly given to proceed summarily, no such notice is necessary. If, therefore, the statute under which the removal was made in this case had closed at the semicolon before the proviso, it might be a question whether notice to the officer and a hearing on charges might not be required. But the legislature, having declared that removals may be made, proceeds to prescribe the method or the conditions under which such removals may be made. Having conferred the power upon the governor in language which is plenary, it adds: "Provided, reason for such removal shall be filed in the office of the secretary of state in writing, subject to inspection by any person interested,"—thereby declaring the express conditions and limitations under which the governor may act. Having entered upon the realm of limitation, the enumeration of one condition precludes the idea that there should be others not expressed. Expressio unius est exclusio alterius. To our minds the language of the proviso is inconsistent with the idea of a hearing. The sole restraint upon the action of the governor is the filing of his reasons for the removal, and the consequent check of public opinion. In defining the duties of the governor, the Constitution (§ 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

4, art. 4) provides: "He shall expedite all such measures as may be resolved upon by the legislature, and shall take care that the laws be faithfully executed." Being vested with the power to appoint many subordinate officers, for whose conduct he is, in a measure at least, held responsible to the people, it was no doubt deemed wise by the legislature to also invest him with the power of summary removal of such appointive officers for misconduct in office, whatever might be the source of his information and knowledge of such misconduct, so long as in his judgment it existed; and that the filing of his reasons was a sufficient guaranty of his good faith, and that the power would not be abused, but would be exercised only when a faithful execution of the laws required it. It was argued that this lodges an arbitrary and unsafe power in the executive. But it may be a question whether the evils that might arise from such condition would be greater than those growing out of maladministration, or misconduct in office and the delays to be anticipated from protracted litigation under more cumbersome methods. At any rate, the question is one for the legislature, and not for the courts. The law can be repealed, if proved to be vicious. Its wisdom does not concern us, for our duty is simply to declare the law as we find it to be. There is no claim advanced by counsel for the relator that the reasons assigned by the governor are not such as, if true, would constitute maladministration or misconduct in office; and they seem to us to be well within these terms. State ex rel. Tilley v. Slover, 113 Mo. 208, 20 S. W. 788; Yoe v. Hoffman, 61 Kan. 265, 59 Pac. 351; Century Dict.

We conclude, therefore, (1) that the superintendent of a water division is one of those officers mentioned in § 19, art. 3, of the Constitution, and that the legislature had the power to provide by law for the removal of such an officer, in a summary manner, and without notice or a hearing, for one or more of the causes mentioned in said section; (2) that it was the intention of the legislature that removals from office, provided for in chapter 59, p. 101, Sess. Laws 1905, might be made summarily, and without notice or hearing; (3) that the removal of the relator from office by the governor was in accordance with law, and that, after such removal, the relator was not entitled to the salary of said office, and that the respondent was justified in refusing to issue a warrant to him for the same. It is therefore considered and adjudged by the court that the writ of mandamus prayed for by the relator be, and the same hereby is, denied. It is further ordered and adjudged that the relator pay the costs of this action taxed at ———dollars.

JOSEPH M. HOWELL, Plff. in Err.,
v.

BIG HORN BASIN COLONIZATION COMPANY.

1. Irrigation—reservoir.

A portion of a gulch, which, by means of a dam, is converted into a section of an irrigation ditch, in which the water stands over an area 2,000 feet long, nearly 400 feet wide and in places 12 or 15 feet deep, and the connection between which and the outlet ditch can be closed so that it can be used as a storage place, is a reservoir, within the meaning of a statute providing that owners

Case Note.—The persistence with which water will seek its level renders the artificial accumulation of it above the ordinary level of the surrounding country more or less dangerous according to the quantity of water accumulated and the susceptibility of adjoining property to injury in case of its escape. The result is that there has been some tendency on the part of the courts, as represented in the case of Rylands v. Fletcher, L. R. 3 H. L. 330, 37 L. J. Exch. N. S. 161, 19 L. T. N. S. 220, to hold one who accumulates water in large quantities as an insurer. On the other hand, water may be accumulated in small quantities without material danger to adjoining property. At the same time, the very facts that that is so, and that ordinary precaution will prevent injury from the accumulated water, render the case peculiarly one for the application of the principle that the injury itself is evidence of negligence.

Farnham, Waters, p. 2799, says that the degree of care required to avoid injury cannot be the same in all cases of stored water. There are many cases where the water can be stored with comparative safety, and where the effect of its escape will be slight, while in other cases the attempt to store is attended with such imminent danger, and the result of a breaking away of the water would be so disastrous, that the one attempting the storage may well be required to take all the risks of the enterprise. Therefore, no rule can be stated which will be applicable in all cases, but the extent of the liability must be determined from the circumstances of each case as it arises. And in the final conclusion it will probably appear that the question of liability depends upon the further question of negligence. The one attempting to store water must of reservoirs shall be liable for leakage therefrom.

2. Same—discharging water on adjoining land.

The owner of an irrigation ditch is liable for the injury done by wilfully and knowingly discharging water therefrom through spillways upon adjoining property.

3. Same—waiver of injury.

A landowner waives his right to recover for the injury done to his land by the casting of water thereon by authorizing and directing the defendant to cast it there.

4. Same—injury by seepage.

Failure of a statute specifically to require the observance of a care in constructing and grading the bottom of an irrigation ditch will not exempt the owner from liability for injury to adjoining lands through seepage caused by negligence in that respect.

5. Same—liability for injuries.

The liability of insurers does not attach to persons conveying water in ditches for irrigation purposes; nor are they liable for injuries to adjoining property, not attributable to some fault or neglect on their part.

5. Same—negligence.

Constructing an irrigation ditch through exercise care commensurate with his undertaking.

The mere transmission of water through artificial ditches, as shown in HOWELL v. Big Horn Basin Colonization Co., is, in the exercise of ordinary care, attended with such slight danger of injury to adjoining property that the question of liability will usually turn upon the question of negligence in the construction and maintenance of the ditch. This is well illustrated by the authorities cited in the HOWELL CASE; and in Boulder v. Fowler, 11 Colo. 396, 18 Pac. 337, it was held that a municipal corporation is liable for damages to property from overflow, by percolation or seepage, from street gutters which it makes use of for the purpose of supplying water to its inhabitants for irrigation purposes, where it fails to use ordinary care in the construction and management thereof,—such as a man of average prudence and intelligence would employ, under like circumstances, to protect his own property.

The liability of the water to do injury if allowed to escape must be continually borne in mind by the one attempting to make artificial use of it; and his failure to bear that fact in mind may be material upon the question of his negligence.

Thus, Dunstan v. New York, 91 App. Div. 355, 86 N. Y. Supp. 562, which cites Reed v. State, 108 N. Y. 407, 15 N. E. 735, discussed in the HOWELL CASE, held that a municipality is chargeable with knowledge that water in its water mains is a dangerous element if allowed to escape, and is liable for damages caused by its failure to exercise proper care in maintaining the pipes in a safe condition, even though they are rendered unsafe by the wrongful or negligent acts of others.

sand banks, and forming the bottom by sand and gravel loosely scraped together, and permitting such condition to continue after notice of its insufficiency, by reason of which the water seeps through the bottom to the injury of adjoining land, is evidence of negligence.

7. Same—injury obviated by drainage.

The fact that the injurious results of seepage from an irrigation ditch may be obviated by drainage may be shown, as affecting the measure of damages.

8. Same—evidence—consent.

The fact that plaintiff, an adjoining landowner, had not notified defendant, the owner of an irrigation ditch, of a claim for damages for casting water upon his property, is admissible in evidence upon a disputed question as to the existence of plaintiff's consent thereto.

Potter, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a proceeding in error for the review of a judgment rendered by the district court, sitting in Big Horn county, in an action brought by Joseph M. Howell against the Big Horn Basin Colonization Company, a corporation, to recover damages for alleged injuries to a tract of land owned by the plaintiff, caused by overflow, leakage, and seepage of water from an irrigating ditch and reservoir constructed and maintained by the defendant. The cause was tried to the court without a jury, and, upon the findings of fact and conclusions of law, separately stated in writing, judgment was awarded the defendant for costs.

There are two causes of action set out in the petition; the first alleging injury to plaintiff's land from waters that leaked and seeped from a reservoir constructed, operated, and maintained by defendant; and the second alleging the negligent construction and maintenance of the defendant's ditch and reservoir, whereby large quantities of water leaked and seeped therefrom, and overflowed the same at certain spills or waste gates, and came out upon and flooded the land of plaintiff, causing a large part thereof to be covered with water, destroying growing crops thereon, and rendering the land useless and unfit for agricultural or other purposes. The allegations as to negligence, the escape of water from defendant's irrigating works, and the injuries to plaintiff's land are denied by the answer; and, in a second defense, it is alleged that plaintiff refused an offer of defendant to construct drainage ditches through and around his land to carry off any escaping water from defendant's irrigating works, and authorized and directed defendant to permit such escaping water to run into and upon the land of plaintiff; which license, it is averred, had not been revoked or withdrawn, otherwise than by bringing this action. The court found that, on different occasions since the construction and operation of defendant's ditch system, large quantities of water escaped therefrom at certain spills or waste gates, constructed as hereinafter explained, covering and flooding about 60 acres of plaintiff's land, and washing sand and dirt upon 2 or 3 acres thereof, and causing alkali to rise to the surface of a portion of such land, and that said 60 acres had become wet or boggy, and incapable of cultivation while in that condition; and further, that, by reason of the construction and maintenance of the ditch, water has seeped and percolated through the soil, rising and coming to the surface on about 21 acres of the land, not causing a permanent injury, but damaging the plaintiff by reason of such seepage in the sum of $105. The court also found that none of plaintiff's land had been permanently injured, but could be drained and rendered fit for agricultural purposes; that the land was of little value; that defendant had notice that the water flowed through the spills aforesaid; that plaintiff had given his consent to defendant to permit the water escaping from the ditch, the waste gates or spills, and the ditch system to run over and upon his land, and had not revoked such consent at the time the action was commenced; that there had been no leakage or seepage through the banks of the ditch or alleged reservoir; and that defendant had not been guilty of malice or negligence. As conclusions of law, the court found that the alleged reservoir did not constitute a reservoir, within the meaning of § 974, Rev. Stat. 1899; that the consent of plaintiff aforesaid amounted to a complete defense to the action; and that defendant was not liable for the injury caused by seepage through the soil, but not escaping through the banks, the same not being the result of negligence on the part of the defendant.

It appears from the evidence that plaintiff is the owner of 160 acres of land situated on the northerly side and in the immediate vicinity of Shoshone river, from which stream the defendant, in the year 1900, constructed an irrigating ditch or canal; taking the ditch out at a point on such stream somewhere to the west or southwest of plaintiff's land, and running the same in a general northeasterly direction. The ditch does not cross plaintiff's land, but passes the same within a comparatively short distance from its west and north boundaries. As the ditch approaches a point about 2,500 feet west of plaintiff's land, it intersects the southern bank of what was theretofore a dry gulch, across which, and evidently near its eastern or southeastern extremity, the defendant constructed a dam or embankment about 20 feet in height, into which gulch, above the dam and on the side opposite plaintiff's land, the water carried in the ditch flows, thereby forming a lake or reservoir. The water therein backs up the gulch approximately 2,000 feet, and is probably 12 or 15 feet deep at the dam. The length of the dam is about 360 feet. The ditch is continued from the other or northerly side of the gulch, whence it proceeds more sharply to the east for some distance, and then about due northeast, passing north of and away from the land of plaintiff. At one point this outlet ditch approaches within 300 feet of one corner of the land. The line of the ditch is along slightly higher ground than plaintiff's premises, and the slope is generally in the direction of those premises. Below the dam there is a natural depression in the ground, called a "dry wash," which originally constituted a continuation of the gulch, forming with it a natural drainage for the country above. That dry wash continues upon plaintiff's land, terminating thereon in a natural slough, which runs northeasterly through the southeastern portion of the land. For the purpose of allowing the escape of waste water, and to protect the dam aforesaid against floods and freshets, the defendant built in the ditch, at or near either end of the dam, waste ways or spills. The water overflowing, or flowing through such spills,—particularly the spill in the ditch on the northerly side of the gulch,—ran into the dry wash aforesaid, and upon the land of plaintiff, in such quantities, at times, that it flooded 63 acres thereof, rendering the same swampy; and in one or more places the water remained on the land, forming a pond. It appears that the dam was constructed with soil scraped from the gulch above, but subsequently that was supplemented with brush and timber backed up with dirt. The dam was originally about 100 feet wide at its base, which was later increased 40 or 50 feet. The evidence discloses that the exposed soil in the gulch was composed of sand and gravel, but there is no evidence as to the depth of such soil, or the character of the bottom of the gulch, as it was finally prepared to receive the water. The dam is apparently on a line with the lower bank of the canal on either side of the gulch, or connects therewith, so that the water is conveyed into the gulch and taken out immediately above the dam. It is evident, however, that the bottom of the gulch in the vicinity of the dam is several feet below the bottom of the ditch on either side, and hence a large body of water has been accumulated and retained therein.

It is clear, from the evidence, that the greater quantity of the water that flowed upon plaintiff's land and flooded it came over or through the spills, and principally, if not altogether, from the spill on the northerly side of the gulch. We think the evidence discloses that, until a few months prior to the trial, which occurred in December, 1903, a small quantity of water occasionally, if not continually, leaked through the embankment that was constructed across the gulch, which would naturally flow down the dry wash and into the slough on plaintiff's land, if sufficient in quantity. That leakage seems to have been entirely stopped at least three months previous to the trial; but none of the witnesses seem to have attached much, if any, importance to it as a factor in the injury complained of. The inference is strong that, had no other water escaped from the ditch or reservoir, the small amount that trickled through the dam would not have occasioned actual injury. The probabilities are that it might have proved beneficial to plaintiff. However that may be, there is no evidence that such leakage contributed in any appreciable degree to the alleged injury. We think that the only reasonable conclusion to be drawn from the evidence is that the flooding was caused by the water that flowed through or over the spills or waste gates. Indeed, that seems to have been the understanding of the witnesses on both sides. There is a decided conflict in the evidence as to the exact source of the seepage. It is not denied that water rose to the surface in one or more places on plaintiff's land from beneath, showing clearly the presence of water in the soil from seepage or percolation. Nor is it denied that such water came from the ditch of defendant. But the plaintiff's witnesses were of the opinion that both the reservoir and the outlet ditch situated north of the land in question were responsible for the seepage, while, in the opinion of the witnesses who testified in behalf of defendant, it all came from the ditch, and none of it from the reservoir. Such a matter is perhaps incapable of absolute proof. But we believe that the opinion expressed by the defendant's witnesses is the more reasonable one, in view of the facts. The location of the surface evidence of the seepage, in the first place, favors that opinion, which is greatly strengthened by the manner in which the ditch in that locality was constructed. The line of that ditch appears to be along a side hill to the northeast of plaintiff's land, and it was constructed partly by cutting through sand banks, and partly for some distance by scraping sand and gravel down the side of the hill to form the bottom and lower bank. Where the latter method of construction was adopted, the bottom of the ditch to the depth of 5 or 6 feet was composed entirely of sand and gravel so brought down and deposited upon a natural rock base to bring the ditch bottom up to the required level. The tendency of water flowing through a canal so constructed to percolate through the loose soil, and the proximity thereto of plaintiff's land where the evidence of seepage occurred, together with the natural slope of the ground, furnish a substantial basis for the opinion that the source of such seepage was the ditch, rather than the reservoir. The opinion that the water in the reservoir contributed to the seepage was based largely upon the fact that in the winter season, when water is not flowing in the ditch, ice forms upon the land, thus showing the continual presence of water coming up through the soil. Witnesses for the defendant, however, testified that, even after water had ceased to flow in the ditch, seepage therefrom would continue to appear on the surface of the land below, owing to the complete saturation of the soil from water flowing in the ditch during the several months of the irrigating season. The evidence would, we think, amply justify a finding that the ditch aforesaid was the source of the seepage; and the court probably intended so to find, although the findings are perhaps not definite on that point. But the defendant maintained, and its own witnesses testified, that it came from the ditch, owing to the manner of its construction. For that reason, and in view of the principles upon which this case must be decided, it will be unnecessary to determine whether any of the injury caused by seepage was or was not the result of percolation from the reservoir. The trial court held that the accumulation of water in the gulch by the means above explained did not constitute a reservoir, within the meaning of § 974, Rev. Stat. 1899, which declares that "the owners of reservoirs shall be liable for all damages arising from the leakage or overflow of the waters therefrom, or by floods caused by breaking of the embankments of such reservoir." It will be unnecessary in this case, for reasons that will become apparent, to determine the precise degree of liability imposed by that statute. But, whatever the extent of such liability, we are clearly of the opinion that the use of the gulch in the manner stated constituted a reservoir, within the contemplation of the statute. The learned district court evidently considered the gulch as a part of the ditch, and the building of the embankment across it as a convenient contrivance merely for the conveying of the water to the place of ultimate use. No doubt, the company may have adopted the plan pursued with the view, largely or chiefly, of transferring the water to the other side of the gulch, and as a more feasible method than building a flume or running the ditch on grade around the sides of the gulch. Nevertheless the fact remains that the plan put in operation resulted in the creation of a somewhat extensive basin, wherein a large body of water was artificially collected and retained. The witnesses generally referred to the water thus inclosed as a lake or reservoir. Water remains therein the entire year. Not only is the retention of water in such basin a necessary consequence of the operation of defendant's irrigating works, but that result was evidently intended. The outlet ditch is provided with a head gate, supposedly for the purpose of shutting out the water from that ditch and thus, when desired, preventing its flowing out of the gulch; and Mr. Welch, the company's secretary, testified that after the close of the irrigating season of 1903 the outlet ditch was closed, and the reservoir filled up for winter use.

As ordinarily defined, a reservoir is a place where water collects naturally, or is stored for use when wanted, as to supply a fountain, a canal, or a city, or for any other purpose. Century Dict. Further argument seems unnecessary to show that this body of water, maintained by the defendant, constitutes a reservoir, not only according to accepted definitions and the general understanding, but within the meaning of the 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

statute. A contrary view would, it seems to us, violate the terms and object of that statute. The error of the trial court in that regard, however, cannot be held to have operated prejudicially to the plaintiff. As above suggested, the cause of the greatest injury was the escape of water through the spills. There could exist no doubt of defendant's liability to respond in damages for the injury so caused, in the absence of sufficient exonerating facts, whatever may be the responsibility of reservoir or ditch owners under the statute or at common law. Clearly, the defendant had no right to willfully or knowingly discharge the water from its reservoir in that manner upon plaintiff's land, unless, as it alleges, the plaintiff had consented thereto. Although the spills were confessedly constructed to carry off waste water, and to guard against injury to the dam, reservoir, and ditch from freshets and floods, it appears that more or less water frequently, if not habitually, poured out through cracks or openings in the spills, and at times large quantities,—sufficient, as some witnesses testify, to irrigate four or five places of the size of plaintiff's tract. Some effort appears to have been made from time to time to avoid or lessen such flow of water by more perfectly closing the cracks in the spills, but such efforts do not seem to have entirely prevented the escape of water therefrom. Our understanding of the testimony is that the flooding of plaintiff's land from that source was not so much the result of a large amount of water flowing down on any single occasion, but, rather, a frequent or continual flow, that eventually saturated the land far beyond its power of absorption, thus rendering it swampy and in an unfit condition for cultivation or even grazing purposes, though there is considerable evidence to the effect that it was capable of drainage at comparatively small expense, and of being thereby brought into good condition. The only defense asserted in avoidance of liability for the damage thus occurring is that the plaintiff consented that defendant might permit the water so to flow through the spills and upon his land. Upon that question the evidence is conflicting, with the preponderance clearly favoring the defendant's claim. Three witnesses, including the manager of defendant company, testified that the plaintiff had, with knowledge of the manner in which the water was so escaping, verbally directed the officers and employees of the company to make no provision for diverting it from his land, but to allow the same to flow thereon. The manager testified that he proposed to plaintiff that the company would divert such water from his land by digging drainage ditches, but the plaintiff told him to let the water run, and he would take care of it. This is corroborated by the testimony of a son of the manager. At a later period, according to the testimony of another employee of the company, who had observed the escape of the water from the spills, he was directed by plaintiff to allow the same to flow down and upon his land, who stated that he could use it. There is no evidence of a subsequent withdrawal of such consent or direction, or of any notification by plaintiff to defendant to keep the water from his land. On the contrary, the plaintiff testified that he acceded to the suggestion for digging drainage ditches, and indicated to the manager of defendant where such ditches could be made. It is admitted that there was some conversation between such manager and the plaintiff with reference to a proper location for a drainage ditch, but the former testified that it had reference only to a ditch which the company constructed to prevent water flowing upon the adjoining land of the plaintiff's brother. The plaintiff also denied having the later alleged conversation with the other employee. The foregoing brief statement of the substance only of the evidence on this subject is sufficient, we think, to show the conflict in the testimony, and that the trial court was justified in finding that the plaintiff had consented as alleged, so far as the water is concerned which escaped at the spills. We find no justification for finding that the consent applied to water otherwise escaping from defendant's irrigating works. It is perhaps reasonable to assume that, when the plaintiff gave his consent and directions as alleged, and thereby induced the company to refrain from taking the necessary and proposed precautions to prevent the escaping water from going upon his land, there was no anticipation on his part of the injurious consequences which followed. But the company cannot be held answerable for plaintiff's failure to foresee the detrimental result of his consent; it being free from fraud, misrepresentation, or malice. The proposal of the manager of defendant to divert the water from plaintiff's land does not appear to have been the result of complaint by the latter, but, on the contrary, to have proceeded from a desire on the part of such official to prevent possible injury to the plaintiff. The defendant having offered to construct drainage ditches, if permitted to do so, to divert the water coming from the spills away from plaintiff's land, but the latter, instead of acquiescing in such offer, having directed and authorized the defendant to allow the water to flow upon his land, his directions and conduct in that respect amounted to a waiver of his right to recover for the damage alleged to have been caused by such flowage. Griffin

v. Lawrence, 135 Mass. 365. Having consented and directed that the water be allowed to go upon his premises, it was his duty, when injury subsequently became manifest, to call the defendant's attention to the matter and withdraw his consent. No doubt, had he done so in apt time, much, if not all, of the damage so occurring might have been averted. It is fair, at least, to assume that defendant would have done its duty in that regard. The refusal of the trial court, therefore, to award damages against defendant for the injury to plaintiff's land caused by the flowing of water over and upon the same from the spills and reservoir, must be sustained.

This brings us to the question of seepage. The findings of fact upon that subject are as follows: "That, by reason of the construction and maintenance of said ditch by defendant company, water has seeped, percolated and escaped through the soil, rising and coming to the surface on plaintiff's said land, over about 21 acres thereof, and that plaintiff's said land has not been permanently injured thereby; that plaintiff suffered damages thereby in the sum of $105; that the said ditch and the embankments thereof, including the embankment across said gulch and the waste gates thereto, were properly constructed by said defendant, and that there is no leakage or seepage through the banks thereof; that said defendant was and is not guilty of any malice or negligence in the construction, operation, or maintenance thereof." Upon the facts so found, the court stated the following conclusion of law: "That for any seepage from said ditch system, not escaping through the banks of said ditch and embankment, but percolating through the soil and rising to the surface at a distance from said ditch,—the same not being the result of any negligence of defendant company, and it being impossible in any manner to guard against the same,—the defendant company is not liable." The number of acres found to have been injured through seepage appears to be a fair and reasonable deduction from the evidence, and the same, we think, is true respecting the finding as to the amount of damage from that cause. There is considerable conflict in the evidence regarding damages; such conflict covering the value of the land before and after the injuries complained of, the amount of the actual damage to the land, and the permanency of the injuries. The witnesses for the respective parties differed widely as to those matters. Those who testified for the defendant were generally of the opinion that, because of the naturally wild and sandy condition of the land, it had been permanently benefited by the flooding received; suffering only temporary ill effects, capable of being overcome by drainage at very moderate expense. And the court found as a fact that the land had not been damaged in any sum whatever, except in the sum of $105, as above mentioned, on account of the seepage. In estimating the damage from seepage, the sum of $5 per acre was evidently allowed, which we think sufficiently large, under the evidence, to prevent its being disturbed on this appeal.

While maintaining that the proof shows negligence on the part of defendant, counsel for plaintiff in error contends that the trial court erroneously held that negligence was a necessary element of liability. The rule of absolute liability is insisted on in case of injuries caused by either reservoirs or ditches. In Colorado, where they have a statute, as in this state, declaring the owners of reservoirs liable for all damages from leakage or overflow, or by floods caused by breaking of the embankments, the court of appeals, without deciding whether or not the statute is absolute, and imposes responsibility regardless of conditions or circumstances, held it sufficiently absolute to relieve the plaintiff from alleging and proving negligence, and to cast upon defendant the burden of showing exonerating facts, if any; the damage and cause having been established. Larimer County Ditch Co. v. Zimmerman, 4 Colo. App. 78, 34 Pac. 1111. We are, however, relieved in this case from determining the extent of liability in relation to reservoirs, for the reason that the injurious seepage was shown to come from the ditch, and not the reservoir, by the preponderance of the evidence, as we think, as well as for another reason, about to be explained.

We have no statute defining the responsibility of ditch owners for injuries caused by escaping water. It is provided that they shall carefully maintain the embankments of the ditches, so that the waters thereof may not flood or damage the premises of others. Rev. Stat. 1899, § 901. And a ditch company is expressly required to keep the banks of its ditch in good repair, so that the water shall not be allowed to escape, to the injury of any mining claim, road, ditch, or other property located and held prior to the location of the ditch. Id. § 3069. There is also a provision authorizing the state engineer to inspect, during construction, any ditch, canal, or other work carrying more than 50 cubic feet of water per second of time, and to order such alterations or additions deemed necessary for the security of the work, or the safety of persons residing on or owning land in the vicinity of such works. Id. § 932. And such inspection may be requested, upon certain conditions, by any such resident or landowner. Id. § 933. By these provisions the legislature has shown a scrupulous desire to protect against unreasonable injury from water conveyed through ditches, but they clearly fall short of imposing upon a ditch owner the burden of an insurer. The statutes require the exercise of care in the construction and maintenance of the embankments of a ditch, and contemplate the exercise of that degree of care which a prudent man, with due regard for the rights of others and the risk of his undertaking, would exercise in conveying through an artificial channel a substance such as water, that possesses detrimental and destructive, as well as beneficial and productive, qualities, unless properly restrained. But that is clearly the rule, without statutory aid. The failure to specifically require the observance of care in constructing and guarding the bottom of a ditch cannot be regarded as an exemption from liability, should damage be caused through negligence in that respect. The construction and operation of an irrigation ditch, either by an individual or corporation who has taken the necessary steps to acquire an appropriation of water, is a lawful enterprise: and, so far as the evidence discloses, the defendant had a lawful right to construct and maintain its ditch over the line traveled by it, and to convey water through the same to the place of use. This case, therefore, is unlike that of Clear Creek Land & Ditch Co. v. Kilkenny, 5 Wyo. 38, 36 Pac. 819, where liability for damage from seepage was upheld on the ground that the ditch was constructed across the land of the plaintiff without authority, no right of way therefor having been obtained. The well-settled rule is that the owner of an irrigating ditch is bound to exercise reasonable care and skill to prevent injury to other persons from such ditch, and he will be liable for all damages occurring to others as a result of his negligence or unskillfulness in constructing, maintaining, or operating the ditch. Long. Irrigation, § 68; 3 Farnham, Waters, § 634; 17 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 512; Lisonbee v. Monroe Irrig. Co. 18 Utah, 343, 72 Am. St. Rep. 784, 54 Pac. 1009; King v. Miles City Irrig. Ditch Co. 16 Mont. 463, 50 Am. St. Rep. 506, 41 Pac. 431; Jenkins v. Hooper Irrig. Co. 13 Utah, 100, 44 Pac. 829; Shields v. Orr Extension Ditch Co. 23 Nev. 349, 47 Pac. 194; Kearney Canal & Water Supply Co. v. Akeyson, 45 Neb. 635, 63 N. W. 921; Chidester v. Consolidated Ditch Co. 59 Cal. 197; McCarty v. Boise City Canal Co. 2 Idaho, 245, 10 Pac. 623; Turpen v. Turlock Irrig. District, 141 Cal. 1, 74 Pac. 295; Stuart v. Noble Ditch Co. (Idaho) 76 Pac. 255; Emison v. Owyhee Ditch Co. 37 Or. 577, 62 Pac. 13. The principle is stated in Gould on Waters as follows: "A person may lawfully collect water by means of a dam, or in ditches, canals, culverts, or pipes, and is not liable in such a case for injuries caused by the escape of the water, in the absence of negligence on his part. . . . If the injury is caused by hazardous experiments, by the imperfect construction of a dam or canal embankment, or negligence in maintaining it, or in opening flood gates, the owner is liable." Gould, Waters, § 298. "The measure of the care which the ditch owner is bound to use is that which ordinarily prudent men exercise under like circumstances when the risk is their own. And if he fails to exercise this degree of care, he is liable for the injuries which the water causes to the adjoining property in consequence of his negligence." 3 Farnham, Waters, § 634. The construction of ditches is one of the customary and recognized methods of appropriating water, and conveying the same for use in irrigation and for other necessary purposes. It is the method more generally, and, indeed, almost universally, employed. While those engaged in such an undertaking, attended with possible risks to others, should be answerable for the conduct thereof with diligence proportioned to the apparent risk, there is no substantial reason, we think, for holding them accountable as insurers, nor for injuries not attributable to some fault or negligence on their part. Occasional expressions may be found in judicial opinions apparently tending toward a more stringent rule. But examination will disclose in most, if not all, of such cases, where statutory provisions have not intervened, that liability was upheld on the theory of negligence. That we understand to be the effect of the case of Shields v. Orr Extension Ditch Co. 23 Nev. 349, 47 Pac. 194, much relied on by counsel for plaintiff in error. The Nevada court there sustained the refusal of certain instructions drawn upon the theory that the defendant might recover if it had not been guilty of negligence. The decision was, however, based on the ground that the uncontradicted testimony showed the existence of negligence, and hence the instructions were held inapplicable and misleading.

The district court therefore properly held that the plaintiff could not recover for the damage from seepage unless the same was shown to have resulted from the negligence of defendant. We think, however, that the evidence does not support the finding of no negligence. As already explained, the ditch from the reservoir runs along a side hill above the premises of plaintiff, where at least in one place a cut was made through sand banks, and in two or three places a fill was made by scraping sand and gravel down from the side of the hill to form the bottom and lower bank of the ditch; thus bringing the bottom some 5 or 6 feet above the natural level of the ground. The seepage complained of most probably came from the parts of the ditch so constructed. The engineer in charge of its construction testified that, in his opinion, the seepage came from the cut through the sand banks, and that was also the opinion of the defendant's manager, on account, as he says, "of the loose condition of the sand banks." It appears that, at the time of construction, water was turned in and teams used in an endeavor to tramp the earth solid; but whether the company made any such endeavors after commencing the operation of the ditch, and the appearance of the seepage on plaintiff's land, is not sufficiently disclosed. The defendant's witnesses testified that the seepage was becoming less each year, because of the natural washing down and deposit of sediment in the ditch, as a consequence of the flow of water therein during each irrigating season; and, while the evidence shows that the officers and agents of the company knew of the seepage, it fails to show, we think, sufficient, if any, precautions on the part of the defendant to prevent the same. It is true that the defendant's engineer testified that the canal was properly constructed, and on proper grade to carry the water. But that opinion is clearly insufficient to sustain the finding that there was no negligence, in the face of the fact that the water constantly seeped from the ditch, to the knowledge of defendant, as a result of its construction through unusually loose and porous soil, without proper effort to prevent it. Reed v. State, 108 N. Y. 407, 15 N. E. 735. We need not decide whether a ditch owner would be liable for temporary seepage that might be the usual and necessary incident of a new ditch constructed by excavation in the generally prevailing soil of the country and in the usual manner. The question in that case, even, would depend upon the existence or nonexistence of negligence. It appears that the ditch south of the reservoir was excavated in the earth, and did not seep; and there is sufficient evidence to show that the places in the ditch in question where the seepage occurred were constructed through or with such unusually loose and porous soil as to require at least active endeavor on the part of the defendant to render it reasonably capable of holding water. The great benefit to be derived from such enterprises as that of the defendant does not authorize the promulgation of a principle that will permit one tract of land to be reclaimed at the expense of the destruction of another without compensation. If the company saw fit to construct its ditch through soil naturally incapable of holding water, it should at least have made all proper and reasonable efforts to prevent seepage therefrom. Failing to do so, it was clearly negligent. Ibid.; Scott v. Longwell (Mich.) 102 N. W. 230; Shields v. Orr Extension Ditch Co. 23 Nev. 349, 47 Pac. 194; Turpen v. Turlock Irrig. District, 141 Cal. 1, 74 Pac. 295. In Reed v. State, 108 N. Y. 411, 15 N. E. 735, the New York court of appeals said: "The attempt to collect a large body of water into a limited space surrounded with a porous and gravelly soil, without taking adequate precaution to confine it to the receptacle prepared for it, was, upon the face of it, an inexcusable act of negligence in those having charge of such work, and cannot be justified under the known laws governing the motion of fluids." In the Michigan case above cited, recovery of damages was sought for injury caused by water seeping through the banks of a mill race. The damage occurred after the race had been emptied and cleaned, and water again turned into it. The court said: "In view of the undisputed fact that such a race was likely to leak on account of the scraping and cracks, I think that we could safely say, as a matter of law, that defendants were negligent in not taking proper precautions to prevent the water escaping. At any rate, defendants were bound to use care proportioned to the danger. If the question of defendants' negligence was one for the jury, the material circumstances to be considered by the jury were these: The probability of the escape of the water, and the precautions taken by defendants to prevent such escape." We do not think the evidence warrants the statement of the court, in its conclusion of law on this subject, that it was impossible for the defendant to guard against the seepage complained of. The seepage was continuous, not occasional or accidental. There is some testimony to the effect that the line of the ditch pursued the most practicable route, and that the plan of filling in along the depressions or low places was more advisable than fluming. Beyond that, no attempt is discerned to excuse or justify the defendant on the ground that the seepage, or the injury to plaintiff therefrom, could not have been avoided by the defendant, unless the admitted fact that water would usually seep through such loose soil as composed the bed and banks of the ditch at the points mentioned is to be viewed in that light. But if it be true that the ditch was constructed in such a place and manner, or through such soil, that it was impossible to prevent the continuous and large amount of seepage that occurred, or, at least, to avoid the injurious consequences thereof, then it might be difficult to find any reasonable basis for holding that the defendant had exercised the required diligence, care, and skill in constructing its canal.

Over the objection of the plaintiff, the court permitted the defendant to show, on cross-examination of plaintiff's witnesses, and also by the testimony of its own witnesses, that much, if not all, of the alleged injury to the land of plaintiff could be overcome by proper drainage. The object of the testimony was evidently to show that the land had not suffered permanent injury. It was clearly admissible for that purpose, as bearing upon the question of damages. There is no indication that it was admitted upon the theory that plaintiff had contributed to the injury by his failure to properly drain his premises.

Error is also assigned upon the action of the court in admitting testimony to the effect that the plaintiff had not notified the defendant that he had a claim against it for damages. The evidence was, we think, properly admitted. It was pertinent upon the disputed question of consent to the flowage of water through the spills, and tended to show that such consent had not been withdrawn. It also had a bearing upon the question of plaintiff's good faith in connection with certain other proof, viz., that, when he was approached by defendant's manager on the subject of compromise of the pending action, his only response was that the matter was out of his hands, and in the hands of his father, who appeared as one of plaintiff's chief witnesses.

The defendant being liable for the damages caused by the seepage, the plaintiff was entitled to judgment for the amount of that damage as found by the court, viz., $105. It is unnecessary to remand the cause for a new trial, as a proper judgment can be entered upon the facts found and sustained by the evidence.

The judgment will be reversed and vacated, and the cause remanded, with directions to the District Court to enter judgments for the plaintiff and against the defendant for the sum of $105 and costs.

1. Railroad consolidation—one named in statute.

The naming of one railroad corporation with which another is empowered by statute to consolidate does not preclude a consolidation with others, where the statute continues, "and any transportation company now or hereafter incorporated by the laws of the United States or any of the states thereof."

2. Authority to consolidate—in what statute.

Authority of a railroad company to consolidate with another for the purpose of forming a through line across the state may be found in the provisions of the statute authorizing the latter company to form a consolidation with others, and need not of necessity be inserted in its own charter, or a statute passed with special reference to it.

3. Intent to authorize consolidation.

In determining whether or not a particular railroad company has been empowered to consolidate with others, the expressed purpose of the legislature to create a through line across the state, and to connect with roads in other states, is to be taken into consideration.

4. Majority stockholders—power to consolidate.

An alteration of the charter of a corporation, impairing the obligation of the contract, is not effected by authorizing a majority of the stockholders to consolidate with another, and acquire the interests of dissenting stockholders under the right of eminent domain.

5. Eminent domain—taking minority stock.

The stock of dissenting stockholders in a railroad company may be taken by right of eminent domain upon payment of just compensation, for the purpose of effecting a consolidation of the road with others to

I. Introduction.

This note has been confined, designedly, to cases in the United States.

The reasons for omitting the English cases relating to the question under annotation are those stated by the late Chief Justice Doe, of New Hampshire, in the course of one of the most elaborate discussions to be found in the reports, of the rights and remedies of minority stockholders who dissent from proposed radical innovations upon the corporate scope and purposes authorized by legislative acts. He utters a warning against the use, in this class of cases, of the English and American colonial decisions as precedents under post-revolutionary constitutional governments. After referring to the remark of Selden, J., of the New York court of appeals, in Buffalo & N. Y. City R. Co. v. Dudley, 14 N. Y. 336, 355, that the earlier case in that state, of Hartford & N. H. R. Co. v. Croswell, 5 Hill, 383, 40 Am. Dec. 354, is in direct conflict with several English cases, Judge Doe calls attention to some fundamental differences between conditions in England and conditions in the United States. Parliament, he says, having authority to make any person a member of any incorporated or unincorporated partnership without his consent, and to make any alteration in his helpless condition, the question in English courts being merely whether Parliament intended to exercise that power, the decisions of that question are inadvertently cited in a manner that tends to throw doubt upon all 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

constitutional security of private rights, and to countenance the idea that the people of New York are living under a government as absolute as the one they cast off when they ceased to be subjects of Great Britain. Cases in which a construction is given to the exercise of the unlimited power of Parliament, without occasion to consider the legal nature of legislative power, and without regard to the question whether the absolute sovereignty exercised in a particular instance is legislative, judicial, or executive, or neither, have a tendency, so far as they are followed in this country, to obliterate an essential feature of American government, and to re-establish the arbitrary dominion that was extinguished in this state (New Hampshire) by the Constitution. The argument from British precedent begs the question of legislative authority, and takes it for granted that the people of New Hampshire who went through the Revolution for rights of life, liberty, and property, which they considered natural, essential, and inherent, proceeded deliberately, at the close of the struggle, to set up a government as despotic as the one they overthrown. The usage of the American colonies and states before the adoption of constitutional limitations has been a misleading precedent. Under the nonlegislative reign of Parliament, and the preconstitutional government of this state, there was no limit to governmental power to be decided or considered by the court. On the question of power, English precedent and preconstitutional practice in this country establish either boundless despotism or nothing. Dow v. Northern R. Co. 67 N. H. 1, 36 Atl. 510.

The power of eminent domain is the most far-reaching and the greatest of all the powers of sovereignty. In constitutional governments it is limited by only two restrictions, viz.: It can be exercised only for the public benefit, and the property taken must be paid for according to its value.

The necessities of the public are supreme, and private rights must yield to them. State, Van Reipen, Prosecutor, v. Jersey City, 58 N. J. L. 262, 33 Atl. 740.

create a through line and subserve the interests of the public.

6. Estoppel—of stockholder to defeat consolidation.

A stockholder of a railroad company, dissenting from an attempt to consolidate the road with others, who, instead of taking prompt steps to prevent such consolidation, waits until after it is an accomplished fact and vast public and private interests have attached under the new conditions, will not be permitted to come into a court of equity for a forfeiture of the corporate charter, the appointment of a receiver, and the rescission of the merger, but will be remitted to his action under the statute for compensation for his stock.

(December 6, 1904.)

The right of the state to take property is an absolute and inherent one, restricted only by the Constitution in the feature that compensation must be made for the taking. It is an attribute of political sovereignty, and the Constitution affects only the mode of its exercise. Neither in the organic law, nor upon principle, is there any limitation upon legislative action other than that it shall be in the direction of public utility. People v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. 117 N. Y. 150, 22 N. E. 1026.

The right of eminent domain rests upon the principle that individual interests must be subservient to that of the public, and they must yield when public necessities require. This, however, in constitutional governments is not to be done but upon compensation. The principle is broad enough to include all kinds of property. Enfield Toll Bridge Co. v. Hartford & N. H. R. Co. 17 Conn. 40, 42 Am. Dec. 716, 17 Conn. 454, 44 Am. Dec. 556.

The principle underlies all forms of government, that for ends of the public utility and good all other ends should yield. People v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. 117 N. Y. 150, 22 N. E. 1026.

The right to take private property for public use without the consent of the owner, called the right of eminent domain, belongs, alone, to the sovereign. It embraces all cases where, by the authority of the state and for the public good, the property of the individual is taken without his consent for the purpose of being devoted to some particular use, either by the state in its sovereign capacity, or by a corporation, public or private, or by a private citizen to whom such right has been granted by the state. Consumers' Gas Trust Co. v. Harless, 131 Ind. 446, 15 L. R. A. 505, 29 N. E. 1062.

The right of eminent domain rides over every other. It may, indeed, be truly said that this jus publicum, this eminent domain, is the law of the existence of every sovereignty. It is as vital to it as air to animal life; and hence, it has no limit 1 L.R.A.(N.S.)

A PPEAL by plaintiffs from a judgment of the Superior Court for Wake County in favor of defendants in an action brought to rescind a consolidation of certain railroad lines. Affirmed.

Statement by Connor, J.:

This is an appeal by the plaintiffs from a judgment upon a demurrer ore tenus at the October term, 1904, of the superior court of Wake county. The feme plaintiff, Ida T. Spencer, alleged: That she was the owner of seven shares of stock in the defendant corporation, the Raleigh & Gaston Railroad Company, of the par value of $100 each; that she acquired the said stock in 1887, and has owned the same continuously to the date of the institution of this action; that said stock is represented but the necessities of the body politic, of which that body alone must be the judge. It is absolute over the persons as well as the property of its members. It commands the sacrifice of life as well as the surrender of possessions; and it would be strange, indeed, if to that sovereignty which can compel me to lay down my life in its service, the power should be denied of taking my property for its uses. At this time of day it is too late to set up any barrier to that power. It has been in constant exercise since the existence of society, and must continue unrestricted so long as society shall last. Tucker, P., in Tuckahoe Canal Co. v. Tuckahoe & J. River R. Co. 11 Leigh, 42, 76, 36 Am. Dec. 374.

For the purposes of this note, it is taken for granted that the power of eminent domain operates alike upon natural and artificial persons, and to condemn corporate as well as individual property; that this sovereign power can be exercised only by virtue of an act of the legislature, which, to be constitutional, must provide for just compensation to the owner of the property condemned; and that the purpose for which, alone, any property can constitutionally be taken, must be a public one. But it is also assumed, notwithstanding some possible exceptions where peculiar constitutional language clothes the judicial branch of the government with power to adjudge whether or not the purpose for which property is sought to be condemned is a public one, that the well-established and widely recognized rule upon the subject is, in general, that the decision of the legislature as to what constitutes a public purpose is final and conclusive, when the question admits of any doubt whatever (State v. Noyes, 47 Me. 189); or, as the New Jersey court of errors and appeals stated it in Tide-Water Co. v. Coster, 18 N. J. Eq. 518, 90 Am. Dec. 634, and repeated it in Black v. Delaware & R. Canal Co. 24 N. J. Eq. 455, that it is one of the legislative prerogatives to decide the important question whether an enterprise or by certificate No. 1,644, bearing date of April 13, 1887. "(2) That the defendant the Raleigh & Gaston Railroad Company was created and organized under an act of the general assembly of North Carolina (chap. 25, p. 17, of the Acts of 1835-36), and has since that day continuously exercised the corporate powers thereby conferred, until the alleged merger of said corporation in what is known as the Seaboard Air Line Railway. (3) That the said Raleigh & Gaston Railroad Company, acting under and by virtue of certain alleged and assumed powers attempted to be granted under an act of the general assembly of the state of Virginia, has endeavored to merge and consolidate itself with certain other railroads under the corporate name of the Seaboard Air Line

Railway, and has become the alleged holding corporation in respect to said other subsidiary corporations; that such alleged merger and consolidation was and is ultra vires, and beyond the corporate powers of said Raleigh & Gaston Railroad Company, and is invalid and void in so far as the plaintiffs are concerned. (4) That at a meeting of the stockholders of the said Raleigh & Gaston Railroad Company held in the city of Raleigh on May 20, 1901, in pursuance of a notice, a copy of which is hereto attached as part of this complaint, a majority of said stockholders undertook and attempted to take such action as would result in the merger and consolidation of said corporation as aforesaid; that said notice did not warrant such action; that at said meeting the said Ida scheme of improvement be of such public utility as to justify a resort for its furtherance to the exercise of the power of taxation or eminent domain. Primarily the judiciary has no concern in such matters. And not only this, but, if the public interest be involved to any substantial extent; and if the project contemplated can, in any fair sense, be said to be promotive of the welfare or convenience of the community, the legislative adoption of such project is a determination of the question from which there is no appeal, and over which no other branch of the government has any supervision whatever.

The question as to what constitutes a public purpose warranting an exercise of the power of eminent domain is conceived to lie beyond the scope of this note.

II. Relation of stockholder to his associates and the corporation.

The relations of stockholders among themselves and to the body politic are contractual.

When one takes stock in a corporation one contracts with the company that his interest shall be subject to the direction and control of the corporate authorities to accomplish the objects of the organization. He does not agree that the enterprise to which he has subscribed may be changed in its purposes and character at the will and pleasure of a majority of the stockholders, so that new responsibilities, and it may be, new hazards, are added to the original undertaking. He may be very willing to embark in one enterprise, and unwilling to engage in another. Clearwater v. Meredith (Ferguson v. Meredith) 1 Wall. 25, 17 L. ed. 604.

Early in the 19th century, in what Chief Justice Andrews of Connecticut more recently characterized as a leading and perhaps the earliest case in which the reciprocal obligations of a corporation and its stockholders are discussed, Chancellor Kent, of New York, enunciated and applied the principle that a fundamental change in the purposes and business of a corporation could not be made by the majority of the shareholders without the consent of all and against the objections of some. Livingston v. Lynch, 4 Johns. Ch. 573.

It seems to be the settled law of America and England that any act of a corporation, or of the directors, or of a majority of the stockholders, which is not within the express or implied power of the charter of incorporation,—in other words, any ultra vires act,—is a breach of the contract between the corporation and each of the stockholders; and consequently any one or more of the stockholders may object thereto, and compel the corporation to observe the terms of the contract set forth in the charter. Byrne v. Schuyler Electric Mfg. Co. 65 Conn. 336, 28 L. R. A. 304, 31 Atl. 833.

If the charter gives the corporation no right or power to go into a new enterprise, any one stockholder has the right to object. The fact that the new enterprise will be profitable has nothing to do with the matter. Each stockholder has the right, at his pleasure, to stand on his contract. That it will be for his interest to do otherwise is for him alone to judge. By becoming a stockholder, he contracted that a majority of the stockholders should manage the corporate affairs within the proper sphere of the corporation, but no farther. Any attempt to use the funds or pledge the credit of the company beyond the legitimate scope of the charter is a violation of the contract which the stockholders have made with each other, and of the rights—the contract rights—of any stockholder who chooses to say, "I am not willing." It may be that it will be to his advantage, but he may not think so; and he has a legal right to insist that the company keep within its chartered powers. Central R. Co. v. Collins, 40 Ga. 582.

This is substantially repeated by the Illinois supreme court in Harding v. American Glucose Co. 182 Ill. 551, 64 L. R. A. 738, 74 Am. St. Rep. 189, 55 N. E. 577.

A change in the constitution of an associated company, which in effect substitutes

T. Spencer, by her attorney in fact, R. P. Spencer, appeared and protested against the action to be taken by a majority of said stockholders, and thereupon filed a written protest against such action, a copy of which is hereto attached as a part of this complaint; that prior to said meeting several other meetings had been held, at which plaintiffs were not present, and of which they had no notice, at which certain proceedings were had, which plaintiffs cannot state because the records of said corporation are not kept within the limits of the state, and plaintiffs have not been able to obtain access thereto; that the action of said meeting of May 20, 1901, was ultra vires and illegal and invalid and void as to the plaintiffs; that, after filing of said protest, said R. P. Spencer, for himself, and on behalf of said Ida T. Spencer, withdrew from said meeting, and was not present thereafter, and took no part in the proceedings. (5) That the said Raleigh & Gaston Railroad Company, so far as plaintiffs are concerned, has since the alleged merger and consolidation preserved its corporate identity and separate existence as a corporation, notwithstanding that since then it has nominally constituted an integral part of the so-called Seaboard Air Line Railway, and although it has not since then separately exercised its corporate powers and discharged its corporate duties; that it has not held any meeting of its stockholders or of its directors; that it has not published any statements of its receipts and disbursements; that it has not a new constitution, requires unanimous consent, and cannot be made without the assent or the whole body of the subscribers. Davies v. Hawkins, 3 Maule & S. 488.

There can be no consolidation of the stock of one corporation with that of another, so as to create a consolidated company composed of the stockholders of both corporations, without express statutory authority. To attempt such a scheme over the objection of a minority of the stockholders in either corporation is illegal and contrary to public policy. Tompkins v. Compton, 93 Ga. 520, 21 S. E. 79.

And this contract, like the contract created by the charter between the corporation and the state, is under constitutional protection.

A corporate charter is a contract, within the meaning of the Constitution of the United States, between the state granting and the corporation receiving it, the obligation of which it is beyond the power of the legislature to impair. The contract subsisting between the members of a corporate body and the corporation is equally protected by the Constitution. The doctrine that the legislature can confer upon any number of the stockholders who may own more than half the stock authority to accept charter amendments allows the charter to be altered in its most essential stipulations, not only without the approbation, but against the consent, of a great body of the corporators, thereby subjecting them to duties and responsibilities not imposed by their contract. This cannot be done without a clear violation of the Constitution. New Orleans, J. & G. N. R. Co. v. Harris, 27 Miss. 517.

Nothing is more certainly settled than that any fundamental alteration of a charter interferes with the rights of the corporators, and that no majority, however large, can compel any individual stockholder to submit. Kean v. Johnson, 9 N. J. Eq. 401.

After shareholders have contracted among themselves under legislative sanction, and expended their money in executing the mutual plan, a majority of their number cannot radically change the scheme, by virtue of 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

a legislative enactment; and a dissenting stockholder cannot be compelled to engage in a new and different undertaking, without impairing the obligation of the contract between the stockholders and with the state. This proposition is as well supported by every consideration of justice and right as it is firmly embedded in judicial decision. Black v. Delaware & R. Canal Co. 24 N. J. Eq. 455; Mills v. Central R. Co. 41 N. J. Eq. 2 Atl. 453.

The legislature cannot compel a stockholder to go into a new and distinct corporation without his consent, as such action is in violation of the contract resulting from the original charter. Deposit Bank v. Barrett, 11 Ky. L. Rep. 910, 13 S. W. 337.

It is well settled that two corporations cannot be consolidated, or one purchase the property and franchises of another, without the unanimous consent of the stockholders, even by legislative authority; for such a transaction works a fundamental change in the contract of the shareholders. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Howard, 15 Ky. L. Rep. 25.

No change in a corporation which violates any of the substantial statutory conditions as they existed when he became a shareholder or subscribed for his stock can bind him if he dissents, or can compel him to submit to the new order of things against his will. Tuttle v. Michigan Air Line R. Co. 35 Mich. 247.

A consolidation of corporations, even when authorized by statute, is cause for the discharge of the stockholders who refuse to consent to it. Shelbyville & R. Turnp. Co. v. Barnes, 42 Ind. 498.

The relation between a corporation and each of its stockholders is one of contract, and any material change in the powers or purposes of the corporation, not in aid of the original object, made without the consent of the stockholder, is not binding upon him, even when authorized by an act of the legislature. McCray v. Junction R. Co. 9 Ind. 359; Booe v. Junction R. Co. 10 Ind. 93.

These general propositions have commanded judicial favor in an extended line of decisions. Botts v. Simpsonville & B. C.

declared any dividends, but has subordinated itself to the management and control of the officers and directors of the said Seaboard Air Line Railway, although, as plaintiffs allege, it has done so contrary to law and in violation of its corporate duties and obligations. (6) That immediately prior to, or immediately after, said stockholders' meeting of May 20, 1901, the said Raleigh & Gaston Railroad Company, acting through certain officers and agents, of whom plaintiffs cannot procure definite information, attempted to sell and sold 1,828 shares of the stock of said Raleigh & Gaston Railroad Company, which was held in its treasury for certain definite purposes; that the same was not sold for such purposes, but was sold in violation of the duties of said officers and of the rights of the plaintiffs; that it was sold to certain parties whose names plaintiffs cannot ascertain, but who were directly interested in the organization of the said Seaboard Air Line Railway; that it was sold secretly, without being offered for subscription to the stockholders of said road, including the plaintiffs, or to the public, and without any opportunity for bidders to bid for same; that it was sold at a grossly inadequate price, and no account has ever been rendered in respect to its sale and purchase. (7) That, under the charter and amendments thereto of the said Raleigh & Gaston Railroad Company, it had no right or power to acquire stock of other corporations, nor to do any of the acts which it has attempted to do and has

But a stockholder's consent need not be express. It may and will be implied from want of promptitude in objecting. If the dissentient wait until the change has been completed, and fortunes expended upon it, and public interests created in it, he will be deemed to have acquiesced. Chapman v. Mad River & L. E. R. Co. 6 Ohio St. 119.

And if a statute be in force when the objecting stockholder takes stock, authorizing the corporation, by vote of the stockholders, to make the change to which he objects,—for instance, to consolidate,—he is deemed to have taken his stock subject to the operation of the statute; and its provisions make a part of his contract as shareholder. *Mayfield v. III. Remedies.

A dissenting stockholder may enjoin an unauthorized consolidation. Nathan v. Tompkins, 82 Ala. 437, 2 So. 747.

When it is proposed to consolidate two or more corporations, and the legislature consents, those stockholders who do not consent to enter the consolidated corporation are entitled to withdraw their shares of the capital stock, and may enjoin the consolidation till they are secured. State ex rel. Brown v. Bailey, 16 Ind. 46, 79 Am. Dec. 405.

The supreme court of Pennsylvania in 1858 considered the right of a stockholder to prevent a consolidation of his corporation with another, on his prayer for an injunction, and decided to grant the injunction until security should be given to the dissentient in double the market value of his stock, to pay for such stock when its actual value should be ascertained. Lauman v. Lebanon Valley R. Co. 30 Pa. 42, 72 Am. Dec. 685.

The chief justice who wrote for the court, after postulating the necessity of a legislative authority for a consolidation; the right of a private corporation to abandon its charter and dissolve itself; and that any radical change, such as a consolidation, in the corporate purposes, scope, and identity was, as to objecting stockholders, equivalent to a dissolution,—proceeded to discuss the effects of such a change when authorized by statute and proposed by a majority of the shareholders, and to consider what any single disapproving stockholder could say and do in opposition. Such a stockholder, said he, cannot object that the contract between the state and the corporation, created by the charter, is violated, since both parties to that contract had agreed to change it. He cannot object that the company is not discharging its public obligations, for the legislature has relieved it, and, the state having released it, he cannot object to a dissolution.

done in connection with said merger and consolidation; that said acts are unknown to plaintiffs in detail and in their entirety, and will be, if possible, ascertained and disclosed to this court during the progress of this action; that all of said acts and doings which have resulted in said so-called merger and consolidation have been ultra vires, contrary to law, and in derogation of the manifest and inherent rights and privileges of the plaintiff Ida T. Spencer as a stockholder in said corporation. (8) That, if the said Raleigh & Gaston Railroad Company had maintained and discharged its separate duties as a corporation created and existing under the laws of North Carolina, the said stock of the plaintiff Ida T. Spencer would have largely increased in value, and would now have been a valuable asset of said plaintiff, but that the said Raleigh & Gaston Railroad Company having undertaken to purchase the stock of other corporations and operate the same as a so-called holding corporation, having issued bonds to an amount at present unknown to plaintiff, having assumed the debts of many other corporations, having indorsed or guaranteed bonds of other corporations, having assumed the burden of extending lines of railway upon its own credit, all of which it has done, and done many other things which were ultra vires and destructive of plaintiff's rights in the premises as one of its stockholders, the said stock has been prevented from receiving the dividends the said road would otherwise have earned;

It is part of his contract that the corporation may dissolve itself; and, on dissolution, the rights and property, or their legal equivalents, are to be distributed among the members. But he may object that it is a violation of the contract between him and his associates to be one corporation for given purposes, that he invested for those purposes, and that the capital is being diverted. He may object that neither his co-corporators, nor the state, nor both united, are empowered to make a new contract for him, and to constitute him a member of a new corporation. Then what? In the instant case the corporation was a railroad, and its property and franchises were an indivisible unit. The objecting stockholder can no more force his fellow stockholders to go on with the old enterprise than they can compel him to enter a new one. And on dissolution, however effected, the only means of distributing an indivisible unit corporation's property and assets is by sale and distribution of the proceeds, or to allow one or more of the owners to take it and pay the others the value of their shares. Ibid.

The conclusion in this case was approved in Mowrey v. Indianapolis & C. R. Co. 4 Biss. 78, Fed. Cas. No. 9,891, but McDonald, J., therein criticized its reasoning in the following manner: The only American case which I have found which seems opposed to the proposition that no fundamental change, even though authorized by subsequent legislation, can be made in the charter of a private pecuniary corporation without the consent of all the stockholders, unless the charter itself has provided otherwise, is that of Lauman v. Lebanon Valley R. Co. 30 Pa. 42, 72 Am. Dec. 685. That "case decides that a single stockholder has no right to object to the consolidation of the company in which he holds stock with another railroad company. The learned chief justice who pronounced this decision cites no authority in support of it. His reasoning on it seems to me not very satisfactory. It may be a right under Pennsylvania laws touching railroad corporations. But it is singularly inconsistent with the judgment rendered in the case, which was that the 1 L.R.A. (N.S.) complainant could not be made a stockholder against his will in the consolidated company; and that the consolidation should be enjoined till he was secured in the payment of the value of his stock. Why enjoin the consolidation at all if he had no right to object to it? His objection in that case seems to have been pretty effectual."

When the majority of the stockholders of a corporation, against the will of the minority, sell all the corporate property, thereby working a practical dissolution, the minority stockholders are not bound to take in payment for their stock a pro rata share of the proceeds of the sale, or, in substitution therefor, the stock of another corporation, but, at their election, may have from the proceeds of sale, whether it be money or property, the market value of their stock at the date of the sale, or their proportionate share of such proceeds; or they may, if they choose, follow the property into the hands of the purchaser, and share in the profits arising from its use in the same ratio that they would have shared if the sale had not been made. If the transaction was tainted with bad faith, they may, under some circumstances, have it set aside, and, if diligent, have an injunction against proceeding. Tanner v. Lindell R. Co. 180 Mo. 1, 103 Am. St. Rep. 534, 79 S. W. 155.

If, against the consent of any shareholder, an association transfers its assets to a corporation in exchange for stock therein, the dissenting shareholder is entitled to a receivership of the assets, and to recover of those making the exchange the full value of his interest. Frothingham v. Barney. 6 Hun. 366.

When a consolidation of railroad companies is unauthorized as to an objecting stockholder, and is consummated by a wrongful appropriation of his equitable interest by the consolidated corporation, that body becomes equitably liable to him for the value of his stock. International & G. N. R. Co. v. Bremond, 53 Tex. 96.

It was the view taken by the Massachusetts supreme court in 1856, that, if a purely private corporation, which is under no obligation to the public to exercise its franchise, that if the said Raleigh & Gaston Railroad Company had been operated as a separate and distinct corporation, as it was originally chartered, and as it was intended that it should be, the plaintiff's stock would have produced for her large dividends during the past few years, whereas, owing to the illegal and destructive acts hereinbefore mentioned, her stock has produced for her no dividends whatsoever. (9) That the value of plaintiff's stock is not measureable in any degree by its present market value, because it has none, nor by its antecedent market value, which is not pertinent to this controversy; that the effect of the merger and consolidation has been to completely destroy the corporate existence of said Raleigh & Gaston Railroad Company, in so far as the actors therein could affect such destruction, and to destroy completely the value of the plaintiff's said stock, both commercially and intrinsically. (10) That the said Raleigh & Gaston Railroad Company, or the officers thereof, if any there be, or the officers of the Seaboard Air Line Railway, have either destroyed the books, records, and papers of the said Raleigh & Gaston Railroad Company, or have removed them beyond the limits of the state, either of which acts is contrary to law and in derogation of the rights in the premises of the said Ida T. Spencer as a stockholder in said corporation. (11) That the said corporation, the said Raleigh & Gaston Railroad Company, has ceased to act under and in pursuance of its

and is empowered to dissolve and liquidate any time a majority of its shareholders so determine, decides to go out of business, it may employ the method of transferring its property and assets to another corporation as a mode of so doing, and, always providing the action is in good faith, may take in payment, in lieu of cash, stock in the purchasing corporation, to be distributed to such of its stockholders as elect to accept it for their holdings, the others being paid in money the value of their shares. Treadwell v. Salisbury Mfg. Co. 7 Gray, 393, 66 Am. Dec. 490.

The New York supreme court has since expressed the opposite opinion. Taylor v. Earle, 8 Hun, 1.

IV. Property subject to condemnation.

a. In general.

All private property, both tangible and intangible, is subject to the right of eminent domain. People v. Adirondack R. Co. 160 N. Y. 225, 54 N. E. 689.

Whatever exists which public necessity demands may be appropriated. State v. Noyes, 47 Me. 189.

Any property in existence, whatever its form, whether tangible or intangible, may be subjected to the exercise of the power of eminent domain, and may be seized and appropriated to the public use when necessity demands it. Metropolitan City R. Co. v. Chicago West Div. R. Co. 87 Ill. 317.

Strictly speaking, there is no such thing as an extinction of the right of eminent domain. If the public good requires, all kinds of property are alike subject to it,—as well that which is held under it as that which is not. Even contracts and legislative grants which are beyond the reach of ordinary legislation are not exempt. New York, H. & N. R. Co. v. Boston, H. & E. R. Co. 36 Conn. 196.

It is fully conceded that the right of eminent domain, the right of the sovereign, exercised in due form of law, to take private property for public use, when necessity requires it, of which the government must 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

judge, is a right incident to every government, and is often essential to its safety. And property is nomen generalissimum, and extends to every species of valuable right and interest, and includes real and personal property, easements, franchises, and incorporeal hereditaments. Even the term "taking," which has sometimes been relied upon as implying something tangible or corporeal, is not used in the Massachusetts Declaration of Rights; but the provision is this: Whenever the public exigencies require that the property of any individual should be appropriated to public uses, he shall receive a reasonable compensation therefor." Art. 10. Here again the term "appropriate" is of the largest import, and embraces every mode by which property may be applied to the use of the public. Whatever exists which public necessity demands may be thus appropriated. Boston & L. R. Corp. v. Salem & L. R. Co. 2 Gray, 1.

The word "property," in art. 10 of the Massachusetts Bill of Rights, which provides that, whenever the public exigencies require that the property of any individual shall be appropriated to public uses, he shall receive a reasonable compensation therefor, is understood to include every valuable interest which can be enjoyed as property and recognized as such. Old Colony & F. River R. Co. v. Plymouth County, 14 Gray, 155.

The power of the state to take private property for the public use reaches every description of property within its jurisdiction, even when acquired by grant from the state itself. Eastern R. Co. v. Boston & M. R. Co. 111 Mass. 125, 15 Am. Rep. 13.

Thus: The right of eminent domain may be invoked to condemn the riparian rights of a landowner through whose premises flows a stream, proposed to be diverted above and returned below his land, under a statute (N. D. Rev. Codes, § 5958, subd. 6) declaring that all classes of private property not enumerated may be taken for public use when such taking is authorized by law. Bigelow v. Draper, 6 N. D. 152, 60 N. W. 570.

charter and in compliance with its corporate duty and the laws of North Carolina for the two years last past, and since May 20, 1901; that thereby it has forfeited its charter, under the provisions of § 688 of the Code of North Carolina.

"Wherefore the plaintiffs demand judgment: (1) That the defendants the Raleigh & Gaston Railroad Company and the Seaboard Air Line Railway be required to disclose to this court as follows: When the attempted merger mentioned in this complaint went into effect, and what are its terms; what relation the defendant Raleigh & Gaston Railroad Company bore and now bears to said merger; what have been the annual receipts and disbursements of the said Raleigh & Gaston Railroad Company as a separate entity, and in its distinct and separate corporate capacity, from January 1, 1901, to this date; what have been its annual net profits during said period; what stock of other companies it has acquired or attempted to acquire; what bonds of other companies it has purchased or assumed or guaranteed or indorsed; to whom it sold said 1,828 shares of treasury stock, when, and at what price; to what uses or purposes the proceeds derived from the sale of said stock were applied; what disbursements it has made out of the funds of said Raleigh & Gaston Railroad Company, or otherwise, to effect such merger and consolidation, or in connection therewith or incidental thereto; who are the present corporate officers of the said Rail-

Under a statute authorizing a water company to acquire, by the exercise of the right of eminent domain, the plant, property, rights, and privileges of another corporation, if the authority is exercised, every item of property, if any, must be taken by the condemnation proceedings, and just compensation must be given for each. These include the real estate, the physical system, both real and personal, and all the franchises, rights, and privileges held by the condemned company, except its franchise to be a corporation. Kennebec Water District v. Waterville, 97 Me. 185, 60 L. R. A. 856, 54 Atl. 6.

Private corporations are no more secured in the absolute and uncontrollable enjoyment of their property and franchises granted by the sovereign power than are individuals who are possessed of property and privileges, independent of legislative grants. State v. Noyes, 47 Me. 189.

It is well settled that a franchise is property, and that it, as well as the property by means of which it exists, may be taken for public use. Alabama & F. R. Co. v. Kenney, 39 Ala. 307.

The authorities for condemning and taking corporate franchises are found in every state from the beginning to the present time. West River Bridge Co. v. Dix, 6 How. 507, 12 L. ed. 535; Richmond, F. & P. R. Co. v. Louisa R. Co. 13 How. 71, 14 L. ed. 55; Greenwood v. Union Freight R. Co. 105 U. S. 13, 26 L. ed. 961; *New Orleans Gaslight Co. v. At the session of 1899, p. 127, chap. 34, the legislature of this state incorporated the Richmond, Petersburg, & Carolina Railroad Company, a Virginia corporation, and, by virtue of said act, declared that said new corporation should succeed to all of the rights, etc., of the Virginia & Carolina Railroad Company, etc. By the provisions of an act of the general assembly of Virginia approved January 12, 1900, the Richmond, Petersburg, & Carolina Railroad Company was authorized, upon petition filed in the circuit court of Richmond, to change its name, etc. The said railroad company duly filed its petition in said court, praying that it be permitted to change its 36 Am. Dec. 374; James River & K. Co. v. Inompsen, 3 Gratt. 270.

Speaking of the power of eminent domain to reach and take property for the public use, the Supreme Court of the United States, on one occasion, said: We are aware of nothing peculiar to a franchise which can class it higher, or render it more sacred, than other property. A franchise is property, and nothing more. West River Bridge Co. v. Dix, 6 How. 507, 12 L. ed. 535.

The grant of a franchise is of no higher order and confers no more sacred title, than a grant of land to an individual; and, when the public necessities require it, the one, as well as the other, may be taken for public purposes on making suitable compensation. Richmond, F. & P. R. Co. v. Louisa R. Co. 13 How. 71, 14 L. ed. 55; Baltimore & F. Turnp. Road v. Baltimore, C. & E. M. Pass. R. Co. 81 Md. 247, 31 Atl. 854.

The property of corporations, even including their franchises, when that is necessary, may be taken for public use under the power of eminent domain, on making due compensation. Greenwood v. Union Freight R. Co. 105 U. S. 13, 26 L. ed. 961.

The rights and franchises which have become vested upon the faith of contracts which arise out of acts of incorporation can be taken by the public upon just compensation to the corporations, under the state's power of eminent domain. New Orleans Gaslight Co. v. Louisiana Light & H. P. & Mfg. Co. 115 U. S. 650, 29 L. ed. 516, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 252, per Harlan, J.

The power of the legislature to take the property and franchises of incorporated companies, and to apply them to another public use deemed more important, upon just compensation, is undeniable. Mobile & G. R. Co. v. Alabama Midland R. Co. 87 Ala. 501, 6 So. 404.

A franchise is an incorporeal hereditament known as a species of property, as well as any estate in lands. It is property which may be bought and sold; which will descend to heirs, and may be devised. The owner of such property may repose with the same security for its protection under 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

the wings of the Constitution; but we know not why he should expect any greater exemption from public burden than the owner of any other estate. If the owner of lands, buildings, and all property of like description must yield up that property for public use upon compensation, how is it that property of this kind claims a higher privilege, or is guarded by a stronger force? We know of no principle which limits the right of eminent domain to lands and other real estate. Enfield Toll Bridge Co. v. Hartford & N. H. R. Co. 17 Conn. 40, 42 Am. Dec. 716.

There is a fallacy in the argument to support the doctrine that a grant of corporate powers and privileges constitutes a contract of which the obligation is impaired when the legislature, exercising the right of eminent domain, condemns and takes away the franchise. The contract constitutes the franchise. All franchises emanating from the government are the results of contracts between the state and individuals. To say, therefore, that, although such franchises may be taken for public use upon compensation, and at the same time to insist that the contract or covenant by which they are created is unconstitutionally impaired, is an absurdity. Enfield Toll Bridge Co. v. Hartford & N. H. R. Co. 17 Conn. 454, 44 Am. Dec. 556.

All grants made by the state, although irrevocable, are subject to the right of eminent domain, unless it is expressly relinquished as in the case of the right of taxation. Illinois & M. Canal Co. v. Chicago & R. I. R. Co. 14 Ill. 314.

The exercise of the right of eminent domain over franchises and property held by corporations under a charter is of frequent occurrence. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. v. Lake, 71 Ill. 333.

Said Shaw, Ch. J., of Massachusetts, on one occasion: If the whole of a franchise should become necessary for the public use, I am not prepared to say that the right of eminent domain, in an extreme case, would not extend to and authorize the legislature to take it on payment of a full equivalent.

name to the Seaboard Air Line Railway Company, and pursuant to said petition an order was duly made by said court changing the name of said corporation in accordance with the prayer in said petition. By chapter 168, p. 463, Private Laws of 1901 of North Carolina, the Seaboard Air Line Railway Company, successor to the Richmond, Petersburg, & Carolina Railroad Company was empowered to exercise in this state all of the powers, etc., vested in the Richmond, Petersburg, & Carolina Railroad Company under its charter and amendments thereto, etc. It was also provided that, "with the approval of two thirds in amount of its stockholders given at any annual or special meeting . . . it may . . . lease, use, operate, consolidate with, or purchase, or otherwise acquire, . . . the Seaboard & Roanoke Railroad Company, or any railroad or transportation company now or hereafter incorporated," etc., " . . . and from time to time it may consolidate its capital stock, property . . . of any other such railroad or transportation company upon such terms as may be agreed upon by the respective companies, power being hereby granted to any railroad or transportation company or companies now or hereafter incorporated by or under any act of the general assembly of the state of North Carolina with the approval of a majority in amount of its stockholders respectively given at a meeting called for such purpose or at which all of the shares of capital stock are represented in person

Boston Water Power Co. v. Boston & W. R. Corp. 23 Pick. 360.

A franchise is subject to the same sovereign right of eminent domain by which the property and rights of all subjects and individuals are liable to be taken and appropriated to a public use, in the manner provided in the Constitution, whenever the legislature deems that the public exigencies require it. This principle is too well settled by the highest authority to be now open to question. Central Bridge Corp. v. Lowell, 4 Gray, 474.

It is held, said Cooley, J., of the Michigan supreme court, that, although a state grants a privilege in exclusive terms, it does not thereby bind its hands against such an exercise of the right of eminent domain as may annihilate the franchise for the benefit of another, when the terms of the first would exclude. East Saginaw Mfg. Co. v. East Saginaw, 19 Mich. 259, 2 Am. Rep. 82.

It must be regarded as settled in this state, said the New Hampshire supreme judicial court, in 1858, that, in the exercise of the power of eminent domain, any real estate, property, franchise, or easement of any corporation, however exclusive the grant, may be taken for public use, provided suitable compensation be made. This question has been so elaborately discussed in several cases in our own reports that it is unnecessary to repeat the discussion here. Crosby v. Hanover, 36 N. H. 404.

It cannot be doubted that the state legislature, under the power of eminent domain, can take the franchises of a corporation for public use upon making due compensation. And if all the franchises and property of a corporation, under the power of eminent domain, may be taken for public use, and thus the corporation in effect destroyed, upon making due compensation, it would seem to follow that one or more of its franchises might be taken, or that they might be impaired or their enjoyment interfered with to any extent, under the same power of eminent domain, upon making due compensation. Re Kerr, 42 Barb. 119.

The state, in the exercise of the right of eminent domain, or a corporation having the delegated power, is not bound to take the entire estate, but may take, and strictly should take, only such an interest and right as are necessary to be acquired to accomplish the public purpose in view. So long as the owner is compensated for the damages sustained, he has no cause of complaint; but he might, if more property, or a larger estate or interest, was taken than was required for public use, contend that his rights of property had been illegally invaded. Sixth Ave. R. Co. v. Kerr, 72 N. Y. 330.

The state has the same power over property granted to a corporation that it has over a like grant to a private individual,—no more, no less. Com. v. Pennsylvania Canal Co. 68 Pa. 41, 5 Am. Rep. 329.

In the opinion of the Pennsylvania supreme court, it is no longer open to controversy that the right of eminent domain extends to corporate franchises. Re Towanda Bridge Co. 91 Pa. 216.

The principle is well settled that a franchise is property, and, like any other species of property, may be taken by the commonwealth by virtue of the right of eminent domain, upon making compensation. Philadelphia & G. Ferry Pass. R. Co.'s Appeal, 102 Pa. 123.

"It would be an affectation of learning to cite the authorities which establish this principle." Ibid.

The principle that the measure of damages upon the condemnation of property is the market value at the time of the taking, and that, in arriving at this value, the past annual net profits from the use of the property cannot be considered, does not apply when the property is a bridge and the corporate franchises of the company which owns it. The property and franchises of such a corporation are represented by its stock, and the market value of the stock may be said to represent the market value of the property taken, as near as it can be ascertained. Montgomery County v. Schuylkill Bridge Co. 110 Pa. 54, 20 Atl. 407.

What reason is there, asks Lumpkin, J., of the supreme court of Georgia, for hold-or by proxy to make and carry out such contracts of consolidation or lease, sale, or other mode of acquisition or disposition," etc. Provision is made setting forth the terms of such contracts of lease, sale, etc., and requiring that a copy of the agreement be filed in the office of the secretary of state. The statute contains the following proviso: "Any stockholder who dissents from any such consolidation or sale may, within sixty days thereafter, apply by petition to the superior court of Warren county, or any county in this state of which the dissenting stockholder was a resident at the time of the ratification of this act, to determine the value of his stock, and shall be entitled to receive from said consolidated or purchasing corporation the value as thus determined of such stock upon transfer thereof to the new corporation; such value shall be assessed by a jury trial if the same be requested by either party; and, if the owner of said stock shall be a nonresident of this state application may be made to United States courts having jurisdiction."

The following notice was issued:

To the Stockholders of the Raleigh & Gaston Railroad: Notice is hereby given that a special general meeting of the stockholders of the above named Company will be held at its office in the City of Raleigh, N. C., on the 20th day of May, 1901, at 9 o'clock A. M., for the purpose of taking into consideration articles of agreement of ing a franchise more sacred than the land to which it is annexed? Or why should the rights of a company be more carefully protected than those of an individual? Shorter v. Smith, 9 Ga. 517.

b. Shares of stock.

There is a paucity of cases of the "red cow" order, but the power to take corporate stock by right of eminent domain is conceded, in terms, in New Hampshire and New Jersey, and, in the latter state by the Federal, as well as the state, court. Vide Dickinson v. Consolidated Traction Co. 114 Fed. 232.

In the exercise of the right of eminent domain the legislature may authorize shares in corporations and corporate franchises to be taken for public uses upon just compensation. The title to this species of property is no more secure against invasion when the public use requires than is the ownership of real estate. Black v. Delaware & R. Canal Co. 24 N. J. Eq. 455.

There can be no doubt that a railroad company may be empowered to extend its road beyond the point to which it was built under its original grant, if due compensation be provided for stockholders who resist it. There is no difference in principle whether the original company, in order to secure a through route under one management, is authorized to take the land of individuals, or to take the property which the individuals have in the stock of an existing road. In the first case, to establish a through route, one kind of property, viz., the land of individuals, is taken by the corporation; in the second case another kind of property, viz., shares of stock of individuals in another corporation, is authorized to be condemned. The use is as clearly public in the one as in the other case. Property in stock can claim no superior right to protection. It, with all other private property, is held subject to the right of eminent domain. Black v. Delaware & R. Canal Co. 24 N. J. Eq. 455.

domain for public purposes, and upon making due compensation to the owner. Mills v. Central R. Co. 41 N. J. Eq. 1, 2 Atl. 453. Inasmuch as the interest of unwilling stockholders, when a radical change in the scope and plan of a corporation is desired by a majority of the shareholders and authorized by an act of the legislature, cannot be taken or controlled in invitum, except by an exercise of the power of eminent domain, it is a legal conclusion from the lack, in the authorizing act, of any provision for condemning nonassenting shares by right of eminent domain, that the legislature, in enacting the statute, did not intend to exercise its power of eminent domain, but only to authorize the change to be made in case all the stockholders consented or transferred their shares by private contract. Ibid.

When a stockholder in a railroad corporation objects to a lease of the road for ninety-nine years to another railroad company, and such a lease has been authorized by statute and the consent of a majority of the shareholders, his objections may be obviated by taking his stock at its market value by an exercise of the power of eminent domain. Gregg v. Northern R. Co. 67 N. H. 452, 41 Atl. 271.

V. Some statutes in point.

In some instances an act of general legislation provides for the taking up of the shares of stockholders unwilling to engage in new enterprises, in which the majority of their associates desire to embark, and which have been authorized by law. A few of these acts will serve as types of this sort of legislation.

The act of Congress of July 12, 1882, provided (§ 5) for the appraisal, by a committee of three persons, of the national bank shares of stockholders in national banks who do not assent to amendments to the articles of association; for an appeal to the Comptroller of the Currency in case of dissatisfaction; and for payment by the bank of the value as a debt, surrender of merger and consolidation of the following named railroad companies: Seaboard Air Line Railway, the Raleigh and Gaston Railroad Company [and other corporations named], heretofore entered into by the directors of said respective companies, and at which meeting a vote by ballot will be taken for the adoption or rejection of said agreement.

By order of the Directors:

J. M. Sheerwood, Secretary.

The plaintiff filed the following protest:

To the Stockholders of the Raleigh & Gaston Railroad Company in Session at Raleigh, May 20, 1901, and to the President and Secretary of said company:

Mrs. Ida T. Spencer, upon whom notice was served of the meeting of stockholders of the Raleigh & Gaston Railroad Co., on May 20th, at 9 A. M., in Raleigh, to consider articles of agreement of merger and consolidation of a number of Ry. Companies, to wit, the Seaboard Air Line Ry., the Raleigh & Augusta Air Line Ry. Co., and others, appears by attorney in meeting the shares, and subsequent sale at public vendue.

Connecticut enacted, in 1895, a statute (chap. 232) providing that when any domestic railroad corporation should have acquired more than three fourths of the stock of any steamboat, ferry, bridge, wharf, or railroad company, and could not agree with the remaining stockholders for the purchase of their holdings; and it should be judicially found that such purchase would be for the public interest,—it might cause such outstanding stock to be appraised after the manner of appraising land condemned for railroad purposes; and upon payment of the appraised value, or depositing it as directed when payment could not be made, the stock and certificates should be surrendered and deemed canceled. The statute further gave the minority stockholder the reciprocal right to proceed in the case named if the railroad did not do so.

Inspired by the Connecticut statute just mentioned (Pub. Acts 1895, chap. 232), Mr. Leonard M. Daggett contributed to the Yale Law Journal of May, 1896 (5 Yale L. J. 205), a thoughtful paper upon the taking of corporate shares by right of eminent domain, the perusal of which may be commended to the reader.

The state of Massachusetts lately enacted a statute (Stat. 1900, chap. 426) first ratifying and confirming a lease between the Boston & Maine Railroad Company and the Fitchburg Railroad Company, theretofore approved by a majority of the stockholders in each road at meetings called for the purpose, and conferring the necessary power and authority to carry into effect; and, second, providing that the asonly to protest against such action, and does hereby protest against the consideration of said agreement, or of the adoption of the same, as being ultra vires, and injurious to and in derogation of her rights as a stockholder.

Respectfully,

R. P. Spencer, Attorney
in Fact for Ida T. Spencer.

Pursuant to said notice, a meeting of the stockholders was held in the city of Raleigh, North Carolina, on May 20, 1901. The chairman submitted the proposed agreement of merger and consolidation which had been duly executed by the other corporations; also a certified copy of the resolutions of the board of directors of the Raleigh & Gaston Railroad Company in relation thereto. The plaintiff thereupon filed the protest set out herein. The following resolution was thereupon unanimously adopted by a stock vote by ballot: "Resolved," etc., "that they do hereby approve and adopt the agreement of merger and consolidation between," etc.; naming all the roads entering into the merger or consent of every stockholder to the lease should be implied, unless within a stated time he filed with the clerk of the lessee corporation his written dissent, in which case his stock was to be acquired by the lessee after appraisalment, and payment, tender, or deposit of the value according to a method laid down. This statute was held not to apply to the case of a shareholder who had, before its enactment, voted for the lease, and after its passage dissented according to its terms. Boston & M. R. Co. v. Graham, 179 Mass. 62, 60 N. E. 405.

Late statutes of New Jersey, authorizing the formation of street-railway traction companies, the regulation thereof, and street railways generally to lease to traction companies their property and franchises, contain provisions (Gen. Pub. Laws, 1893, chap. 169, § 2, and chap. 172, § 17) for the appraising and paying of the value of the stock of dissentient stockholders.

New York, in 1867, enacted a general statute (chap. 960) authorizing any two or more corporations organized under the general manufacturing act, having the same or similar objects, to consolidate. That act provided (§ 2) that, if any stockholder objected within a stated time, and demanded payment for his stock, and the consolidation was afterwards effected, he might, upon application to the supreme court, have three appraisers appointed to value his stock as of the time he dissented; and that, when the corporation had paid him such value, he should cease to be a stockholder, and the corporation might hold and dispose of his stock.

There is a very similar statute in Ohio (Rev. Stat. § 3388, amended April 4, 1890, solidation. It is not necessary to set out the terms of the agreement, as no controversy is made in regard thereto. The contract was duly executed as alleged in the complaint. His Honor upon the hearing rendered the following judgment: "In this cause the plaintiffs move the court for an order compelling the defendant the Seaboard Air Line Railway Company to bring within the jurisdiction of this court the records and books of the Raleigh & Gaston Railroad Company, and to permit plaintiffs to inspect the same. At the same time the defendants move the court to dismiss the action, and demur ore tenus to the complaint, because no cause of action is stated which plaintiffs can maintain, and that upon the pleadings the action cannot be sustained. The court is of opinion that under the provisions of the act of the general assembly ratified February 27, 1901 (Private Laws 1901, chap. 168, p. 463), and the other acts pleaded and referred to in the answer, the only remedy the plaintiffs have is given by said chapter 168, etc., sue for the value of their stock at time of the consolidation, with interest thereon. The defendants having consented thereto, the plaintiffs may, if desired, file within thirty days an amended or new complaint for the purpose of recovering the value of their stock, and having the value assessed in the manner pointed out in said act. After such complaint is filed it will be competent to require the production of such books, records, etc., of the Raleigh & Gaston Company as tend to show such value. If the plaintiffs shall elect not to file such amended complaint to recover the value of their stock, then the court adjudges that this action must be dismissed, and defendants go without day and recover costs." From which judgment the plaintiffs appealed.

A stockholder cannot be forced into a new company. In New Hampshire, by dissenting, he can compel the new company, under a statute of that state, to buy his stock at its value, ascertained in a manner provided by law. Jones v. Concord & M. R. Co. 67 N. H. 119, 38 Atl. 120.

The provisions found in statutes which empower corporations to consolidate, or to lease the property and franchises of other corporations, for appraising and paying the value of stock of dissentient stockholders, are deemed examples of the competent exercise of the power of eminent domain, and are construed as a taking of private property for public use. Dickinson v. Consolidated Traction Co. 114 Fed. 232.

VI. Conclusion.

It follows from the adjudications that there is naught in the nature of shares of corporate stock to differentiate them from other property subject to condemnation by right of eminent domain. Granted a public necessity for taking them, it is but a question of making due compensation to the stockholder, and just compensation is ever limited to the value of the property taken. In the case of shares of stock, it is ordinarily not difficult to ascertain their value with a small fraction of probable error. The contract created by the taking of stock in a corporation between the subscriber and his coadventurers cannot be impaired by legislation. He may stop the consummation of ultra vires acts. He cannot be forced to continue his investment in new and different enterprises; but it is a contract insusceptible in its nature of specific performance by compulsory decree of a court of equity, and its final sanction is the right to recover damages for its breach. The measure of these damages must be neither more nor less than the value of the shares. The other parties to the contract, the fellow stockholders, cannot be compelled unless by the state to discharge public duties, to continue the corporation against their will or interest; they may dissolve, the state consenting, the corporation at any time, and have its property distributed to whosoever may be thereunto entitled; so, again, in its last analysis, the outstanding stockholder can get no more than the value of his holdings. When the state, by its statutes, provides a short cut to this result, enabling the majority to carry out their plans by taking over the corporation to a new use, and paying off their unwilling associates, the process is simpler and less complicated; but it is not more effective than dissolution, liquidation, and reorganization. And this act of the state is an exercise of the power of eminent domain. When the corporation affected is a public-service company, practically all question as to public purpose in the condemnation is shut out by the authorizing statute itself; but when the corporation is a purely private one, in which the public has no interest whatever, condemnation of shares may be resisted precisely as can condemnation of land, to wit, upon the ground that the use for which the property is to be taken is not, under any circumstances, public.

J. B. G.

Acts authorizing consolidations are merely enabling acts, and are construed as permissive only, and are not binding upon dissentient stockholders.

The relation between a railroad company and a stockholder is one of contract; and any legislative enactment authorizing a material change in the powers or purposes of the corporation, not in aid of the original object, if acted upon by the corporation, is not binding upon the stockholder without his consent.

McCray v. Junction R. Co. 9 Ind. 358.

The provision in the act authorizing the consolidation in the present case, for appraising the value of the dissenting stockholders' stock by a jury, is in no sense the exercise of condemnation proceedings under the right of eminent domain, and does not bind the dissentient stockholder.

Even if the legislature has the power, by conferring the right of condemnation upon a corporation, to condemn the shares of its minority stockholders and take them, such power must not only be expressly conferred by statute, but must be exercised in fact before the consolidation takes place.

Messrs. Day & Bell, T. B. Womack, Shepherd & Shepherd, and Murray Allen for appellees.

Connor, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff attacks the validity of the contract of consolidation or merger whereby the Raleigh & Gaston Railroad Company, together with a number of other companies owning and controlling connecting lines, became a part of the Seaboard Air Line System, upon several grounds, which it will be convenient to consider in the order in which they are discussed in the very excellent brief of her counsel. It is, of course, conceded that, as the cause was disposed of by His Honor in the superior court, and is before us, upon a motion to dismiss as upon a demurrer ore tenus, every allegation made in the complaint, with such construction thereof as is most favorable to the plaintiff, must be taken as true. This, of course, is so for the purpose of drawing the legal conclusions therefrom. The plaintiff says that certain acts of the defendant are ultra vires. This is a conclusion of law to be drawn from the facts stated. It is also to be noted that although the complaint makes no reference to the several statutes enacted by the general assembly, which, being private acts, do not come under our cognizance unless referred to and proved, His Honor's judgment expressly refers to at least one of them, and, in the argument before us, counsel treated them as being properly before us. The plaintiff says that a careful analysis of chapter 168, p. 463, Private Laws 1901, fails to show that any authority is conferred upon the Seaboard Air Line Railroad Company to consolidate, merge with, or purchase from, any other railroad than the Seaboard Air Line Railroad Company; that the statute conferring such extraordinary power upon a railroad corporation should be clear and explicit, leaving nothing to construction or doubt. Why that single corporation should have been named, in conferring the power, and other railroad companies referred to in general terms, does not very clearly appear. We think, however, that, by a fair and reasonable interpretation of the language of the act, the Raleigh & Gaston Railroad Company is included among those companies with which the Seaboard Air Line Company is empowered to consolidate,—“and any railroad or transportation company now or hereafter incorporated by the laws of the United States or any of the states thereof.” In conferring power upon other companies to consolidate, the language is equally comprehensive,—“power being hereby granted to any railroad or transportation company or companies now or hereafter incorporated by or under any act or acts of the general assembly of the state of North Carolina,” etc. The Raleigh & Gaston Railroad Company certainly comes within this classification. It would seem to follow that the other provisions of the act, unless otherwise expressed, must be construed as referring to all companies thus included in the class upon which the power is conferred to consolidate. Any other construction would render nugatory the power conferred.

The plaintiff next insists that no consolidation can take place unless the power to so consolidate is expressly conferred upon both consolidating corporations. This proposition is sustained by authorities cited. The reasons therefor are manifest. 10 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 293. We think that such power is conferred upon both corporations. Private Laws 1901, chap. 168, § 1, p. 463, expressly confers upon the Seaboard Air Line Railroad Company the power, “with the approval of two thirds in amount of its stockholders,” etc., to lease, operate, consolidate with, or otherwise acquire,” etc. As we have seen the power is conferred upon the Raleigh & Gaston Railroad Company to enter into the contract of consolidation, etc. The evident purpose of the legislature was to enable the Seaboard Air Line Railway to form, by consolidation, merger, or purchase, a system of transportation through the state, connecting with railroads in Virginia and South Carolina. The legislation in this state, together with that in Virginia, in regard to the Seaboard Air Line Company which is expressly referred to in the preamble to Laws 1899, chap. 34, p. 127, Laws 1901, chap. 168, p. 463, shows this to be the purpose and scope of the several statutes. This being ascertained, the principle by which we should be guided in interpreting the statute is thus stated: “Every statute is to be construed with reference to its intended scope and the purpose of the legislature in enacting it; and where the language used is ambiguous, or admits of more than one meaning, it is to be taken in such a sense as will conform to the scope of the act and carry out the purpose of the statute.” Black, Interpretation of Laws, 56; Endlich, Interpretation of Statutes, 73. It is settled that the power to consolidate may be conferred either in the charter, or by a general enabling act. 10 Cyc. Law & Proc. p. 289.

The plaintiff next contends that, assuming that the statute confers the power upon the Raleigh & Gaston Railroad to consolidate, such power can be exercised only by the unanimous consent of the stockholders; that a dissenting stockholder cannot be compelled to surrender his stock in the corporation, and accept in lieu thereof stock in another company; that, unless such power is conferred upon the majority of the stockholders in the charter, or by amendment thereto made before the subscription of the dissenting stockholder, an act of the legislature conferring such power would be invalid, as impairing the obligation of the contract between the stockholders. This proposition is amply sustained upon principle and authority. The Supreme Court of the United States, in Clearwater v. Meredith (Ferguson v. Meredith) 1 Wall. 25, 17 L. ed. 604, discussing a statute permitting a consolidation of several railroad companies, says: “The power of the legislature to confer such authority cannot be questioned, and, without the authority, railroad corporations organized separately could not merge and consolidate their interests. But in conferring the authority the legislature never intended to compel a dissenting stockholder to transfer his interest because a majority of the stockholders consented to the consolidation. Even if the legislature had manifested an obvious purpose to do so, the act would have been illegal, for it would have impaired the obligation of a contract. . . . When any person takes stock in a railroad corporation, he has entered into a contract with the company that his interests shall be subject to the direction and control of the proper authorities of the corporation to accomplish the object for which the company was organized. He does not agree that the improvement to which he subscribed should be changed in its purpose and character, at the will and pleasure of a majority of the stockholders, so that new responsibilities, and, it may be, new hazards, are added to the original undertaking. He may be willing to embark in one enterprise, and unwilling to engage in another; to assist in building a short-line railway, and averse to risking his money in one having a longer line of transit. Botts v. Simpsonville & B. C. Turnp. Road Co. 88 Ky. 54, 2 L. R. A. 594. 10 S. W. 134; McCray v. Junction R. Co. 9 Ind. 358. The defendant, conceding this to be the law, says that the statute conferring the power upon the several railroad companies consolidating expressly provides for paying the dissenting stockholder the full value of his stock at the time of the consolidation. This provision can only be sustained by invoking the right of eminent domain, and condemning the stock for a public use by making compensation therefor. The plaintiff contends that, at the date of the charter of the Raleigh & Gaston Railroad Company (1835), no power to amend charters of corporations was reserved by the Constitution of this state, and that, under the decisions of this court, they come within the protection of the doctrine of the Dartmouth College Case; that all of the stock was issued prior to the adoption of the Constitution of 1868, by which such power was reserved. He also says that no general statute was in force in this state authorizing such consolidation. This contention is undoubtedly correct. It will be noted, however, that Laws 1901, chap. 168, p. 403, does not undertake to amend the charter of the company, or to do more than empower a majority of the stockholders to consolidate with other companies. It is an enabling act, and imposes no duty or obligation upon the corporation or its stockholders. It must be conceded, also, that the act of the majority of the stockholders does not change the relation of the plaintiff towards the corporation. The legislature, in the exercise of its power, confers upon the majority of the stockholders the power to consolidate with the other constituent companies, and accept in consideration therefor such number of shares in the new or consolidated corporation as may be agreed upon. This can be done only with the consent of the legislature. The legislature, having decided that such consolidation was promotive of the public welfare, recognized that it had no power to compel a dissenting stockholder to accept stock in the new corporation. Therefore, in the exercise of the right of eminent domain it empowers the corporation to condemn the stock of such dissenting stockholder when it cannot otherwise be acquired. This power is entirely distinct from the power to amend the charter. The right of eminent domain which resides in the state is defined to be "the rightful authority which exists in every sovereignty to control and regulate those rights of a public nature which pertain to its citizens in common, and to appropriate and control individual property for the public benefit as the public safety, necessity, convenience or welfare may demand." Cooley. Const. Lim. 324: 1 Lewis, Em. Dom. 1; 10 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 1048. This right or power is said to have originated in state necessity, and is inherent in sovereignty, and inseparable from it. It is a part of the sovereign power of every state. Ibid.; Raleigh & G. R. Co. v. Davis, 19 N. C. (2 Dev. & R. L. 45). When the state incorporated the Raleigh & Gaston Railroad Company, a contract was entered into with the corporation, the obligation of which could not be impaired. The state did not, in respect to the property of the corporation or its shareholders, divest itself of, or in any degree impair, its right of eminent domain. The legislature could not divest itself of a power so essential to the integrity of the state. Mr. Justice Daniel, in West River Bridge Co. v. Dix, 6 How. 531, 12 L. ed. 544, says: "No state, it is declared, shall pass a law impairing the obligation of contracts; yet, with this concession constantly yielded, it cannot be justly disputed that in every political sovereign community there inheres necessarily the right and the duty of . . . protecting and promoting the interests and welfare of the community at large. This power and this duty are to be exerted not only in the highest acts of sovereignty and in the external relations of the governments; they reach and comprehend likewise the interior polity, and relations of social life, which should be regulated with reference to the advantage of the whole society. This power denominated the 'eminent domain' of the state is, as its name imports, paramount to all private rights vested under the government, and these last are . . . held in subordination to this power, and must yield in every instance to its proper exercise. . . . A correct view of this matter must demonstrate, moreover, that the right of eminent domain in government in no wise interferes with the inviolability of contracts; that the most unctimonious regard for the one is perfectly consistent with the possession and exercise of the other." 10 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 1050. "The legislature has power to authorize the consolidation of railroad and other quasi public corporations, without the unanimous consent of their stockholders, when it makes provision for appraising and paying for the stock of dissenting stockholders. This power is entirely unaffected by the constitutional prohibition against impairing the obligation of contracts, and is based upon the sovereign power of eminent domain. Corporate shares, as well as other property, are subject to the paramount necessities of the state for the promotion of public interests." Noyes, Intercorporate Relations, 51; Black v. Delaware & R. Canal Co. 24 N. J. Eq. 469. "In this busy age of reckless activity and enterprise, when the brain of man is exhausting itself in his struggle with time and space, the two forces that most oppose his progress, the taking of private property in the stock of such corporations to advance any of the purposes above indicated must be regarded as the taking of it for public benefit. There can be no doubt that a railroad company may be empowered to extend their road beyond the point to which it was built under the original grant, if proper compensation is provided for stockholders who may resist it; and I can see no difference, in principle, whether the original company, in order to secure a through route under one management, is authorized to take the lands of individuals, or to take the property which individuals have in the stock of an existing road. In the first case, for the purpose of establishing the through route, one kind of private property, to wit, the lands of individuals, is taken by the corporation; in the second case another kind of property, to wit, the shares of stock of individuals in an existing company, is authorized to be condemned. . . . The same rule applies to both cases, unless property in stock can claim a superior right to protection. This, with all other private property, is held under the dominant right of eminent domain."

In a very able opinion by Bigelow, J., in Central Bridge Corp. v. Lowell, 4 Gray, at page 481, it is said: "Nor is the principle thus recognized any violation of justice or sound policy, nor does it in any degree tend to impair the obligation or infringe upon the sanctity of contracts. It rests on the basis that public convenience and necessity are of paramount importance and obligation, to which, when duly ascertained and declared by the sovereign authority, all minor considerations and private rights and interests must be held in a measure, and to a certain extent, subordinate. By the grant of a franchise to individuals for one public purpose, the legislature do not forever debar themselves from giving to others new and paramount rights and privileges when required by public exigencies, although it may be necessary, in the exercise of such rights and privileges, to take and appropriate a franchise previously granted. If such were the rule, great public improvements rendered necessary by the increasing wants of society in the development of civilization and the progress of the arts might be prevented by legislative grants which were wise and expedient in their time, but which the public necessities have outgrown and rendered obsolete. The only true rule of policy, as well as of law, is that a grant for one public purpose must yield to another more urgent and important, and this can be effected without any infringement on the constitutional rights of the subject. If in such cases suitable and adequate provision is made by the legislature for the compensation of those whose property or franchise is injured or taken away, there is no violation of public faith or private right. The obligation of the contract created by the original charter is thereby recognized." We have in the history of the Raleigh & Gaston Railroad Company a striking illustration of the operation of the principle so clearly stated by Justice Bigelow.

The right to take private property by condemnation proceeding for the purpose of constructing a railroad was first asserted, recognized, and enforced by this court in Raleigh & G. R. Co. v. Davis, 19 N. C. (2 Dev. & B. L.) 456. Ruffin, Ch. J., wrote for a unanimous court an able and exhaustive opinion, tracing the power to its source, and giving it the application asserted by the defendant in this case. This opinion has always been cited and approved in this court as settling the law in this state. The same public convenience or necessity which would have justified taking the land of the citizen to open and construct a highway to meet the needs of the public in 1800 was invoked for taking the same land to meet the needs as they existed in 1836 to construct a railroad. The advancing needs and changed conditions in regard to transportation and travel are deemed by the legislature to demand the formation of a great trunk line or interstate system of railroad in 1901. If the Seaboard Air Line Company had, instead of consolidating with the Raleigh & Gaston Railroad Company, constructed a separate line or track from Ridgeway to Raleigh, every foot of land on the route necessary therefor could have been condemned for that purpose. We can see no reason why, in the exercise of the same inherent sovereign power, the legislature may not empower the corporation to condemn the plaintiff's stock. Whether the power is in this respect wisely conferred or exercised is beyond our province to say. This is a question for the decision of the legislature. We have examined with care all of the authorities cited by the plaintiff's counsel. In those cases where the consolidating acts are declared invalid, no provision is made for assessing the value and paying for the dissenting stock. We find no more difficulty in holding that the condemnation of plaintiff's stock is for a public use than did Ruffin, Ch. J., and his learned associates, in finding that the railroad was originally constructed for such use. Clark & M. Priv. Corp. 1051; North Carolina R. Co. v. Carolina C. R. Co. 83 N. C. 489. We are of the opinion that the legislature had the power to confer on the corporation the right to condemn the dissenting stock, and that, upon a reasonable interpretation of the statute, it has done so. We find no valid objection to the mode prescribed for ascertaining the value of the stock. It is expressly provided that the value so assessed must be paid before the stock is transferred. It would seem that the mode prescribed is exclusive and must be pursued. Carolina C. R. Co. v. McCaskill, 94 N. C. 751. It seems to us to be the only practicable remedy.

The mode of trial is free from any reasonable objection.

There is another view of this case presented by the defendant's brief which we think fatal to plaintiff's action. The board of directors of the Raleigh & Gaston Railroad Company on April 29, 1901, met and adopted a resolution reciting that the consolidation would greatly facilitate the business and promote the interests of the company, etc. Thereupon a meeting of the stockholders was duly called, and May 20, 1901, fixed as the day for such meeting. Notice thereof was duly served on the plaintiff, and she filed her protest, setting forth that notice of the meeting and the purpose thereof had been served on her. At the meeting she appeared by her attorney and entered her protest. The tellers reported that all of the stock (14,988 shares) represented voted for the consolidation. It appears that the consolidation was entered into by eight separate railroad companies, traversing hundreds of miles, and representing millions of dollars of capital. The consolidation became operative at once, and new stock, common and preferred, to the amount of $100,000,000, together with bonds secured by mortgage to the amount of many million dollars, were authorized to be issued and executed. It is a matter of general and public information, and known to the court by records before us at each term, the published reports of the corporation commission, and other public and official sources, that the consolidation of the roads forming the Seaboard Air Line System has become an accomplished fact; that vast private interests are involved and public duties assumed. The plaintiff, instead of asserting her rights promptly by an appeal to the preventive jurisdiction of the court, waits more than two years before invoking the equitable power of the court to declare invalid and set aside the consolidation. It is not to be understood that the courts will refuse to protect the rights of a single stockholder, if invaded by the majority, however large, or refuse relief against aggression of consolidated capital, however powerful. The chancellor originally took jurisdiction in many cases because of the inability of the complainant to maintain his suit at law with his adversary, because of his great power and large number of retainers. The question is not whether the plaintiff is without remedy, but whether the law has given to her an adequate remedy otherwise than by the exercise of the extraordinary power vested in the court. She demands that the court declare the charter of the Raleigh & Gaston Railroad Company forfeited; that the merger and consolidation be declared void as to her; that a receiver be appointed etc., that an accounting be had of the receipts of the company since the merger, etc. It is an elementary principle of equity jurisprudence that relief is granted to the vigilant, and will be refused when there has been unreasonable delay amounting to laches. This is especially true where valuable rights have been acquired by innocent persons. This familiar principle was announced and enforced by this court in Pender v. Pittman, 84 N. C. 372, Smith, Ch. J., saying: "But this equity ought to be promptly asserted, and not deferred until by the sale other interests may intervene rendering it inequitable, if practicable, to reverse what has been done, and restore matters to their former condition." In that case it was held that "an injunction against carrying out a contract of sale made under a power contained in a mortgage will not be granted where the relief to which the plaintiff conceives himself entitled is not sought until the sale has been made and the rights of a purchaser have intervened." Mr. Noyes says: "Acquiescence for an extended period, during which time the interests of third persons have intervened, may itself constitute laches, and prevent a stockholder from attacking a consolidation even on the ground of fraud." Intercompany Relations, 49. The authorities upon this subject are uniform and abundant. As was said by Sir John Romilly, Master of the Rolls: "Shareholders cannot lie by, sanctioning, or by their silence at least acquiescing in, an arrangement which is ultra vires of the company to which they belong, watching the result; if it be favorable and profitable to themselves, abide by it and insist on its validity, but, if it prove unfavorable and disastrous, then to institute proceedings to set it aside." Gregory v. Patchett, 33 Beav. 595. The proposition is tersely stated by Van Fleet, V. C., in Rabe v. Dunlap, 51 N. J. Eq. 48, 25 Atl. 959: "If he wants protection against the consequences of an ultra vires act, he must ask for it with sufficient promptness to enable the court to do justice to him without doing injustice to others." McVicker v. Ross, 55 Barb. 247; Watts's Appeal, 78 Pa. 370; Kent v. Quicksilver Min. Co. 78 N. Y. 159.

We think that, in any view of the case, the plaintiff is not entitled to the extraordinary relief demanded. We are at a loss to see how it is practicable to preserve the status of the corporation as she suggests for her benefit. We notice that the defendant, in its answer, says that, notwithstanding the failure of the plaintiff to proceed to have the value of her stock ascertained within the time and by the method prescribed by Laws 1901, chap. 168, p. 463, it is now willing to pay her the value thereof. His Honor granted to the plaintiff, with the assent of the defendant, the right to amend her complaint and have the value of her stock ascertained. He also directs upon the trial of that issue that the books of the corporation be produced, etc. We think that the order of His Honor fully protects the rights of the plaintiff. She will have thirty days from the next term of the superior court to amend her complaint and proceed to have the value of her stock ascertained, and judgment rendered therefor.

Upon a full and careful consideration of the record, the agreement of counsel, and the authorities, we find no error in the judgment of His Honor. Let it be so certified.

Douglas, J., dissenting:

I wished to express my views more fully upon this case, but circumstances which I regret confine me to a few lines. I do not see how the right of eminent domain, one of the sovereign powers of the state, can be invoked in favor of railroad consolidation, where not a foot of additional road is built, and nothing is added to the public convenience. Private property can be taken only for a public use. What use can the public make of the private stock of a corporation, aside from its roadbed and other material property, which are already devoted to the use of the public? Is it not establishing a dangerous principle to permit the consolidation of railroads without the consent of their minority stockholders,—dangerous not only to private rights, but equally so to the great economic principle of railroad competition, in which the public is so vitally interested?

NORTH CAROLINA SUPREME COURT.

THOMAS A. GREEN, Appt.,

v.

HARTFORD LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY.

(139 N. C. 309.)

1. Limitation of actions against nonresident.

Merely providing for service of process on a state official in actions against a non-resident corporation does not repeal the statute exempting such actions from the operation of the statute of limitations.

2. Life insurance—issuance of assessment policies.

One taking an assessment policy from a company having the right to issue life insurance under both the assessment and the reserve plans cannot, in the absence of express contract, require the company to continue the issuance of assessment policies.

3. Same—abandonment of policy.

One who voluntarily ceases to pay his insurance premiums and abandons his policy cannot maintain an action for damages for its cancellation.

(October 17, 1905.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Superior Court for Craven County in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover damages for the alleged wrongful cancellation of an insurance policy. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Case Note.—The holding, in the above case, that one taking an assessment policy from a company entitled to issue policies under different plans cannot require the company to continue the issuance of assessment policies in the absence of express contract, in addition to the authorities cited therein, finds further support in Supreme Lodge, K. of P. v. Knight, 117 Ind. 489, 3 L. R. A. 409, 20 N. Mr. W. W. Clark also for appellee.

Clark, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action for the wrongful cancellation of a policy issued to the plaintiff in 1882 by the defendant upon the assessment plan. The defendant was incorporated in the state of Connecticut and its charter is set out in the complaint. It appears therefrom that the defendant was authorized to issue legal reserve insurance policies, as well as accident and assessment insurance, and it was provided therein that the charter might be repealed or amended at the will of the legislature. In 1899 the defendant ceased writing assessment policies altogether, and restricted itself entirely to old line, or legal reserve, insurance, leaving the assessment members in a class to themselves, but not subdividing them, as in Strauss v. Mutual Reserve Fund Life Asso. 126 N. C. 971, 54 L. R. A. 605, 83 Am. St. Rep. 699, 36 S. E. 352. The plaintiff became alarmed at the defendant's ceasing to write policies on the assessment plan and the increasing annual assessments, and in 1901 he ceased to pay his assessments, whereupon the defendant declared his policy forfeited.

The defendant's plea of the statute of limitations, that more than three years had elapsed between the time his policy was declared forfeited and the bringing of this action, cannot avail. The statute of limitations does not run in favor of a nonresident, a breach of contract, the damages were too remote, speculative, and conjectural to form the basis of a legal recovery.

But in People's Mut. Ins. Fund v. Bricken, 92 Ky. 297, 17 S. W. 625, an assessment company doing business on the endowment plan obtained from the legislature, without the knowledge or consent of one of the members, an act authorizing it to abandon such plan and adopt the straight insurance system. After procuring such change, it induced as many members as possible to surrender their old certificates for insurance under the new plan, or for a payment in money. In an action by a member, who refused to do either, or to continue to pay assessments after the change, to rescind the contract and recover back the amounts paid, the court said that he had a binding contract with the company; which it had no power to change or abandon without his consent, and that its act in intentionally inducing other members to abandon their contracts, thereby lessening the membership and reducing funds to which continuing members had to look for a compliance with the terms 1 L.R.A. (N.S.) of their contract, was such a breach of contract as to absolve them from all obligations, and entitle them to recover back the consideration paid thereon.

And Smith v. Northwestern Nat. L. Ins. Co. 123 Wis. 586, 102 N. W. 57, holds that an assessment company which, after issuing a certificate agreeing to pay a specified sum on a given date if 80 per cent of an assessment on all its members at a specified rate would produce such amount, accepts the benefit of a statute authorizing it to accept fixed premiums payable at fixed times, instead of assessments payable at indefinite times as needed, after which all insurance taken is of the latter class, cannot claim that the recovery of a member remaining on the assessment list is limited to 80 per cent of the amount which would be raised by an assessment on those remaining on such list.—especially where a large number of the members therein had been induced to adopt the premium plan by allowing them credit because of their interest in a fund created out of excess of assessments previously made.

whether it is an individual or a corporation. Code, § 162; Alpha Mills v. Watertown Steam Engine Co. 116 N. C. 804, 21 S. E. 917; Grist v. Williams, 111 N. C. 53, 32 Am. St. Rep. 782, 15 S. E. 889. What is said at the conclusion of the opinion in Williams v. Iron Belt Bldg. & L. Asso. 131 N. C., at page 270, 42 S. E., at page 608, is in no wise an intimation that chapter 5, p. 66, Laws 1901, or chapter 54, § 62 (3), p. 175, Laws 1899, which authorized service of summons against nonresident insurance companies upon the commissioner of insurance, in any way abrogates or affects the suspension of the running of the statute in such cases. It merely holds that by reason of those statutes summons can hereafter be so readily and promptly served that no question as to the bar from the lapse of time is likely to arise; not that it will be a bar, if presented. That service can thus be had upon a nonresident corporation may be a reason why the general assembly should amend § 162 of the Code, so as to set the statute running in such cases; but it has not done so, and the courts cannot.

But we agree with his Honor below in his granting the judgment of nonsuit. The plaintiff failed to show that his assessments were increased by reason of the defendant's ceasing to write assessment insurance, or that he was in any wise injured thereby. The charter of the defendant authorized it to issue the different kinds of policy, and there is nothing in the charter or in the plaintiff's policy which required the defendant to continue writing assessment insurance after the company should think it advisable to discontinue that kind of insurance. The annual premiums in assessment companies necessarily grow larger with the age of the assured and the reluctance of young men to come in to prevent by their premiums the increase of rates which come to an aging and diminishing class. This is the peculiar weakness of that particular kind of insurance. The plaintiff had no right, under its contract, or under the defendant's charter, to require it to continue to struggle for "new blood," as it is called, to keep down his assessments. His reliance must be upon the "safety fund" created out of the excess of premiums, invested for the purpose of making good the payment of policies, which, in a dwindling class, would otherwise require assessments too heavy to be carried solely by the survivors. In Wright v. Minnesota Mut. L. Ins. Co. 193 U. S. 657, 48 L. ed. 832, 24 Sup. Ct. Rep. 549, the court sustained the validity of a statute which authorized assessment companies to convert themselves into old line or legal reserve companies; but here the defendant in its original charter had the right to issue either kind of policy, and there was no provision requiring it to continue to issue both. In Polk v. Mutual Reserve Fund Life Asso. 137 Fed. 273, a company which had been purely assessment changed to old-line insurance against the protest of a dissatisfied member; the company keeping up, as in this case, its separate machinery and system for its assessment members. A bill was filed charging insolvency, and that the change in its plan of insurance was a violation of the insurance company's contract of insurance. The court dismissed the bill, and said that the insured had "no vested right to a continuation of a plan of insurance which experience might demonstrate would result disastrously to the company and its members." Here all the provisions of the original articles for carrying out the contracts between the assessment members and the company are continued unimpaired. The change of business relates only to future contracts to be made thereafter. The defendant had the charter right to issue both assessment and old-line policies, and there is nothing in its contracts with assessment members that it shall continue to do that kind of business, when experience may have satisfied the company that it was unsafe. In Strauss v. Mutual Reserve Fund Life Asso. supra, the contract with the plaintiff provided that "assessments should be made upon the entire membership," and the court held that the company violated this when it arbitrarily divided its assessment members into classes, and arbitrarily increased Strauss's assessment, when it continued to assess other members of the same age, in other classes, at much lower rates. In this case there is no evidence that the defendant arbitrarily increased in the plaintiff's assessment or discriminated in the amount as between him and other assessment members. There was no contract that only an assessment business would be done; but the plaintiff knew from the defendant's charter that it was authorized to issue both kinds of policy.

The plaintiff voluntarily ceased payment and abandoned his policy. He cannot now be heard to ask damages for its cancellation. Mutual Life Ins. Co. v. Phinney, 178 U. S. 327, 44 L. ed. 1088, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 906; Mutual Life Ins. Co. v. Sears, 178 U. S. 345, 44 L. ed. 1096, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 912; Ryan v. Mutual Reserve Fund Life Asso. 96 Fed. 796. In every case where damages have been allowed for the cancellation of a policy of insurance, it was alleged and proved that the cancellation was wrongful. Braswell v. American L. Ins. Co. 75 N. C. 8; Lovick v. Providence Life Asso. 110 N. C. 93, 14 S. E. 506; Burrus v. Life Ins. Co. 124 N. C. 9, 32 S. E. 323; Hollowell v. Life Ins. Co. 126 N. C. 398, 35 S. E. 616; Strauss v. Mu- tual Reserve Fund Life Asso. 126 N. C. 971, 54 L. R. A. 605, 83 Am. St. Rep. 699, 36 S. E. 352; Simmons v. Mutual Reserve Fund Life Asso. 128 N. C. 469, 39 S. E. 966.

The exceptions to evidence are without merit. The plaintiff had already stated that he had ceased to pay because he "saw he could not keep up," and when again asked why he had written the company discontinuing his policy the court correctly held that the witness might state any facts connected with the matter. His motives, or the method of reasoning by which he arrived at his conclusion to abandon his policy, was irrelevant, as was also the other excluded question, whether the plaintiff subsequently took out other insurance in lieu of this which he had abandoned. The answer, whether it had been "Yes" or "No," could have thrown no possible light upon this controversy.

No error.

STATE OF NORTH CAROLINA

v.

SAMPSON BARRETT, Appt.

(138 N. C. 630.)

1. Intoxicating liquor—possession proof of intent to sell.

A statute making possession of more than one quart of liquor prima facie evidence of intent to violate the statute against illegal sales is not unconstitutional as invading the province of the judiciary and depriving accused of the presumption of Case Note.—The power of the legislature to pass a statute making the possession of a certain amount of intoxicating liquor prima facie evidence of an intent to violate the law against illegal sales is supported by the authorities and text-book writers, and is based upon the right of the legislature to change the rules of evidence, and upon the doctrine that an accused person has no vested right in any presumption or rule of evidence which the lawmaking power cannot alter, within certain limits. When possession is shown, then the legal presumption of guilt arises, and it devolves upon the accused to give a satisfactory explanation. Such a statute does not make it obligatory upon the jury to convict after the presentation of such proof, but it shifts upon the accused the duty to explain. But statutes which undertake to make evidence of certain facts absolute or conclusive proof of guilt are unconstitutional; those, however, which merely declare statutory presumptions affecting the burden of proof are valid.

The text-books which lay down substantially the same doctrine are 2 Wigmore, Ev. § 1354; Black, Intoxicating Liquors, §§ 60, 525; Cooley, Const. Lim. pp. 409, 410; and Wharton, Crim. Ev. §§ 715, 715a. 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

innocence, or as making prima facie evidence of guilt a fact which has no relation to, or does not tend to prove, the criminal act.

2. Same—local laws.

Local laws applicable to one county may be passed with respect to the regulation of the liquor traffic.

3. Same—equal protection of laws.

The equal protection of the laws is not denied to citizens of a certain county by a statute providing that having in possession in that county more than a quart of liquor without license to sell the same shall be deemed prima facie evidence of intent to make an illegal sale thereof.

(Brown, J., dissents.)

(April 11, 1905.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court for Union County convicting him of violating the statute regulating the sale of intoxicating liquors. Affirmed.

Statement by Connor, J.:

Defendant was charged with unlawfully and wilfully keeping for sale, etc., spirituous liquors, contrary to the form of the statute, etc. Upon a plea of not guilty, the state introduced one J. A. Williams, who testified that on the night in question witness and Mr. Bivens went up the road to see if they could head the defendant off: that about a mile or two from town they met him. He had two 5-gallon kegs of corn whisky, a ½-gallon jug, and 1 pint in a

A provision that in prosecutions for selling intoxicating liquors possession of such liquors, except in a private dwelling unconnected with the place of business, by one without a license, shall be deemed prima facie evidence of possession for sale in violation of law, is upheld as constitutional in State v. Sheppard, 64 Kan. 451, 67 Pac. 870.

And in Parsons v. State, 61 Neb. 244, 85 N. W. 65, the court sustained the validity of a statute making possession of intoxicating liquor, by one unauthorized to sell, presumptive evidence of violation of law, unless, after examination of one so charged, he shall satisfactorily explain the reason for his possession of it.

The same is true of a statute providing that whenever an illegal sale of liquor is alleged, and a delivery of it shown, it shall not be necessary to prove a payment; but that such delivery shall be presumptive evidence of the sale. State v. Hurley, 54 Me. 562; Com. v. Wallace, 7 Gray, 222; Com. v. Rowe, 14 Gray, 47.

A statute which provides that it shall not be necessary to prove an actual sale of intoxicating liquors in any building to establish the character of such premises as a common nuisance, but that the notorious bottle, a little over a mile from town. He went on the public road in a top buggy. Whisky was covered over with a lap robe. Said he got it up the country from a colored man, whom he did not know. Said it did not belong to him; it belonged to some other people; that he would tell who it belonged to when it was necessary to do so; that he would prove it up. There was other testimony of the same character. It was admitted that the defendant had no license to sell liquor. He introduced no testimony. Defendant requested the court, in writing, to charge the jury "that, upon the whole evidence, you cannot find the defendant guilty. The verdict should be not guilty." This was refused. Defendant excepted. The court charged the jury, among other things, as follows: "Under the rules of evidence, in all cases where defendant is charged with crime, it is the duty of the state to satisfy the jury, beyond a reasonable doubt, of the defendant's guilt. The statute under which the defendant is indicted provides that, if any person, other than licensed retail dealers under state laws, shall keep in his possession liquors to the quantity of more than 1 quart within said county, it shall be prima facie evidence of his keeping it for sale, within the meaning of this act. The state insists that it has shown to you that the defendant had more than 1 quart of liquor in his possession in said county of Union. The state insists that makes a prima facie case of guilt against the defendant, and that therefore it has shown to you, under the rules of evidence prescribed by this statute, that the defendant is guilty. The law is that it is presumed, or, rather, it is a prima facie case,—that is, a case upon first impression made out,—nothing else appearing, that the defendant had it for sale, if he is shown to have kept more than 1 quart of liquor in his possession within the county at one time. That is what the state insists upon. It insists that it has shown you that the defendant had the liquor, and that this statute is applicable, and that it is your duty to find him guilty. The defendant contends that, at the time the prosecuting witness met him, that he stated that the liquor was not his; that he gave no account of it, further than to say that it belonged to some other parties. The state does not rely upon his confession for a conviction in this case, but upon the fact that the liquor was found in his possession, and upon the statute. Taking this, and applying this rule of evidence, if you find beyond a reasonable doubt that he had the liquor and kept it for sale, you will return a verdict of guilty; if the state has not satisfied you upon all of the testimony, you will return a verdict of not guilty." To this charge the defendant excepted. A verdict of guilty. Motion for new trial. Motion denied. Judgment and appeal.

Messrs. R. B. Redwine and A. M. Stack, for appellant:

The acts declared prima facie evidence of the crime must have some relation to the criminal act, and tend to prove the crime.

1 Jones, Ev. § 194, p. 429; State v. Bes-character of the premises shall be evidence of that fact, is valid; the word "character" being used as a synonym for "reputation." State v. Wilson, 15 R. I. 180, 1 Atl. 415; State v. Thomas, 47 Conn. 546, 36 Am. Rep. 98. The court, in State v. Wilson, supra, in speaking of the case of State v. Beswick, 13 R. I. 211, 43 Am. Rep. 26, which is cited in the prevailing and dissenting opinions in STATE v. BARRETT, said that the fault with the provision condemned in that case as invalid was that it made it the duty of the jury to convict of illegal sales of intoxicating liquor upon prima facie evidence, if un rebutted, whether satisfied by it of the guilt of the accused or not.

It is within the power of the legislature to enact a statute making the fact that persons are allowed to enter a saloon on days or hours when the sale of intoxicating liquors is prohibited by law prima facie evidence of guilt, upon a trial charging the saloon keeper with violation of law in the sale of liquor during prohibited times. State v. Gerhardt, 145 Ind. 439, 33 L. R. A. 313, 44 N. E. 469.

opinion in STATE v. BARRETT, it was held that a conviction under a statute which provides that "whenever any person is seen to drink in such shop or house, outhouse, yard, or garden belonging thereto, any spirituous liquors or wines, forbidden to be drank therein, it shall be prima facie evidence that such spirituous liquor or wines were sold by the occupant of such premises, or his agent, with the intent that the same should be drank therein,"—was illegal, and the statute unconstitutional as depriving the accused of his right to a jury trial; as the statute made the act of a third person, with which the proof did not show the accused to be connected, prima facie evidence of an illegal sale.

The case of Board of Excise v. Merchant, 103 N. Y. 143, 57 Am. Rep. 705, 8 N. E. 484, which is also cited in STATE v. BARRETT, was a prosecution under the same section of the statute as is mentioned in People v. Lyon, 27 Hun, 180. The court said that the claim that this provision of the statute is unconstitutional on the ground that it violates the constitutional guaranties of due process of law and trial by jury, is unfounded. The court also said that "the general power of the legislature to prescribe rules of evidence and methods of proof is undoubted. . . .

It is competent for the legislature to determine the burden of proof, and to declare that any evidence shall make a prima facie case.

So long as the legislature, in prescribing rules of evidence, in either civil or criminal cases, leaves a party a fair opportunity to make his defense, and to submit all the facts to the jury to be weighed by them, upon evidence legitimately bearing upon them, it is difficult to perceive how its acts can be assailed upon constitutional grounds. . . . Here the act which is made prima facie evidence of an illegal sale takes place upon the premises of the person charged, has some relation to and furnishes some evidence of the alleged illegal sale, and occurs in a place where liquors are authorized to be kept and sold. The court, in State v. Momberg (N. D.) 103 N. W. 566, sustained the validity of a statute which declared that, in all cases other than those where intoxicating liquor is sold by virtue of the provisions of this chapter, the fact that any person engaged in any kind of business possesses a United States liquor license shall be prima facie evidence against the one who has it that he is keeping or selling intoxicating liquor contrary to law. The court said that such a statute does not raise a conclusive presumption against the accused, and that it is error to instruct the jury that such evidence, though uncontradicted, is conclusive.

his keeping it for sale, within the meaning of this act.

The defendant contends that the section of the statute under which he was convicted is unconstitutional and void, for that (1) it is an invasion by the legislative of the judicial department of the government; (2) that it deprives the defendant of the presumption of innocence, and puts upon him the burden of showing that he is not guilty.

There can be no serious doubt of the power of the legislature to change the rules of evidence, and to prescribe different rules in different classes of cases, subject to well-defined limitations. "Laws which prescribe the evidential force of certain facts by enacting that upon proof of such facts a given presumption shall arise, or which determine what facts shall constitute a prima facie case against the accused, casting the burden of proof upon him of disproving or rebutting the presumption, are not generally regarded as unconstitutional, even though they may destroy the presumption of innocence. An accused person has no vested right in this or any other presumption or law of evidence or procedure that the lawmaking power cannot, within constitutional limits, deprive him of. The existing rules of evidence may be changed at any time by legislative enactment. But the legislative power must be exercised within constitutional limitations, so that no constitutional right or privilege of the accused is destroyed. He cannot be deprived of a fair and impartial trial by a jury of his peers according to the law of the land." McClain, Crim. Law, § 16; Com. v. Smith, 166 Mass. 370, 44 N. E. 503; State v. Cunningham, 25 Conn. 195. Discussing a statute in some respects similar to ours, the supreme court of Massachusetts, in Com. v. Williams, 6 Gray, 1, says: "Nor does it appear that the establishment of this new rule of evidence is in any degree the result of judicial instead of legislative action; or that it does in any way infringe upon the indisputable right of the accused to have his guilt or innocence ascertained, and the charge made against him passed upon, by a jury. The statute only prescribes, to a certain extent, and under particular circumstances, what legal effect shall be given to a particular species of evidence, if it stands entirely alone and is left wholly unexplained. This neither conclusively determines the guilt or innocence of the party who is accused, nor withdraws from the jury the right and duty of passing upon and determining the issue to be tried. The burden of proof remains continually upon the government to establish the accusation which it makes. . . . The only purpose and effect of the particular clause of the 1 L.R.A. (N.S.) statute objected to are to give a certain degree of artificial force to a designated fact until such explanations are afforded as to show that it is at least doubtful whether the proposed statutory effect ought to be attributed to it; but the fact itself is still to be shown and established by proof sufficient to convince and satisfy the minds of the jurors. . . . Making out a prima facie case does not change the burden of proof. . . . But if the government, in proving the delivery of any quantity of spirituous liquor, in support of a prosecution for an alleged violation of the law, prove also, as it must almost necessarily do, as a part of the transaction, the circumstances attending it, then those circumstances immediately become evidence in the case, to be weighed and considered by the jury; and, although the naked delivery would be prima facie evidence of the sale, and so, indirectly, of the guilt of the accused, yet, this proof being accompanied by evidence of the manner in which the delivery occurred, and of the surrounding circumstances, he is not to be convicted, unless, upon just consideration of all the facts thus disclosed, and placed before the jury, they are satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt of his guilt." Board of Excise v. Merchant, 103 N. Y. 143, 57 Am. Rep. 705, 8 N. E. 484; People v. Cannon, 139 N. Y. 32, 36 Am. St. Rep. 668, 34 N. E. 759; Voght v. State, 124 Ind. 358, 24 N. E. 680; Lincoln v. Smith, 27 Vt. 328; Santo v. State, 2 Iowa, 165, 63 Am. Dec. 487; Black, Intoxicating Liquors, 60. The legislature of this, and we presume every other, state has frequently changed the rules of evidence, and declared that certain facts or conditions, when shown, shall constitute prima facie evidence of guilt. The power to do so has always been sustained. By § 983 of the Code it is made a "high misdemeanor," punishable by imprisonment in the penitentiary not less than five years, to sell liquor "found to contain any foreign properties or ingredients poisonous to the human system." If such liquors are found, upon analysis of "some known competent chemist," to contain any poisonous matter, "it shall be prima facie evidence against the party making this sale." By § 1005, prohibiting the carrying of concealed weapons off one's own premises, it is declared that, if any person shall have about his person any such weapon, such possession shall be prima facie evidence of concealment. The construction of this statute has been frequently before this court, but the power of the legislature has not in any case been questioned to prescribe the rule of evidence, although the effect of it has been frequently decided, as in State v. Gilbert, 87 N. C. 527, 42 Am. Rep. 518, wherein Ruffin, J., says: "The statute declares that the having of a deadly weapon upon one's person shall be prima facie evidence of its concealment, and this of itself seems necessarily to imply that it may be done under such circumstances as will not amount to an offense." In this and other cases this court has held that, upon all of the facts brought out by the state, the presumption was rebutted and the defendant acquitted. By § 1077 it is made a misdemeanor for any dealer to sell, etc., liquor to any minor, etc., knowing the said person to be a minor, "provided that said sale or giving away shall be prima facie evidence of such knowledge." Section 1089, declaring it to be a misdemeanor to sell mortgaged property, makes the failure of the sheriff, etc., to find the property, prima facie evidence of a sale with intent to hinder, defeat, etc., the rights of the mortgagee. Section 1109 makes it a misdemeanor to secrete or harbor any seaman who has deserted, knowing of such desertion; declaring that the concealment shall be deemed prima facie evidence of knowledge. These and others statutes not necessary to cite show the course of our legislation in this state on this subject.

The author of the latest work on the Law of Evidence, in discussing the subject, says: "A rule of presumption is simply a rule changing the burden of proof; i. e., declaring that the main fact will be inferred or assumed from some other fact until evidence to the contrary is introduced. There is not the least doubt, on principle, that the legislature has the entire control over such rules, as it has over all other rules of procedure in general, and evidence in particular, subject only to the limitations of evidence expressly enshrined in the Constitution.

Yet this elementary truth has been repeatedly questioned, and courts have repeatedly vouchsafed an unmerited attention to the question, chiefly through a hesitation in appreciating the true nature of a presumption, and a tendency to associate in some indefinite manner the notion of conclusively shutting out all evidence, and that of merely shifting the duty of producing it. Fortunately, sound principle has almost everywhere prevailed, though at an unnecessary expense of argument and hesitation." Wigmore, Ev. § 1354. "With what intent a person keeps intoxicating liquors is always a question of fact for the jury, to be determined upon a view of all the evidence. And in disposing of that question they are required by the statute to consider the keeping of the articles in the manner specified in the statute as presumptive evidence of an unlawful intent. But that evidence may be rebutted and controlled by the circumstances, as would be the case in the instances of the sexton and carman alluded to, as well as by other evidence in the case, whether shown by the accused in his defense, or by the state in connection with the evidence proving the possession. With such evidence, the jury may also take into consideration the presumption of the innocence of the accused." State v. Cunningham, 25 Conn. 195. The defendant says that, conceding this to be true, the statute is void, for that it arbitrarily makes an act lawful in itself prima facie evidence of a guilty intent. This criticism would apply to almost every case in which an act is made prima facie evidence of guilt. As illustrating this, carrying a weapon off one's own premises is entirely lawful, and the right to do so, it has been said, is secured by the Constitution. Const. art. 1, § 24. It has been expressly held that the act in this respect is constitutional. In State v. Cunningham, 25 Conn. 195, the court says: "It has been said that the keeping of spirituous liquors is a lawful act, and, being such, the legislature has no constitutional power to make it evidence of an unlawful act. Many acts at common law are lawful, and yet the performance of them is prohibited by the legislature, in the legitimate exercise of their sovereign power. Even the sale of such liquors is not by the common law unlawful. It is only made so by statute. And if the legislature can constitutionally prohibit such sale, we see not why they may not properly prescribe what acts shall be considered as evidence of an intent to make the sale." The slightest reflection will show that, if this objection to the statute could be sustained, the power of the legislature would be practically denied.

The defendant next calls into question the validity of the statute because he says the fact made prima facie evidence of the guilty intent has no relation to the criminal act, and does not tend to prove it, first, because the possession of liquor does not tend to show an intent to sell it; and, second, the possession of a quantity more than 1 quart is entirely consistent with such possession for personal or domestic use. It must be conceded that some of the courts have placed this limitation upon the legislative power. Peckham, J., in People v. Cannon, 139 N. Y. 32, 36 Am. St. Rep. 668, 34 N. E. 759, says: "The limitations are that the fact upon which the presumption is to rest must have some fair relation to, or natural connection with, the main fact. The inference of the existence of the main fact, because of the existence of the fact actually proved, must not be merely and purely arbitrary, or wholly unreasonable, unnatural, or extraordinary; and the accused must have in each case fair opportunity to make his defense, and to submit the whole case to the jury, to be decided by it after it has weighed all the evidence, and given such weight to the presumption as to it shall seem proper." State v. Beswick, 13 R. I. 211, 43 Am. Rep. 26. This case has been criticised in the following language: The opinion discloses confused notions as to the nature of presumptions and burden of proof. "It has occasionally been suggested that these legislative rules of presumption or any legislative rules of evidence must be tested by the standard of rationality, and are invalid if they fall short of it. But this cannot be conceded. If the legislature can make a rule of evidence at all, it cannot be controlled by a judicial standard of rationality, any more than its economic fallacies can be invalidated by the judicial conceptions of economic truth. Apart from the Constitution, the legislature is not obliged to obey either the axioms of rational evidence or the axioms of economic science. All that the legislature does in such an event is either to render admissible a fact which was before inadmissible, or to place the burden of producing evidence on the opposite party. When this has been done, the jury is free to decide; or, so far as it is not, this is because the party has voluntarily failed to adduce contrary evidence. There is here nothing conclusive, nothing prohibitive. So long as the party may exercise his freedom to introduce evidence, and the jurors may exercise their freedom to weigh it rationally, no amount of irrational legislation can change the result." Wigmore, Ev. § 1354.

We think that a full recognition of the limitation does not invalidate the statute under discussion. Certainly the legislature has the power to prohibit the keeping of liquor with intent to sell. Black, Intoxicating Liquors, 387. It is equally clear that, without any statutory rule of evidence, the keeping is an essential fact to be proved, and necessarily relevant. The quantity, place, circumstances, etc., in and under which it is kept, are to be considered by the jury in passing upon the intent. Black, Intoxicating Liquors, 525. This for the manifest reason that they have a relation to the offense charged, to wit, the keeping with intent to sell. Therefore, when the legislature gives an additional intensity to the proof of the fact which is, without any statute, relevant as tending to prove the fact in issue, we are unable to see how it can be said that it exceeds its constitutional limitation in this respect. The defendant, however, contends that the quantity named, to wit, "more than a quart," has no relation to, and does not tend to prove, the offense. The power being conceded, it is difficult to conceive how the court could undertake to fix the limit in respect to the quantity prescribed, as the basis of the presumption. It will be observed that it is not the keeping of a quart, or any fixed quantity beyond a quart, which is made a prima facie case, but "more than a quart." Of course, the prima facie case would be stronger or weaker according to the quantity kept in excess of a quart. We would find it exceedingly difficult to prescribe any limit to the power of the legislature in this respect. We must ever keep in mind the fundamental principle that courts must not call into question the validity of statutes because they may not think them wise or wholesome. To do so would be to introduce untold confusion and uncertainty into our jurisprudence. It has been so frequently and forcibly said that, within the sphere of its power, the legislature is supreme, that it does not need the citation of authority or extended reasoning to sustain it. As enforcing this truth, we quote: "Whether the legislature acted wisely or not is a question with which we have nothing to do. The power being admitted, its abuse cannot affect it; that must be for the legislative consideration. It is sufficient that the judiciary claim to sit in judgment upon the constitutional power of the legislature to act in a given case. It would be rank usurpation for us to inquire into the wisdom or propriety of their acts." Nash Ch. J., in Taylor v. Newberne, 55 N. C. (2 Jones, Eq.) 141, 64 Am. Dec. 566. "It will not throw much light on a question like this to put extreme cases of abuse of such a power to test the existence of the power itself." Shaw, Ch. J., in Norwich v. Hampshire County, 13 Pick. 60. "There is no shadow of reason for supposing that the mere abuse of power was meant to be corrected by the judiciary." Black, Ch. J., in Sharpless v. Philadelphia, 21 Pa. 147, 59 Am. Dec. 759. See also Iredell, J., in Calder v. Bull, 3 Dall. 386, 1 L. ed. 648. In Cunningham's Case, 25 Conn. 195, the act provided that the finding of spirituous liquor in possession of a person, except in his dwelling house, should constitute prima facie evidence that it was kept for sale. In William's Case, 6 Gray, 1, the statute provided that the delivery of liquor in any other place than a dwelling house should constitute prima facie evidence. In Merchant's Case, 103 N. Y. 143, 57 Am. Rep. 705, 8 N. E. 484, the act provided that, where the person is seen to drink intoxicating liquors on the premises of one who had license to sell liquor not to be drunk on the premises, it should constitute prima facie evidence of guilt. In Cannon's Case, 139 N. Y. 32, 36 Am. St. Rep. 668, 34 N.

E. 759, the act made the possession of a junk seller of secondhanded bottles and kegs presumptive evidence of the unlawful use. In Santo's Case, 2 Iowa, 165, 63 Am. Dec. 487, the statute made the keeping of liquor in any other place than the dwelling or its dependencies prima facie evidence of keeping liquor with intent to sell. These acts were all sustained. See also Lincoln v. Smith, 27 Vt. 328; American Fur Co. v. United States, 2 Pet. 358, 7 L. ed. 450. Notwithstanding the decision in Beswick's Case, 13 R. I. 211, 43 Am. Rep. 26, we find the supreme court of Rhode Island at the same term, in State v. Mellor, 13 R. I. 666, holding that a statute providing that evidence of the sale or keeping of intoxicating liquors for sale shall be evidence that the sale or keeping is illegal, was valid; the court saying: "This inference or presumption, without the aid of the statute, would not be available as legal evidence, but we think that it was in the power of the general assembly to make it so; and, when it once becomes evidence, it is for the jury, not the court, to say whether or not it is sufficient to prove the fact, for the proof of which it is adduced." We know of no rule based upon sufficiently general observation or experience which would enable this court to say, as matter of law, that the keeping of more than a quart of liquor in one's possession has no relation to an intent to sell. It will be observed that this is a local statute, applying only to the county of Union. Upon what basis the legislature adopted the standard, we are not informed. There is no evidence before us how much liquor is usually kept for private or domestic use by citizens of that county. The evidence in this case is the extent of our information. Certainly there is nothing here to bring us to the conclusion that the standard fixed is so unreasonable and arbitrary as to have no relation to the offense charged. An examination of a large number of cases from those states which have enacted repressive legislation in regard to the liquor traffic shows that it has been found necessary to incorporate this and similar provisions in their statutes, and the courts of such states have, with the exception of the one case in Rhode Island, uniformly sustained them. That court has sustained statutes similar to the one before us. If we should say that the keeping of "more than a quart" has no relation to the offense, what standard shall we set? Upon what more rational basis could we fix the limit.—at a gallon or any other quantity? It is not our province or duty to supervise the legislative mind in this regard. To the suggestion that this law may be abused in its execution, and the personal and property rights of the citizen invaded, it is sufficient to say that human wisdom has never yet devised any system of legislation or jurisprudence to which the same objection may not be urged. It would be difficult to find any principle of the common law or any statutory law which does not contain within itself the germ from which an oppressive administration may not develop. After all that can be said and done, the safety of the citizen is dependent upon the observance and enforcement of his constitutional rights, as interpreted and enforced by officers of his own selection. As was said by a great jurist and statesman, whose life was devoted to the defense of constitutional liberty: "There is nothing more easy than to imagine a thousand tyrannical things which the legislature may do if its members forget all their duties; disregard utterly the obligations they owe to their constituents, and recklessly determine to trample upon right and justice." Black, J., Sharpless v. Philadelphia, 21 Pa. 147, 59 Am. Dec. 759. While we are to keep a watchful eye, clear mind, and firm hand upon every threatened invasion of the constitutional guaranties of the citizen, we are to accord to the several departments of the government, and those who may administer them, the same jealous regard in that respect which we ourselves exercise.

As indicating the purpose of the general assembly, in its desire to suppress the liquor traffic in the county of Union, in response, as we must assume, to the wishes of the citizens of that county, we note that it has carefully guarded the sanctity of the dwelling by requiring any person applying for a warrant to search suspected premises to file an affidavit setting forth that the affiant has reason to believe that the owner of such premises is keeping for sale liquors as prohibited by this act, which reasons shall be set forth in the affidavit, and, if the justice of the peace shall deem such reasons sufficient, he shall issue his warrant. It will thus be seen that no citizen may be disturbed in his premises, under this statute until a judicial officer shall determine, upon sworn evidence, that sufficient reason exists therefor. While the statute may be open to criticism in respect to its rigid provisions, such criticism must be addressed to the legislative department of the government, which represents and gives expression to "the state's collected will," rather than to us, who are confined to the question of its validity, measured by the Constitution of the state.

The defendant next suggests that the statute violates the Constitution, in that it prescribes a rule of evidence applicable only to the citizens of Union county, and not to other counties in the state. The force of this contention depends upon the power of the legislature to declare that the keeping of spirituous liquors with intent to sell in Union county is a misdemeanor, or, in other words, to pass statutes of local application upon the subject. This power has been so long recognized by the court and exercised by the legislature that we do not deem it necessary to re-examine the foundations upon which it rests. In State v. Muse, 20 N. C. (4 Dev. & B. L.) 463, Ruffin, Ch. J., says: "There can be no doubt that the legislature hath power, and that there is an obligation in sound morals and true policy on that body, to protect the decency of divine worship by prohibiting any actual interruption of those engaged in worship, or any practices at or near the place in which the legislature may see a tendency to produce such interruptions." The act referred to prohibited the sale of spirituous liquors near a church. This court, in State v. Joyner, 81 N. C. 537, says: "Nor is the competency of the legislature to pass local acts such as the present now an open question. The power has been so long and so often exercised and recognized in cases coming before this and other courts that its existence must be considered as settled." State v. Stovall, 103 N. C. 416, 8 S. E. 900; Black, Intoxicating Liquors, § 40. The power to pass the law of local application being conceded, we are unable to perceive any reason why the legislature may not prescribe rules of evidence, within the limitations fixed, applicable to charges for its violation; nor are we cited to any authorities to the contrary.

The defendant suggests that the statute violates article 14, § 1, of the Federal Constitution, which prohibits any state from making or enforcing any law which denies to any person within its jurisdiction equal protection of the law. The question, viewed from this standpoint, has been so thoroughly and ably discussed and settled by the Supreme Court of the United States in Mugler v. Kansas, 123 U. S. 623, 31 L. ed. 205, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 273, that we do not deem it necessary to do more than refer to that case.

It is seriously insisted, however, that to sustain this act would be to overrule State v. Divine, 98 N. C. 778, 4 S. E. 477. We have carefully examined the opinion of the chief justice in that case, and find nothing in the question decided which conflicts with the conclusion at which we have arrived. The defendant was indicted under a statute containing very peculiar provisions, the only one of which it is necessary to be considered here is that declaring that, when any live stock should be killed, or injured by any car or engine running on a railroad in certain enumerated counties, such injury should be a misdemeanor; that the president, superintendent, engineer, or conductor may be indicted therefor. It was further provided that, when any stock was killed or injured in such counties, it would be prima facie evidence of negligence. The defendant (superintendent of the road) was indicted under the statute. The jury found that the defendant was not upon the train or engine when the stock was injured, and in no way connected therewith. The eminent counsel for the defendant insisted, among other manifest reasons, that the statute was invalid for that it rendered the act criminal in one locality which was not so in another, and raised out of an act done by one employee, a presumption of guilt against another employee, who did not in any way participate in it. This court sustained the objection. The distinction between the statute then under consideration and the one before us is manifest. The act which was made the prima facie evidence of guilt in our case can be committed only by the person accused. The "keeping" made prima facie evidence must be the personal act of the defendant.

We have given to the questions discussed by the defendant's able and zealous counsel more than usual consideration. His Honor carefully guarded the right of the defendant to be tried by a jury of his county, and convicted only when they were satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt, upon the whole of the evidence, that he kept liquor for sale; expressly stating to the jury that, if the state had not thus satisfied them upon all the testimony, they should return a verdict of not guilty. It would seem that, in the light of the testimony, no other conclusion could have been reached.

No error.

Walker, J., concurring in result:

Having with him so large a quantity of liquor, in packages of different size, and covered over with a lap robe, was sufficient of itself to constitute prima facie evidence of the defendant's guilty possession. When proof of a certain fact is made prima facie evidence of the main fact to be established, the law does not mean that there is any presumption of guilt thereby created, but that there is sufficient evidence to go to the jury, and upon which they may convict, if there is no countervailing testimony. It does not shift the burden of proof, but the state is still required to prove its case beyond a reasonable doubt. Wigmore, Ev. § 2494 (2); Womble v. Merchants' Grocery Co. 135 N. C. 474, 47 S. E. 493. The case was submitted to the jury in this view of the law, and I am unable to see how any substantial error was committed by the court when the jury were permitted to consider all of the evidence. The mere fact that reference was made to the statute did not prejudice the defendant, when his possession, under the circumstances clearly shown by the evidence, and not disputed, was sufficient to carry the case to the jury. He had the full benefit of the doctrine, of reasonable doubt upon the whole evidence, which was submitted to the jury, and this case was fairly and correctly tried.

Brown, J. dissenting:

I dissent from so much of the opinion of the court as undertakes to sustain the constitutionality of § 3, chap. 434, p. 450, Pub. Laws 1903, relating to the citizens of Union county, to wit: "That if any person other than licensed retail dealers under said laws shall keep in his possession liquors to the quantity of more than a quart within said county it shall be prima facie evidence of his keeping it for sale within the meaning of this act." The provisions of this act make it an indictable offense to keep liquor in one's possession with intent to sell it, and at the same time prohibit the sale of intoxicating liquors within the county of Union. Irrespective of the provisions of the act, I am of opinion that there was sufficient testimony to be submitted to the jury that the defendant did have in his possession liquor with intent to sell it. But, inasmuch as His Honor, in charging the jury, gave force and effect to the prima facie case contemplated by the statute, I think a new trial should be granted, because it is impossible for us to determine upon what view of the evidence the jury rendered their verdict. I am of opinion that the legislature has no power to declare that the mere possession of more than a quart of liquor shall be prima facie evidence that the possessor intends to sell it, and thereby subject himself to the penalties and pains of a criminal prosecution. The legislature has not seen fit, even if it had the power to do so, to prohibit the use and possession of intoxicating liquors within Union county. It has only prohibited the keeping in possession of intoxicating liquors with intent to sell. The possession and use of intoxicating liquors are lawful acts, which any citizen of that county may do with impunity. The legislature has very extensive powers in respect to fixing, changing, or modifying the rules of evidence to be applied by the courts; but the exercise of this power in relation to criminal proceedings is subject to very important limitations prescribed by the organic law of the country, which legislatures, courts, and all others in authority must respect. Among other limitations, the legislature cannot deprive any citizen of 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Union county of that equal protection of the laws of the land, which is guaranteed by the 14th Amendment of the Constitution of the United States; nor can it deprive such citizen of the protection of that fundamental principle which declares him to be innocent until he is proved guilty to the full satisfaction of a jury of his peers. This presumption of innocence is thrown around the accused, and he is entitled to it at every stage of the legal proceedings instituted against him. In prosecutions under the liquor laws, there have been many legislative provisions in the different states tending to facilitate the conviction of offenders by admitting presumptive or indirect proof of certain facts, and generally these acts have been so framed as to meet with no valid constitutional objection; but there is one underlying principle which has been observed in the preparation of all such acts except the one now under consideration. "In criminal cases the limitation has been imposed that the acts declared prima facie evidence of the crime must have some relation to the criminal act, and tend to prove the crime." 1 Jones, Ev. § 194, and cases cited.

One of the most sacred rights which guard the liberty of the citizen in this and all other states of this Union is the presumption of innocence which the law throws around him. While the legislature may make certain acts of the individual, and certain facts connected with him, prima facie evidence of guilt, yet it is everywhere conceded that the act is obnoxious to the organic law unless the facts have some tendency to prove guilt. In other words, the legislature cannot, by its arbitrary will, give to a perfectly lawful and innocent act an unlawful and criminal effect, or draw from acts warranted by law, and which everyone may rightfully do, an unlawful, improper, and criminal intent. By this act the legislature has withdrawn from the citizens of Union county the equal protection of the law which is given to the other citizens of the state. In no other county in North Carolina is the citizen so situated that he may perform a perfectly lawful act and enjoy a legal right, and at the same time, by the mere force of an arbitrary statute, have inferred from it a wrongful and criminal intent. The question as to what is a denial of the equal protection of the laws is one which has been before the Supreme Court of the United States in a great many cases. The decisions of the highest courts of the states will show that it is one not easily determined. No rule can be formulated that will cover every case, but it has been generally said that no person or class of persons shall be denied the same protection of the laws which is enjoyed by other persons or other classes in the same jurisdiction and in like circumstances. Missouri v. Lewis (Bowman v. Lewis), 101 U. S. 31, 25 L. ed. 989. Justice Field says in Barbier v. Connolly, 113 U. S. 27, 28 L. ed. 923, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 357, that the 14th Amendment means that equal protection and security shall be given to all persons under like circumstances in the enjoyment of their personal and civil rights. "Due process of law and the equal protection of the laws are secured if the laws operate on all alike, and do not subject the individual to an arbitrary exercise of the powers of government." Duncan v. Missouri, 152 U. S. 377, 38 L. ed. 485, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 570. No duty rests more imperatively upon the courts than the enforcement of these fundamental provisions intended to secure with equality the rights which are the foundation of all free government. It doubtless conduces greatly to the peace, happiness, and morality of a community to prohibit the illicit sale of intoxicating liquors; but in doing so it is of equal, if not greater, importance that the fundamental rights of the citizen under our organic law should not be ruthlessly destroyed. "The state has undoubtedly the power, by appropriate legislation, to protect the public morals, the public health, and the public safety; but, if by their necessary operations its regulations looking to either of those ends amount to a denial to persons within its jurisdiction of the equal protection of the laws, they must be deemed unconstitutional and void." Connolly v. Union Sewer Pipe Co. 184 U. S. 558, 46 L. ed. 689, 22 Sup. Ct. Rep. 439.

I do not question the right of the legislature to make the possession of intoxicating liquors with intent to sell an indictable offense, any more than I question its right to prohibit the sale of it entirely within the entire state, or any county or township in it; but I do deny its right, in the prosecution of crime under such laws, to take away from the citizen the fundamental rights which are thrown around him to protect him from the penalties and pains of a criminal prosecution.

It will be seen by an examination of the cases. I think, that there is absolutely no authority against the position I have taken, although innumerable cases can be found in which the legislature has made the possession of intoxicating liquors in certain cases, and under certain circumstances, prima facie evidence of an intent to sell. But I do not think my brethren can find any statute where the mere fact of the possession of 3 pints of intoxicating liquors under any and all circumstances has ever been made prima facie evidence of a criminal intent to sell, or where any such statute has ever been upheld by any court in this country. I refer to a number of cases: State v. Cunningham, 25 Conn. 195; State v. Morgan, 40 Conn. 44; Com. v. Wallace, 7 Gray, 222; Black, Intoxicating Liquors, § 60. In most of these cases the statutes under consideration relate to certain houses wherein liquor is found. Some of them provide that, where liquor is delivered in certain quantities, such delivery shall be sufficient evidence of sale. State v. Hurley, 54 Me. 562. Other statutes provide that, where persons are seen drinking intoxicating liquor on certain premises, it shall be prima facie evidence that it was sold by the occupant of such premises with intent to be drunk thereon. Statutes have been upheld which provided that proof of the finding of liquor in the possession of the accused under certain circumstances specified in the act shall be received and acted upon by the court as presumptive evidence that such liquor was kept or held for sale contrary to law. Again, the notorious character of certain premises, when proved, has been held to be prima facie evidence of certain facts. The statutes are too numerous to set out or comment upon at length. Suffice it to say that all of them contain specific circumstances, or relate to certain premises, and none of them provide that the mere fact of the possession of a quantity of liquor exceeding a quart, without any exception whatever, shall be prima facie evidence of crime.

In Board of Excise v. Merchant, 103 N. Y. 148, 57 Am. Rep. 705, 8 N. E. 485, Judge Earl says: "It would not be possible to uphold a law which made an act prima facie evidence of crime . . . which had no relation to a criminal act, and no tendency whatever by itself to prove a criminal act. . . . 'But such is not the effect of declaring any circumstance or any evidence, however slight, prima facie proof of a fact to be established, leaving the adverse party at liberty to rebut and overcome it. . . .' Here the act which is made prima facie evidence of an illegal sale takes place upon the premises of the person charged, has some relation to, and furnishes some evidence of, the alleged illegal sale, and occurs in a place where liquors are authorized to be kept and sold." Judge Peckham, now of the Supreme Court of the United States, in People v. Cannon, 139 N. Y. 43, 36 Am. St. Rep. 668, 34 N. E. 762, says: "It cannot be disputed that the courts of this and other states are committed to the general principle that even in criminal prosecutions the legislature may, with some limitations, enact that when certain facts have been proved they shall be prima facie evidence of the existence of the main fact in question. . . . The limitations are that the fact upon which the presumption is to rest must have some fair relation to, or natural connection with, the main fact. The inference of the existence of the main fact, because of the existence of the fact actually proved, must not be merely and purely arbitrary." In State v. Shank, 74 Iowa, 652, 38 N. W. 525, it is said: "The defendant being authorized to keep intoxicating liquors for lawful purposes, . . . no presumption arises against him that they were kept for unlawful purposes; but the law will rather presume, in the absence of proof to the contrary, that he [the defendant] kept them for lawful purposes, for men are presumed to act in obedience to the law when their acts are not shown to be unlawful." The supreme court of Indiana says: "We should unhesitatingly declare a statute void which attempted to enact that a person should be convicted of an offense upon proof of facts which might be consistent with innocence; . . . yet it has often been held that the legislature, in defining a crime, may also enact that proof of facts which are universally recognized as indicating guilt shall be sufficient prima facie evidence of the commission of the offense defined by statute." Voght v. State, 124 Ind. 361, 24 N. E. 681. In the case of People v. Lyon, 27 Hun, 180, Judge Learned says: "In the present case the defendant is charged with having sold liquors with intent that they should be drunk on the premises. It is his right to have the question . . . tried by jury. That means that the jury are to determine from their own judgment upon the facts legally given in evidence whether or not the defendant is guilty. If the legislature can declare that a certain fact is prima facie evidence of the defendant's guilt, such a declaration means that the jury must convict unless the defendant explains away this evidence." In giving a number of pertinent illustrations, the learned judge says: "If the legislature can legally enact such a clause, they might enact that, . . . if a dead body were found in any house, that should be prima facie evidence that the occupant of the house had murdered the deceased, because the legislative enactment is merely arbitrary, and need have no regard to the connection or want of connection between the evidence and the conclusion which is to be proved." In State v. Beswick, 13 R. I. 218, 43 Am. Rep. 26, the court says: "It will be observed that the statute makes proof of the facts mentioned in it not only evidence against the accused, but prima facie evidence of his guilt, so that upon proof of them it is not only the right, but the duty, of the jury to convict unless the presumption is rebutted by other evidence. . . . We have very carefully considered the question, and have come to the conclusion that the statute is not constitutional. . . . It virtually strips the accused of the protection of the common-law maxim that every person is to be presumed innocent until he is proved guilty, which is recognized in the Constitution as a fundamental principle of jurisprudence. . . . Certainly the accused does not have the judgment of a jury if the jury is compelled by an artificial rule to convict him . . . upon proof of a fact which is consistent with his innocence. . . . Suppose that the general assembly were to enact that, if any person were generally reputed to be guilty of murder, it should be prima facie evidence that he was guilty. . . . Could it be said that his life or liberty had been taken from him by the judgment of his peers? . . . Indeed, to hold that a legislature can create artificial presumptions of guilt from facts which are . . . consistent with innocence . . . is to hold that it has the power to take away from the judicial trial . . . the very element which makes it judicial. . . . It is true the accused has the right of defense, and may, if he can adduce satisfactory evidence, rebut the statutory presumption; but the production of such evidence is not always easy, even with the right to testify in his own behalf." In State v. Beach (Ind.) 43 N. E. 951, it is said: A law which makes an act prima facie evidence of crime, which has no tendency whatever to establish a criminal act, is unconstitutional and void.

The right of which the legislature deprives the citizens of Union county is probably the most sacred and valuable of all the rights guaranteed to the citizens of this country in our national and state Constitutions. The words "due process of law" and "equal protection of the laws," as used in the 14th Amendment, mean practically one and the same thing. The words "the law of the land" were borrowed from Magna Charta, and have a recognized significance. Judge Cooley, in his work on Constitutional Limitations, § 355, cites with approval a definition by Judge Edwards in Westervelt v. Gregg, 12 N. Y. 202, 62 Am. Dec. 160: "Due process of law undoubtedly means in the due course of legal proceedings, according to those rules and forms which have been established for the protection of private rights." The effect in criminal prosecutions is to secure to the accused a judicial trial according to the general principles of the common law, and not in violation of those fundamental rules which have been established by the common law for the protection of the citizen. Among these rules there is none which is more fundamental than the rule that every person shall be presumed innocent until he is proved guilty. "This rule," said Judge Selden in People v. Toynbee, 2 Park. Crim. Rep. 490. "will be found specifically incorporated into many of our state Constitutions, and is one of those rules which in our Constitution are compressed into the brief, but significant, phrase, 'due process of law'." In the case of State v. Divine, 98 N. C. 783, 4 S. E. 483, Chief Justice Smith quotes with approval from Judge Cooley's Constitutional Limitations, p. 309: "The mode of investigating the facts, however, is the same in all, and this is through a trial by jury surrounded by certain safeguards, which are a well-understood part of the system, and which the government cannot dispense with." "Meaning, as we understand," says Judge Smith, "that the charge must go before the jury, and the guilt of the accused proved to them, with the presumption of innocence until this is done." In Cummings v. Missouri, 4 Wall. 328, 18 L. ed. 364, Mr. Justice Field says: "The clauses in question subvert the presumptions of innocence, and alter the rules of evidence which heretofore, under the universally recognized principles of the common law, have been supposed to be fundamental and unchangeable." In Wynehamer v. People, 13 N. Y. 446, the court says that the legislature "cannot subvert that fundamental rule of justice which holds that everyone shall be presumed innocent until he is proved guilty." In San Mateo v. Southern P. R. Co. 8 Sawy. 238, 13 Fed. 722, the Supreme Court of the United States says: "Whatever the state may do, it cannot deprive anyone within its jurisdiction of the equal protection of the laws. And by equal protection of the laws is meant equal security under them to everyone, on similar terms,—in his life, his liberty, his property, and in the pursuit of happiness."

Subjecting the statute under consideration to the test as laid down by these authorities, the conclusion to my mind is irresistible that it is obnoxious to our organic law, both Federal and state. What is the fact to be proved which constitutes the gravamen of the offense? It is certainly not the mere possession of more than 1 quart of liquor. That is a perfectly lawful act, not only in Union county, but in every other county in North Carolina. It is the intent to sell which constitutes the crime. Does the possession of 3 pints of liquor under any and all circumstances tend to prove that the possessor intends to sell it? If it does, the act is constitutional. If it does not, it is violative of the organic law of the land, if the authorities I have quoted are worth anything. What is there in the mere possession of 3 pints of liquor which would tend in the least degree to indicate that the owner of it kept it for sale or ever intended to sell it? There are 5,000 individuals in this country who purchase liquor for their own consumption to one who purchases it for sale. To give the act the effect contended for, it must be construed with reference to the purpose of the one, without having any regard whatever to the purpose of the 5,000. The act must not be tested by the evidence in this case. Independent of the act, I am willing to admit that the evidence was amply sufficient to support a conviction. But the act in question is purely arbitrary, and it has been given that effect. It does not, as the cases I have referred to, give any specified circumstances under which the presumption shall arise. It applies to the possession of 3 pints of wine with as much force as to the possession of 3 barrels of whisky. A lady who places on her dinner table for the entertainment of her guests 3 pints of claret is as much a prima facie criminal as the peddler who hauls around in his covered wagon a barrel of "untaxed corn," with his pint pot tied to the spigot. The latter might justly and legally constitute a prima facie cause of "intent to sell," but it would be impossible to infer such an intent from the former. The possession of 3 pints of liquor in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred is far more indicative of an intent to drink than of an intent to sell. Yet the statute makes no distinction. It "feeds all out of the same spoon," and invests all persons with equal criminality in the eyes of the law, regardless of circumstances or surroundings, reason or logic. The individual in Union county who dares to have in his residence 3 pints of scuppernong wine, prescribed as a tonic for his ailing wife, is in danger of having his liberty taken from him, and sent to break rock upon the county roads, by virtue of a few little words in this statute. It will not do to say that no jury would convict a man under such circumstances. He is placed on the defensive. The shield and panoply of innocence is stripped from him, and he is at the mercy of twelve men. Fanaticism has done worse things than convicting a man under such circumstances, however unjustifiable we think it may be. This protection is given to the citizen, not to prevent his conviction alone when charged with crime, but it is given him to protect him from unjust, improper, mortifying, and expensive criminal prosecutions; and it is the most valuable and priceless possession the individual has. The citizens of Union county are as much entitled to it as any other citizens of North Carolina or the United States.

The court does not undertake to explain how the possession of more than 1 quart of liquor can possibly be significant of a purpose to sell, and I am at a loss to know. The mere possession of 3 pints of liquor is no more indicative of the owner's purpose and intent in relation to it than is the possession of 3 pints of flour, meal, or anything else. Men sell liquor, it is true, and so they do other things; but, inasmuch as the vast majority are buyers of such articles, and not sellers, I fail to see how mere possession of so small a quantity indicates an intent to sell as strongly as it does a purpose to consume. Unless the court can show that the possession of such a quantity of liquor indicates a purpose to sell, it must hold that the legislature can, by arbitrary enactment, make a perfectly innocent and lawful act evidence of a criminal intent, although such act has no tendency to prove guilt. And such is really the effect of the decision in this case.

I have cited from the opinions in a few of the leading precedents referred to in the judgment of the court and the citations sustain fully my contention. All the statutes referred to in the opinion of the court, or in the cases cited therein, make certain acts which tend to prove guilt prima facie evidence of it. None of them undertake to make a purely lawful act, from which no unlawful intent and purpose can be reasonably inferred, evidence of crime. But all the cases, without an exception, so far as I can discover, declare that cannot be lawfully done. Space will not permit me to comment on all these statutes, but I will cite our own statute against carrying concealed weapons as an illustration: The statute makes the possession of the weapons named in it (pistols, bowie knives, etc.) off one's premises prima facie evidence of concealment. That act is plainly constitutional. Why? Because the weapons named in the act may be, and commonly are, carried in the pocket, and concealed from view. When the weapon is seen in the hand of the owner off his premises, it is a fact tending to prove that he took it from his pocket, and thereby had it concealed on his person. If I had space, I could point out the true significance of every act of the legislature mentioned by the court, and easily show that the facts declared to be prima facie evidence of crime have some tendency to prove it, while the fact stated in the act under consideration has no such tendency. The general assembly, in my opinion, has just as much right to declare that, in all indictments in Union county for having liquor in possession with intent to sell, the defendant shall be presumed to be guilty, and shall be required to establish his innocence, as it had to enact the statute in question, wherein, by mere arbitrary words, a perfectly lawful and innocent act is declared to be prima facie evidence of a guilty intent. There are some things the general assembly cannot do. It may declare that hereafter "black shall be white," but it cannot make it so. Nor can it lawfully, by the exercise of its arbitrary will, turn innocence into prima facie guilt. It has just as much right to declare that the possession of a gun shall be prima facie evidence of an intent to kill.

The court declares that Mugler v. Kansas, 123 U. S. 623, 31 L. ed. 205, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 273, is a plain authority that the act under consideration does not violate the 14th Amendment to the Federal Constitution. With the utmost respect for the opinion of my brethren, I am constrained to say that the case has no bearing whatever on the question at issue in this appeal. In Mugler v. Kansas it is decided (1) that the state of Kansas had the right to prohibit the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors in the state; (2) that Mugler could not recover the value of his brewery; (3) that, in prosecutions under the Kansas act, it is not necessary for the state to affirmatively prove that the defendant did not have a permit to sell intoxicating liquors. I do not controvert anything decided in that case. The third proposition has always been the law in North Carolina in indictments for selling intoxicating liquors without license. The possession of the license is matter of defense. The utter lack of pertinency of the Mugler Case to the one at bar can be seen from the following quotation: "It is only a declaration that, when the state has proved that the place described is kept and maintained for the manufacture or sale of intoxicating liquors,—such manufacture or sale being unlawful except for specified purposes, and then only under a permit,—the prosecution need not prove a negative, namely, that the defendant has not the required license or permit. If the defendant has such license or permit, he can easily produce it, and thus overthrow the prima facie case established by the state." How very different is the act we are considering! Under it the state can prove the possession of the 3 pints of wine in a citizens' private dining room, who is not engaged in any business connected with intoxicating liquors, and rest its prosecution upon the prima facie case thus made out under the statute, whereby a lawful and innocent act is arbitrarily converted into evidence of a criminal intent. If the jury should, from prejudice or fanaticism, refuse to believe the defendant's explanation, he is helpless. Why? Because the statute has robbed him of the greatest protection the citizen has against unwarranted prosecution, viz., the presumption of innocence thrown around him by the fundamental law. The court would have done well to quote some of the forcible utterances of Judge Harlan in the Mugler Case. He says: "It does not at all follow that every statute enacted ostensibly for the promotion of these ends is to be accepted as a legitimate exertion of the police powers of the state. There are, of necessity, limits beyond which legislation cannot rightfully go." And again: "Undoubtedly the state, when providing by legislation for the protection of the public health, the public morals, or the public safety, is subject to the paramount authority of the Constitution of the United States, and may not violate rights secured or guaranteed by that instrument."

In conclusion, I will say that I sympathize deeply with all legislative efforts to extirpate illicit traffic in intoxicating liquors, and will be found sustaining all such laws, when within the legislative power. But I cannot conscientiously assist in laying the judicial axe to the most valuable and sacred of all the fundamental rights of civil liberty, viz., the legal right to be adjudged by the court innocent unless the state has offered evidence tending to prove the commission of a crime. The citizens of Union county are as much entitled to the protection of this organic law in the prosecution of any and all offenses as are the other citizens of the state, and, when it is denied to them, as it is by this statute, they are denied the equal protection of the law of the land, and are at the mercy of capricious and uncertain jurors.

For the reasons I have attempted to give, I think there should be a new trial, and the court below directed to submit the case to the jury upon the evidence, without reference to any prima facie case under the statute.

TENNESSEE SUPREME COURT.

LESLIE L. HARRELL, Plff. in Err.,

v.

R. A. SPEED.

(113 Tenn. 224.)

Ferry—tax for bar privileges.

A state may, under its police power, require the keeper of a bar on a ferryboat making regular trips from another state, where it is owned, to pay a license tax for the privilege of selling liquors while the boat is within its jurisdiction.

(June 4, 1904.)

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Shelby County to review a judgment in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover back money alleged to have been illegally exacted as a license tax for a bar privilege. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Randolph & Randolph for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. Charles T. Cates, Jr., Attorney General, and C. D. M. Greer for the State.

Beard, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This case is before us on an agreed statement of facts, from which it appears that the West Memphis Ferry Company is a corporation duly created under the laws of the state of Arkansas, having its situs at West Memphis, in the county of Crittenden, in that state, on the western bank of the Mississippi river; that the corporation, by its charter, has a right to own and use water craft on that river, and for three years, under the license duly and legally issued to it by the county of Crittenden, it has been operating ferryboats across the Mississippi river, carrying passengers and freight from West Memphis, and landing at its dock at the wharf at the city of Memphis, in this state, where it would discharge the same, and take on other passengers and freight for transport to its home port and one or two other ports in the state of Arkansas; that a bar was maintained on each of its boats, where liquors were sold; and that the privilege of keeping the bar on one of these boats was rented to Harrell, the plaintiff in error, who had been, and was, engaged in selling intoxicants by retail to passengers on its boats, and such other persons as happened to come on board, and desired to make purchases thereof.

For the exercise of this privilege, the state of Tennessee, through a proper officer, required Harrell, under the menace of a distress warrant, to pay the license tax which it was insisted was due under that portion of § 4 of chapter 257, p. 615, of the Acts of 1903 which reads as follows: "Persons selling beer or any quantity of liquor on steamboats, flat boats, or any other vessel or

Case Note.—The power of the states to adopt police regulations affecting interstate commerce, at first regarded as extending to all subjects on which no action had been taken by Congress, has been limited by later decisions to subjects local in their nature, such as pilotage and quarantine (see Morgan's L. & T. R. & S. S. Co. v. Board of Health, 118 U. S. 455, 30 L. ed. 237, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1114), in which the rules that should govern may be better understood and more wisely established by the local author-water craft, or from railroad cars, shall pay a tax, each in lieu of all other taxes, to be paid in any county they may elect per annum $200." This payment was made under protest, and the present suit was brought to recover the money so paid, upon the ground that it was illegally exacted.

That the steamboats used by the West Memphis Ferry Company in carrying on its business of transporting freight and passengers could be taxed in the state of Arkansas, at the home port of the company, and their situs when at rest, is settled in Wheeling, P. & C. Transp. Co. v. Wheeling, 99 U. S. 273, 25 L. ed. 412. It is also settled that the state of Tennessee could neither impose a tax on the capital stock of this ferry company, incorporated as it was by the state of Arkansas (Gloucester Ferry Co. v. Pennsylvania, 114 U. S. 196, 29 L. ed. 158, 1 Inters. Com. Rep. 382, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 826), nor upon the boats, engaged, as they were, in interstate commerce, and making, as they did, only temporary landings at the wharf in the city of Memphis (St. Louis v. Wiggins Ferry Co. 11 Wall. 423, 20 L. ed. 192).

The question then presented is, Does the principle which thus restrains the taxing power of this state, both as to the capital stock of this company, and of its boats employed in ferry purposes, also prevent the exaction of a privilege tax from one running a bar on one of these boats while at its landing within the jurisdiction of this state?

We think it beyond doubt that the legislature of Tennessee could not impose a privilege tax upon this company for disembarking its passengers and discharging its cargoes of freight at the wharf in the city of Memphis, or for gathering passengers and freight to be transported across the river to the state of Arkansas. Gloucester Ferry Co. v. Pennsylvania, supra. The exemption from this tax rests upon the fact that receiving and landing passengers and freight were incident to their transportation, without which there could be no such thing as transportation of either across the Mississippi river. Such a tax would be a burden on interstate commerce, and clearly unenforceable. Henderson v. New York (Henderson v. Wickham) 92 U. S. 259, 23 L. ed. 543.

But can the same thing be said as to the privilege license required for maintaining a bar for the sale of spirituous liquors on one of its boats? So far as the agreed statement of facts shows, the charter conferred no right on the company to maintain a bar, ities. As to subjects national in character, the absence of congressional legislation is held to indicate an intention that interstate commerce shall be free and untrammelled.

Within the latter category intoxicating liquors were placed by the decisions in Bowman v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 125 U. S. 465, 31 L. ed. 700, 1 Inters. Com. Rep. 823, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 689, 1062, and Leisy v. Hardin. 135 U. S. 100, 34 L. ed. 128, 3 Inters. Com. Rep. 36, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 681, discussed in HARRELL v. SPEED. But the effect of the act of 1890, known as the Wilson bill, was "to deprive liquor of its national character as a subject of commerce, make it local in its nature and subject to the police power of the state, until Congress sees fit to legislate upon it." State ex rel. George v. Aiken, 42 S. C. 222, 26 L. R. A. 345, 20 S. E. 221.

It is therefore competent for a state, under this statute, to regulate, restrict, or prohibit the sale of imported intoxicants in the original package, after delivery to the consignee (see Rhodes v. Iowa, 170 U. S. 412, 42 L. ed. 1088, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 664). Its power to control the sale of liquor in less quantities in the absence of such statute is unquestionable, since it has ceased, upon the breaking of the original package, to be a subject of interstate commerce.

An extensive search has disclosed no case involving the right of a state to control the sale of intoxicating liquors on cars or vessels engaged in interstate traffic, excepting State v. Frappart, 31 La. Ann. 340, cited in the HARRELL CASE. It was there held 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

that a license tax could not be imposed at an intermediate port on a person who, it was conceded, only sold liquor on board of a steamer "in the course of her voyage." The court gives as its reason that "a boat plying upon navigable waters between different states cannot be considered as conducting or doing a business at each and every point where she touches, so as to become subject to taxation at each of said points. Such a proposition would give the local authorities power, not only to regulate, but to destroy, commerce between the states; which power by the Constitution belongs exclusively to Congress. . . . After a vessel has completed her voyage, and is at her port of destination, it is, perhaps, competent to enforce on board of her such local police regulations as are necessary to the good order of society. But when on her voyage she is not within the jurisdiction of state tribunals for purposes like this." Unfortunately, the report of this case does not make it quite certain whether the sale, which is said to have been made "in the course of her voyage," or "on her voyage," was made while the ship was at anchor at the intermediate port, or whether it was made while the ship was actually proceeding between ports. From the language above quoted, as to the nonliability of a boat lying in navigable waters to taxation at each intermediate point where she touches, there is some reason to infer that the court was treating the case of a sale made on a voyage between ports, and not while in any port. If so, there would be a distinction between that or rent the privilege of doing so to another; nor can we see that the exercise of such a privilege forms an essential part of the business which it is authorized to do.

But again, it is not disclosed that the liquors and beer dispensed to customers over the bar on the boat in question were brought into this state from Arkansas, or from any other foreign state, so as, in any form, to give the plaintiff in error the benefit of the interstate clause of the Federal Constitution or of any of the laws of Congress regulating commercial intercourse between the states. For all that appears in the record, the intoxicants kept and sold at this bar may have been purchased in Tennessee by Harrell for retail at the port of Memphis, within this state. If this be the fact, we can see no reason why the plaintiff in error, so retailing, should stand on any higher ground than the seller of drinks over the bar of any one of the saloons of that city.

But we do not deem it necessary to place this case on narrow or technical ground, as we think the judgment of the trial court can be rested on the broader ground that the imposition of the tax or license fee was distinctly within the police power of the state.

With regard to the retailing of intoxicants, there has never been a question as to the right of the several states to control the subject. The long line of cases found in the Reports of the Supreme Court of the United States agree in affirming the general proposition that the regulation of the manufacture and the sale of intoxicating liquors is peculiarly under the control of the states, and within their police power, which has not been surrendered to the Federal government. License Cases, 5 How. 504, 12 L. ed. 256; Bartemeyer v. Iowa, 18 Wall. 129, 21 L. ed. 929; Boston Beer Co. v. Massachusetts, 97 U. S. 25, 24 L. ed. 989; Foster v. Kansas, 112 U. S. 201, 28 L. ed. 629, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 8, 97; Mugler v. Kansas, 123 U. S. 623, 31 L. ed. 205, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 273; Kidd v. Pearson, 128 U. S. 1, 32 L. ed. 346, 2 Inters. Com. Rep. 232, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 6; Eilenbecker v. District Court, 134 U. S. 31, 33 L. ed. 801, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 424.

In the earliest and most celebrated of these cases, reported under the title of the "License Cases," supra, there was involved a question of the constitutionality of certain laws passed by the legislatures of Massachusetts, New Hampshire, and Rhode Island, restricting the sale of liquors in these different states. In the New Hampshire case the courts of the state applied the statute case and the HARRELL CASE. It may be further suggested that the Louisiana case is treated by the court as one of the taxation of interstate commerce, while the HARRELL CASE is treated, not as a case of taxation, but as one of the exercise of the police power of the state. It distinctly concedes that the state of Tennessee could not tax the boat, which belonged in another state, but pointed out that the privilege of running a bar on the boat did not constitute an essential part of the interstate commerce business in which the boat was engaged. But the court said it did not deem it necessary to place the case on narrow or technical ground, but placed it on the broader ground that the imposition of the tax or license fee was distinctly within the police power of the state.

The decision in the Louisiana case was rendered before the enactment of the Wilson bill, which expressly makes intoxicating liquors brought from another state subject to the operation and effect of the laws of the state into which it is brought "upon arrival" therein.

Another case of the sale of intoxicating liquor on a boat on navigable waters, though there the boat was not engaged in interstate commerce, is that of Welsh v. State, 126 Ind. 71, 9 L. R. A. 664, 25 N. E. 883, where it was held that the courts of Indiana had jurisdiction over the sale of intoxicating liquors in violation of the Indiana statutes upon a boat anchored in the Ohio river, even if it were south of the southern boundary of the state. The right of the 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

state of Indiana to exercise both civil and criminal jurisdiction, concurrent with the state of Kentucky, over the Ohio river, is secured by the act of the commonwealth of Virginia, December 18, 1789 (1 Va. Rev. Laws, p. 59), and by the Constitution of the state of Indiana. The court, while pointing out that this was not a matter of interstate commerce, said that the case of one who anchored his boat near the Indiana line, and engaged in the sale of liquors without a license, fell both within the letter and spirit of the statute, although the law made no provision for granting a license to sell liquor at that place. A case somewhat analogous to this was that of State v. Mullen, 35 Iowa, 199, holding that the courts of the state had jurisdiction to punish the offense of keeping a house of ill fame on a boat in the Mississippi river, although a portion of the time the boat might rest on the bottom of the opposite side of the river. The court placed its decision on the act of Congress for the admission of the state, by which it was granted concurrent jurisdiction over the Mississippi river with the other states bordering thereon, so far as the river constituted their common boundary. Such concurrent jurisdiction is shown in Farnham on Waters, page 35, to be the common rule where a navigable river constitutes the boundary between states. In the light of these decisions, it seems reasonable to hold that, under the terms of the Wilson bill, a sale of liquors such as that made in the HARRELL CASE is subject to the police power of the state.

then in force to the sale by the importer of a barrel of gin, which was unbroken and in the same condition that it was when brought into the state. The justices of the Supreme Court of the United States agreed in maintaining the constitutionality of this statute, though they rested their conclusion on different grounds. Chief Justice Taney, in an opinion universally recognized as of great ability, while conceding the power of Congress to deal exclusively with the subject of the importation of intoxicants, and, when so dealing with it, that its action would supplant all repugnant statutes passed by the states, yet held that the acts in question were valid, because Congress had not legislated with regard thereto. This view was the prevailing one with that court for many years, as the reasoning of the chief justice was often referred to, and the decision was as often cited with approval.

But in Bowman v. Chicago & N. R. Co. 125 U. S. 465, 31 L. ed. 700, 1 Inters. Com. Rep. 823, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 689, 1062, the authority of these cases was greatly weakened. The Bowman Case involved the validity of a statute of the state of Iowa which imposed a penalty upon any railroad company or other common carrier that should knowingly bring into the state any intoxicating liquors without first having obtained a certificate from the proper authority, certifying that the consumer was authorized by the laws of Iowa to sell such liquors. While the court recognized that this statute had been passed for the purpose of carrying out the general legislative design to protect the health and morals of the people of that state, yet it was held to be unconstitutional, upon the ground that it was an effort to regulate commerce between the states. While the court did not in express terms overrule the License Cases, and the later cases resting for authority on them, yet there was a clear suggestion throughout the argument of a doubt as to the soundness of the conclusion announced therein. But what the court seemed to hesitate to do in the Bowman Case was expressly done by a majority opinion in Leisy v. Hardin, 135 U. S. 100, 34 L. ed. 128, 3 Inters. Com. Rep. 36, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep. 681. There it was held that the importation of liquors from foreign countries, and from one state to another, was a subject which required a general and uniform rule for its regulation, free from state interference; and therefore the states were without authority to control the subject, even though Congress had not enacted any legislation with regard thereto.

The opinions in these two later cases attracted great attention, and produced a feeling of discontent among those who believed 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

the liquor traffic, in all of its power, should be under the supervision of the various states. This conviction was so widespread, and such pressure was brought to bear upon Congress, that in 1890 it passed an act, popularly known as the "Wilson bill" (Act August 8, 1890, 26 Stat. at L. 313, chap. 728, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 3177), which provides that "all fermented, distilled, or other intoxicating liquors or liquids transported into any state or territory or remaining therein for use, consumption, sale, or storage therein, shall, upon arrival in such state or territory, be subject to the operation and effect of the laws of such state or territory . . . and shall not be exempt therefrom by reason of being introduced therein in original packages or otherwise."

The constitutionality of this law was attacked in Re Rahrer (Wilkerson v. Rahrer) 140 U. S. 561, 35 L. ed. 576, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 865, but it was there sustained as a proper exercise of legislative power.

But it is to be observed that the authority of Bowman v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. supra, and of Leisy v. Hardin, supra, never extended further than to protect the importer of original packages of fermented or distilled liquors or beer as long as they were unbroken, and, by necessary implication, excluded from the exemption from state control those persons engaged in the mere retail liquor business. As to them and their business, no doubt ever did exist of the state's power of regulation by the imposition of privilege taxes or otherwise, and the only effect of the Wilson bill was to hand over the importer, even with his original package, after the terminus of its transit had been reached, to the control of the state.

So it is that the importer of intoxicants, whose packages had reached such terminus, and the retailer now stand on the same ground, and are equally under the strong and restraining hands of the several states.

But it is said, however, in the argument of the counsel for plaintiff in error, that this act was not intended to interfere with the interstate commerce of intoxicants, but its operation was confined to liquors or liquids introduced into a state or territory after they had become mingled with the mass of the taxable property of such state or territory, and for this proposition Re Rahrer (Wilkerson v. Rahrer) supra, Rhodes v. Iowa, 170 U. S. 412, 42 L. ed. 1088, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 664, and Vance v. W. A. Vandercook Co. 170 U. S. 468, 42 L. ed. 1111, 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 674, are cited by counsel.

To this contention it may be replied that, were this its only effect, then it was idle legislation. For it was never a matter of doubt,—the absolute right of the state to control, by taxation or otherwise, either intoxicants or any other character of property, when once incorporated with the general mass of property within the state. As has been seen, as to intoxicants, the struggle upon the part of some of the states was to assume control while they were in unbroken packages in the hands of the importer. It was against this claim the cases of Bowman v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. and Leisy v. Hardin, supra, were levied. It was there, however, conceded, and, so far as we know, it has been uniformly so, that, when once the original package is broken, it has passed beyond the limit of Federal control, and into that of the state.

Nor do the cases upon which the counsel of plaintiff in error rests for this contention support it. In Re Rahrer (Wilkerson v. Rahrer) supra, the court, having discussed the restrictive effect upon the legislation of the several states of the Bowman and Leisy Cases, then adds (referring to the Wilson bill): "Congress has now spoken, and declared that imported liquors or liquids shall, upon arrival into a state, fall within the category of domestic articles of a similar nature. Is the law open to constitutional objection?" In Rhodes v. Iowa, supra, it is said, "It has been settled that the effect of the act of Congress is to allow the statutes of the several states to operate upon packages of imported liquor before sale;" but it was at the same time held that state legislation of a restrictive character could not attach to such packages "the moment they reached the state line, and before the completion of the act of transportation." The first of the syllabi in Vance v. W. A. Vandercook Co. 42 L. ed. 1100, clearly shows that it is in accord with the Wilkerson and Rhodes Cases. It is as follows: "Under the act of August 8, 1890 [Wilson bill; 26 Stat. at L. 313, chap. 728, U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 3177], the restrictions and regulations of state laws become operative on the original packages of intoxicating liquors imported into a state before the sale thereof, and therefore such packages cannot be sold if the state law forbids the sale, or can be only so sold in the manner and form prescribed by the state regulations."

We have been referred to the case of State v. Frappart, 31 La. Ann. 340, where it was held that the imposition of a license tax for selling beer and liquors from a bar on a steamboat plying between ports in the states of Louisiana and Mississippi, at one of the intermediate ports, was an unauthorized interference with commerce between the states. This case, it may be conceded, sustains the contention of plaintiff in error; but we are not able to agree with it, as, in 1 L.R.A. (N.S.) our view, the retailing of liquor does not, in any event, constitute interstate commerce.

It follows that the judgment of the lower court is affirmed.

Affirmed by Supreme Court of United States sub nom. Foppiano v. Speed, on December 4, 1905.

TENNESSEE SUPREME COURT.

MRS. C. E. CONDON et al.

v.

GEORGE W. CALLAHAN.

(.... Tenn.)

1. Partnership—compensation on death of partner.

Where partners who have undertaken to perform a construction contract have agreed that each shall contribute his services without compensation, one who, upon the other's death, performs the entire work of supervision, is entitled to compensation for that part of the work which deceased would have contributed had he lived.

2. Same—enterprise continued.

The rule that a surviving partner is not entitled to compensation for winding up the affairs of the partnership does not apply where the affairs are not immediately wound up, but the work in which the partnership was engaged is carried to completion with the consent of the personal representatives of the decedent.

3. Tender of compromise—effect.

A rejected offer by a surviving partner to take a certain amount in payment for his Case Note.—While under the general rule a surviving partner is not entitled to compensation for his services in merely closing out and winding up the firm business, there is no doubt but that CONDON v. CALLAHAN applies a well-recognized exception in cases where the surviving partner does not immediately liquidate the affairs of the firm, but continues the business for a time in order to effect an advantageous settlement. Whether such a partner has been engaged in merely winding up a firm's business, or in continuing it for a time in order to effect an advantageous settlement, must often be a hazy question of fact; and it is this, no doubt, which leads to the general recognition that the right to compensation must depend upon the circumstances of each case. As said by Justice Holmes in Thayer v. Badger, 171 Mass. 279, 50 N. E. 541: "It is true, no doubt, that there is a disinclination to allow pay to a surviving partner for winding up; . . . but the tendency is to deal with such questions on their particular circumstances, rather than by absolute rules." A commission was allowed in this case to the surviving partner as member of a firm to which the goods of the part-services in completing the enterprise in which the partnership was engaged does not prevent his recovering a reasonable allowance therefor in case he applies to the courts, although it is in excess of the amount named in his offer.

4. Partnership—settlement—allowance for wages.

Personal representatives of a deceased partner in a firm which has taken a contract for railroad construction cannot compel the surviving partner to contribute the entire amount paid to the engineer of the railroad company for services rendered by him to the enterprise, where the services were engaged and utilized with knowledge of the deceased partner and of his representatives, and there was nothing in the transaction in violation of the rights of the railroad company, or without its consent.

5. Same—subcontracts—division of profits.

Under a contract for the formation of a partnership to engage in railroad construction, which entitles either partner, under certain conditions, to subcontract portions nership of which he was the surviving member were turned over by him for disposal.

Perhaps the rule is nowhere better stated than in Schenkl v. Dana, 118 Mass. 236, cited in the opinion: "Upon the dissolution of an ordinary mercantile partnership by death, the surviving partner is not entitled, as matter of law, in the absence of special agreement, to be paid for his personal services in winding up the business and disposing of the assets. But this rule, in its practical application to the final settlement of partnerships, must, in equity, be largely varied by the nature of the business carried on, the capital employed, the state of the accounts with the deceased partner, the necessity of continuing the business for the purpose of realizing most from the assets, and especially by the fact that such continuance is known and assented to by the legal representative of the deceased partner."

... Under the general rule above stated, all that can be required of the surviving partner is that he proceed at once to wind up the partnership and account with the legal representative of the deceased partner. In the absence of special agreement, he is entitled to no pay for his personal services in the strict discharge of this duty. But if, with the assent of the administrator of the deceased partner, he employs extra labor to finish existing contracts; if he enters upon new contracts, employing the machinery, patents, and property of the firm therein,—then, to the extent of his personal services devoted to such extra work, he is entitled to compensation."

The just rule deduced in Robinson v. Simmons, 146 Mass. 167, 4 Am. St. Rep. 299, 15 N. E. 558, which involved the affairs of a firm engaged in the business of manufacturing and selling clothing, is that, in the absence of circumstances rendering it inequitable, the profits accruing after the decease of one partner should be divided accord to the capital, after deducting such share of them as is attributable to the skill and services of the surviving partner.

6. Same—settlement—interest on undivided funds.

A surviving partner who continues a deposit of partnership funds in bank, awaiting a settlement of the partnership affairs, without realizing any interest or profit therefrom, is not liable for interest thereon.

(October 13, 1905.)

CROSS-APPEALS from a decree of the Court of Chancery Appeals, which modified a decree of the Chancery Court for Knox County, settling the affairs of a partnership; plaintiffs appealing from so much of the decree as allowed the surviving partner compensation and disbursements, and the defendant appealing from so much ording to the capital, after deducting such share of them as is attributable to the skill and services of the surviving partner.

Where the firm business, that of operating a quarry, was not closed out upon the death of one of the partners, but continued by the survivors, pursuant to the deceased's will and with the consent of the administrator, for the profit of all concerned until the appointment of a receiver by the court, it was held that they were entitled to the same salaried compensation for their services as they had been entitled to under the partnership agreement during the life of the deceased partner. Godfrey v. Templeton, 86 Tenn. 161, 6 S. W. 47.

The case of Maynard v. Richards, 166 Ill. 466, 57 Am. St. Rep. 145, 46 N. E. 1138, extensively quoted from in the opinion, was that of a railroad construction partnership. The contract under which the construction was to have been made was repudiated by the railroad company during the lifetime of both partners; before recovery for the breach, however, one died, and compensation to the other was allowed for his services in prosecuting the action, which appears to have been carried on with the consent of the executrix of the deceased.

So in Griggs v. Clark, 23 Cal. 427, also quoted in the opinion, the partnership funds were invested in cattle. At the time of the decease of one of the firm the stock market was poor. By carrying the herd over for a year, an additional profit of $6,000 was made. For the services of the partner who had charge of the stock, the court awarded $1,400, and deducted this from the $6,000 before distributing the profit. The court distinctly confines the right of a partner to compensation for winding up the affairs of the firm, however, to those cases in which the "partnership business has been continued for a considerable period of time as rejected a portion of his claims. Modified and affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Webb, McClung, & Baker, for plaintiffs:

Neither a partner, nor a surviving partner, is entitled to compensation for his services, except "upon the fullest, most cogent, and satisfactory proof" of contract to that effect.

Godfrey v. Templeton, 86 Tenn. 161, 6 S. W. 47; Piper v. Smith, 1 Head, 94; Berry v. Jones, 11 Heisk. 207, 27 Am. Rep. 742.

The employment of the engineer was to bribe and corrupt him. This was clearly an illegal, immoral, and corrupt transaction, and against public policy; and Callahan cannot now claim contribution from his copartners.

in order that the affairs of the partnership may be advantageously wound up."

In winding up a lumber partnership business, a surviving partner, after the lapse of much time, and through his unaided efforts, secured a considerable sum of money on lumber property in which the firm had an interest. For his efforts he was held, in Zell's Appeal, 126 Pa. 329, 17 Atl. 647, entitled to compensation under the exceptional circumstances of the case.

For managing an extensive tract of land bought in a partnership venture, until advantageous disposition could be made, an allowance was made, in Hite v. Hite, 1 B. Mon. 177, to the surviving partner who took charge.

Reasonable compensation for merely winding up the affairs of a grocery firm after the decease of his partner was allowed to the survivor in Royster v. Johnson, 73 N. C. 474.

Specific provision for compensation to the surviving partners appears in the articles under consideration in Sangston v. Hack, 52 Md. 173, and in the will of the deceased partner, directing a salary to the executors, one of whom was a partner, in carrying on the firm business, in Allen's Appeal, 125 Pa. 544, 17 Atl. 453.

Upon dissolution of a partnership between surgeons by the death of one, it was held, in Featherstonhaugh v. Turner, 25 Beav. 382, that, in the event of no sale of the deceased partner's portion in the firm being possible, then his interest in the business should be estimated, and the surviving partner compelled to pay the same to the executors of the deceased partner. In estimating such interest, Sir John Romilly, master of the rolls, states that, while the deceased partner was entitled to a share in the profits of the firm down to the date of the sale of his interest, yet that share would have to be calculated by ascertaining the

Wilkes, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a bill by the executrix of M. J. Condon, deceased, to settle up the partnership that existed between M. J. Condon and the defendant, George W. Callahan. This amount of the net profits made by the concern (after making a liberal allowance and compensation to the surviving partner, Mr. Turner, for his knowledge, time, and trouble in carrying on the business), and it would then have to be divided into fifths, according to the division of profits under the articles of agreement.

The case of Brown v. De Tastet, Jacob, 284, quoted in the opinion in the passage from Bates on Partnership, was that of a mercantile partnership between London merchants. Upon allowance, by the master, of proportionate profits to the estate of the deceased partner, in business carried on after his death, an appeal was taken, the surviving partners alleging that much of the profit was attributable to their own personal influence and connections and exertions, and that just allowance therefor should be made. This was allowed by the vice chancellor and affirmed by the chancellor (Lord Eldon). "I do not mean to intimate," he says, "whether the master should allow wages, as they are called, or compensation, but it cannot be denied that, if the business be such that on the death of the party other persons are concerned in aiding it by the application of their skill, their services, and their money, a great deal may be included under the head of just allowances, which, till the master has thoroughly sifted it, the court cannot determine."

This opinion by Lord Eldon would seem to put an end to the usual interpretation of his opinion in Crawshay v. Collins, 15 Vea. Jr. 218, as establishing the English doctrine that the surviving partner is, under no circumstances, entitled to compensation for his services in winding up firm business. See also, to like effect with Brown v. De Tastet, Cook v. Collingridge, Jacob, 607; Wedderburn v. Wedderburn, 2 Keen, 722; partnership was entered into for the purpose of constructing certain railroad work, and there is no controversy about its terms, nor the proportionate interests of the parties thereunder.

The partnership entered into an important and very expensive contract for railroad construction around Keogan tunnel, near Harriman, Tennessee. Soon after the work was commenced, M. J. Condon was killed, and the work was carried on and the contract was completed by Callahan, as surviving partner, by the consent of the executrix.

It was one of the terms of the partnership that the services of each member of the firm should be compensated for by similar services of the other member of the firm, and there was no contract as to the status of the parties in the event either died. The profits were from time to time divided, and when a final settlement was attempted to be made Callahan claimed certain items of expense which it was alleged were not in accord with the partnership contract. Thereupon this bill was filed to have the partnership of M. J. Condon and Callahan wound up and the rights of the parties determined. The contract resulted in a profit of some $67,000, and there was a fund of $6,119.87 in the East Tennessee National Bank to the credit of M. J. Condon & Company, where it was originally deposited, and where it had ever since remained until paid into court. The chancellor passed upon the rights of the parties, and declared the proportion in which they should share these funds, and adjudicated the costs. The complainants prayed a broad appeal, and the defendant Callahan prayed an appeal from so much of the decree as failed to charge the estate of M. J. Condon with 12½ per cent profit upon the gross amount of work which was sublet by M. J. Condon & Company to Ed L. Condon and M. J. Condon on a prior contract in South Carolina, and because he was refused proper salary as walking boss in connection with the work at Harriman, and for his services in completing the Harriman contract. In the court of chancery appeals a number of assignments were made by both parties, and the decree of the chancellor was affirmed, except that the defendant Callahan was allowed an additional sum of $903.73, on account of the South Carolina contract, and both parties have appealed to this court.

The first assignment made by the defendant Callahan is that the chancellor and the court of chancery appeals should have allowed him $6,300 compensation for carrying out and completing the contract made by M. J. Condon & Company to build the railroad around Keogan tunnel, which resulted in a profit to the firm of about $67,000. For this service he was actually allowed by the chancellor and the court of chancery appeals the sum of $2,700. Upon this feature of the case, the complainants assign as error that Callahan should not have been allowed any compensation whatever for his services after the death of his copartner, M. J. Condon.

We will consider these assignments of error together.

The court of chancery appeals report that it was a provision of the contract between the partners that each of them should devote his entire time to the business of the partnership, and that the work of one partner should offset the work of the other. That court reports that Callahan, in negotiating with Mrs. Condon and her son for a settlement, was willing to accept the $2,700

Willett v. Blanford, 1 Hare, 253; Yates v. Finn, L. R. 13 Ch. Div. 839.

In Mellersh v. Keen, 27 Beav. 236, an allowance for "their personal superintendence and management of the business" was made to banking partners who continued the business after they had given notice of dissolution by reason of the insanity of one of their firm.

A distinction is made between commercial and professional partnership by the Federal Supreme Court in a dictum in Denver v. Roane, 99 U. S. 359, 25 L. ed. 478, a case involving the affairs of a law partnership. The right to compensation in the case of a surviving partner in a professional partnership is suggested on the ground that the profits of the firm are the result solely of the professional skill and labor of its members.

This distinction is recognized obiter in Osmont v. McElrath, 68 Cal. 466, 58 Am. Rep. 17, 9 Pac. 731, and Sterne v. Goep, 20 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Hun, 396, both cases involving law partnerships.

See also Honore v. Colmesnil, 1 J. J. Marsh. 524, Hutchinson v. Onderdonk, 6 N. J. L. 277, and Bradley v. Chamberlin, 16 Vt. 613, where, upon voluntary dissolution, the partners winding up the affairs of the partnership were deemed entitled to compensation for their services.

Also analogous are cases of neglect on the part of one partner to perform his duties toward the firm business, thereby imposing the entire burden upon the remaining partners. In such cases it has been held that the latter are entitled to compensation for their services. Airey v. Borham, 29 Beav. 620; Newell v. Humphrey, 37 Vt. 265; Gyger's Appeal, 62 Pa. 73, 1 Am. Rep. 382.

From Hite v. Hite, 1 B. Mon. 177, and Griggs v. Clark, 23 Cal. 427, it would appear the compensation, where there are several surviving partners, is made only to that one who actually takes charge of the business and carries it on.

for his services. They further report that she at first agreed to this allowance, but afterwards repudiated her agreement. That court says that, while the weight of the proof tends to show that Callahan performed double service, in addition to the service of a walking boss, and that his extra service, aside from his walking-boss service, was worth the sum claimed by him, still that his own valuation of his services when the settlement was attempted between him and Mrs. Condon was the most reasonable basis to accept. That court declined to allow Callahan $150 per month for services as walking boss, because those services were rendered as surviving partner, in the prosecution and completion of the work; and the amount allowed him of $2,700 was allowed him by that court presumably upon the idea that it was a proper compensation for his services in carrying out the contract; and these services were rendered as surviving partner. So that, as we view the findings of the court of chancery appeals, the $2,700 allowed to Callahan by that court was for his services as surviving partner, and not simply as walking boss. The question presented, then, is whether, under the contract between the partners and the facts developed in this record, the defendant Callahan should be allowed anything for his services as surviving partner, and, if so, how much. As we construe the contract, it is not that neither partner should receive anything for his services, but that the work of the one should offset the work of the other. In other words, it was contemplated that the services of each would be worth the same, and that each should receive his share of the compensation in the services of the other.

On account of the death of M. J. Condon, he was unable to comply with his part of the contract and do his part of the service. We think the law in such case would imply that the partner doing the whole of the work should have reasonable compensation for that part of it which would have been done by the deceased partner if he had lived; or, in other words, he was entitled to compensation for that part of his work which his deceased partner would have contributed. Now, the general rule is that, as between partners, the surviving partner is entitled to make no charge for his services in winding up the partnership. Still this rule does not apply in all cases, but only to cases where the business is immediately put an end to and no further work is done, except to close up the matter of account as between the partners, pay the debts, and distribute the surplus, if any.

settled that surviving partners will not generally be allowed compensation for services rendered in winding up and settling the business of the firm; but that is not this case. The business of the firm was continued for the sake of profit, and the object was accomplished, resulting beneficially alike to the surviving partners and the estate of the deceased partner; the continuance of the business even for a longer time being expressly authorized by the will of the deceased partner, and with the knowledge and consent of the administrator with the will annexed."

In the present case the contract was continued by Callahan, as surviving partner, with the express consent of the executrix and sole legatee. It was necessary that it should be so continued, in order to realize the benefits of the existing contract by completing it, and to prevent loss by abandoning it; and it did result in a profit of about $50,000 to the representatives of M. J. Condon, and about $17,000 to Callahan.

Bates on Partnership states the rule as follows: "The principle applies to the burden of winding up after death, and the surviving partner can claim no extra compensation for it, the death of a copartner being one of the risks necessarily incurred by each; . . . but the rule applies merely to the simple and immediate winding up by collecting the assets, paying the debts, and accounting for the surplus, as is necessarily involved in the creation of a partnership and implied in the contract. But for time, skill, and trouble expended beyond this, and inuring to the general benefit, the reason of the rule fails, as where, after dissolution, a partner successfully continues the business of the firm, using the original capital, good will, or other assets, and a benefit is received from his efforts, he is allowed to deduct from the profits a compensation, varying according to the state of the accounts, the nature of the business, the difficulty and results of the undertaking, and, perhaps, its necessity or desirability. The most usual application of this limitation of the principle is in the case of a surviving partner continuing the firm business, or completing the enterprise of the partners. In Brown v. De Tastet, Jacob, 284, where the surviving partner continued the business with the original capital and was required to account for the profits, allowances were ordered to be made to him, not necessarily as wages, but such as the master should find proper. In Cameron v. Francisco, 26 Ohio St. 190, where the surviving partner, without being under contract to do so, continued the business (the publication of a newspaper), and, by thus being enabled to sell it as a going concern, preserved a valuable good will which would otherwise have been lost, and the personal representative, on electing to share the profits, were required to deduct a reasonable compensation. In Schenkl v. Dana, 118 Mass. 236, the property of the firm consisted of patents for improvements in weapons of war and valuable contracts with the government, and a manufactory and stock for fulfilling them; and the surviving partner, having completed the contracts and entered on new ones, was held entitled to extra compensation for all services in excess of mere winding up. In Griggs v. Clark, 23 Cal. 427, where the value of the assets was enhanced by the labor and time of the surviving partner to the extent of $6,000, he was allowed $1,400 out of the profit from the enhanced value. . . . In Newell v. Humphrey, 37 Vt. 265, partners in the business of buying cattle on commission had canvassed the territory, made many contracts, and ascertained who would have cattle to sell, without contracting with them, and then one partner died. Much time and labor having been spent, the commissions on these inchoate transactions were held to be partnership assets; but an allowance to the surviving partner for his time and expenses in completing them was held just and proper." 2 Bates, Partn. §§ 772, 773, pp. 821-824.

"The rule that a surviving partner is entitled to no extra compensation applies to his services in winding up the partnership. The winding up or settling of the partnership affairs after the death of one of the partners may be said to consist, as a general thing, in selling the property, receiving moneys due the firm, paying the firm debts and advances of the partners, returning the capital contributed by each partner, and dividing the profits. Where, however, the surviving partner renders services in excess of the mere winding up of the partnership affairs, he will, under certain circumstances, be entitled to compensation for such excess. 17 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, pp. 1154, 1183; 2 Lindley, Partn. 1046; Collyer, Partn. § 328; Parsons, Partn. § 346. It is said in Bates on Partnership, at § 773: 'The rule applies merely to the simple and immediate winding up, by collecting the assets, paying the debts, and accounting for the surplus, as is necessarily involved in the creation of the partnership and implied in the contract; but for time, skill, and labor expended beyond this, and inuring to the general benefit, the reason of the rule fails.' The most usual cases where the surviving partner is allowed compensation are cases where he successfully continues the business of the firm, or successfully completes an enterprise in which the firm has been engaged, so that a substantial benefit is received from his efforts. The amount of compensation will vary according to the state of the accounts, the nature of the business, the difficulty and results of the undertaking, and its necessity or desirability. 17 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 1183. If he performs such extra services with the consent of the representatives of the deceased partner, such consent is sometimes an important factor in determining the question whether he is entitled to compensation. His claim to compensation will, in connection with the circumstances already mentioned, be looked upon with favor, if the representatives of the deceased partner elect to share in the profits realized from his services as surviving partner." Maynard v. Richards, 166 Ill. 406, 57 Am. St. Rep. 151, 152, 46 N. E. 1138, 1142.

"The business may be of such a character that, on the dissolution of the partnership, it cannot be closed at once to advantage, and it is therefore continued with the expressed or implied assent of all the partners, and, by a like assent, is committed to the care and management of some only of them. In such cases the partner or partners in possession of the assets and continuing the business will, in equity, be regarded as in some respects occupying the position of trustees, and as such entitled to be compensated for services in the management of the trust property; and, whether or not any personal claim can be maintained therefor against the other partners, the value of the services may at least be deducted before accounting for profits realized from the business. Mellersh v. Keen, 27 Beav. 236; Airey v. Borham, 29 Beav. 620; Newell v. Humphrey, 37 Vt. 265; Schenkl v. Dana, supra;" Gilmore v. Ham, 40 Am. St. Rep. 570, note.

The cases of Piper v. Smith, 1 Head. 84, and of Berry v. Jones, 11 Heisk. 207, 27 Am. Rep. 742, are not in conflict with these authorities, or with the decisions of this court in the case of Godfrey v. Templeton, 86 Tenn. 161, 6 S. W. 47.

In the case of Berry v. Jones a bill was filed to wind up a partnership, and one of the partners insisted upon his right as surviving partner to act as receiver in winding up the partnership's affairs. This court simply held that the surviving partner was not entitled to compensation for his services in winding up the affairs of the partnership; that is, in selling the assets, collecting the moneys due the firm, paying its debts, and distributing the profits among the partners. This is the general rule as laid down by all the authorities.

The case of Piper v. Smith, supra, was also a case of winding up a partnership. It is true the firm at the time of the death of one of the partners was building some houses for itself, which had to be completed for the benefit of the firm, and it was there said that the surviving partner was not entitled to compensation for his services in superintending the finishing of said buildings. The question of carrying out an enterprise with a third party was not involved in that suit.

We are of opinion that, under the law and the facts of this case, the defendant Callahan was entitled to reasonable compensation for his skill, services, and labor in completing the contract; and the allowance should be made in view of the results realized. It is left a little indefinite by the finding of the court of chancery appeals, and under the claim of Callahan, what this amount should be, or, rather, the length of time he was engaged in completing the contract is differently stated,—in some places at eighteen months, and at other places at twenty-three months; and the defendant Callahan claims that he is entitled to compensation at the rate of $300 per month for the time thus employed. The court of chancery appeals, in effect, reports that his services were worth all or more than he claims.

Upon the basis of eighteen months, the compensation would be $5,400; upon the basis of twenty-three months, it would be $6,900. The defendant makes claim in round numbers for $6,300. Under this state of the record, we think we should fix the amount at $6,300. The offer to take $2,700, on the part of Callahan, was one based upon his services as walking boss. It was not offered as compensation to carry out the contract. It may be, if the proposed settlement had been accepted, no claim would have been made for services as surviving partner. The offer, moreover, was tentative merely, in order to arrive at a settlement. When Callahan was put to his legal rights, he insisted upon reasonable compensation, and the court of chancery appeals report that $6,300 is reasonable.

The complainant assigns as error that defendant Callahan should have been charged personally with $3,100, which he claims to have paid to G. Bottinger, the engineer of the railroad company. It is said that such payment, if made, was for the purpose of bribing and corrupting the engineer of the railroad company, and was immoral and against public policy, and Callahan should not have compensation for the same. It appears that this man Bottinger was employed with the approval of M. J. Condon before he died; and the court of chancery appeals report that the work which he was employed to do, and which he did do, was not in conflict with his duty and work with 1 L.R.A. (N.S.) the railroad company. That court says that the evidence wholly fails to show any fraud or collusive purpose in the employment of this man to beat or defraud the railroad company or to contravene any rule of sound public policy. No effort was made to conceal his employment from the railroad company, and it does not appear that the railroad was ignorant of his employment or the nature of the services he was rendering to the defendant. That court continues that, in addition to all this, it reasonably appears from the evidence that complainants knew that he was employed, or that such services as Bottinger rendered were being paid for as the work progressed, and charged up to the general expense account; and, indeed, it does not appear that they ever objected to allowing the credit assailed. Under this state of facts, we think the credit of $3,100 was properly allowed as a credit to Callahan, and the assignment of error complaining of the same is not well taken.

Complainants' fourth assignment of error is that the court of chancery appeals erred in charging M. J. Condon's estate with $3,614.95, profits alleged to have been made on a subcontract with M. J. Condon and Ed L. Condon in South Carolina. It appears that Callahan and M. J. Condon, previous to the contract now under consideration, had a contract to build 81 miles of track from Cheraw to Columbia, South Carolina, for the Seaboard Air Line. One of the provisions of that contract was that either member of the firm might subcontract enough work from the firm to give employment to any men and teams which either party might own or have individually, and which might not be sold to M. J. Condon & Company, and that, in the event that either or both of said parties should subcontract for any part of said 81 miles, he or they should be dealt with as other subcontractors on said line of 81 miles. M. J. Condon did sublet a part of this work to himself and Ed L. Condon at the same price that the company was to get from the railroad company. The company made an average profit of 12½ per cent on the aggregate amount of the work done under other subcontracts, and this rate of 12½ per cent under the contract to the Condons would amount to $3,614.95. Condon died before there was a settlement of the South Carolina business, as between himself and his partner, Callahan, and this matter was never adjusted between them. The court of chancery appeals finds that, under the South Carolina contract, this sum belonged to the firm to be distributed in the proportion called for by that contract; that is, three fourths to Mrs. Condon, as executrix, and one fourth to Callahan. This one fourth would amount to $903.73. The court of chancery appeals reports that this sum should be allowed to Callahan in the adjustment of his account with the Condon estate, and that any delay in claiming the same was satisfactorily accounted for by the fact that there had never been any final settlement of the South Carolina business, and that Condon had died unexpectedly and suddenly, just as the firm was entering upon a new and important construction job, and, in addition, the object of the bill was to wind up the partnership of Condon & Company, and this item, being unadjusted, legitimately came within the scope of the settlement. Under these facts, we are of opinion that the court of chancery appeals was correct in allowing Callahan this credit of $903.73.

The complainants' fifth assignment of error is because the court of chancery appeals refused to charge Callahan with interest on the money in his hands and under his control, belonging to the firm, after the 25th of January, 1902. It appears that, when the settlement was attempted between Callahan and Mrs. Condon, as executrix, there was in the East Tennessee National Bank, to the credit of Condon & Company, the sum of $6,119.87. This account had been opened by M. J. Condon in his lifetime, and Callahan after his death continued to make deposits of all the firm money to the same account, and it had all the time remained in the bank to the credit of Condon & Company. Callahan never used this money in any way, and never realized any interest or profit upon the same. It stood to the credit of M. J. Condon & Company, awaiting settlement between the parties, upon the terms of which they could not agree. We are of opinion that Callahan is not liable for any interest on this amount.

The sixth assignment of complainants, in reference to taxation of costs, is not well made. Under our view of the case, we are of opinion that complainant should pay all the costs of the appeal.

The decree of the court of chancery appeals is affirmed, except as to the item of compensation to be allowed Callahan for completing the contract and winding up the partnership, and as to that and the adjudication of costs it is modified, so as to allow Callahan compensation of $6,300, instead of $2,700, as fixed by the court of chancery appeals.

The costs of the appeal will be paid as heretofore indicated, the costs of the court below will be paid as adjudged by the chancellor, and the cause is remanded to the court below for further proceedings.

GEORGIA SUPREME COURT.

H. P. EADY, Plff. in Err.,
v.

NEWTON COAL & LUMBER COMPANY.

(123 Ga. 557.)

1. Partnership—private accounts—set-off.

An agreement between a customer and a member of a partnership, that its goods may be purchased and paid for by the customer in commodities furnished by him for the private use and benefit of such member of the firm, is void, as being beyond the scope of the partner's apparent authority.

2. Same—authority of partner—custom.

Articles of partnership may be enlarged by implication from a general usage and habit of the firm, acquiesced in by all of the partners. But, before such a custom would become binding upon a partner who did not expressly authorize it, the circumstances would have to be such as to indicate that he not only knew of the course of dealing in particular instances, but contemplated and tacitly assented to a regular course of dealing with the public, rather than a departure from the partnership articles in the excepted cases.

(August 1, 1905.)

ERROR to the City Court of Griffin to review a judgment in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due on an account. Reversed.

Statement by Evans, J.:

A partnership was formed in 1893 or 1894, under the firm name of H. P. Eady & Company, between H. P. Eady and J. A. Brooks, for the purpose of engaging in the wagon

Headnotes by EVANS, J.

Case Note.—The authorities and text-book writers agree that one partner has no authority, by virtue of the partnership relation, to cancel his own debt to a third party by furnishing to the latter partnership property without the assent of his copartner, or charging himself with its value on the firm books; nor has one partner the right to use partnership funds for the same purpose; nor can one partner claim the right to receive for his own exclusive benefit cash or commodities given by a customer of the firm in payment of firm goods. There can be no distinction between the payment of a private debt with firm assets and furnishing firm property to one who agrees to give his own commodities in exchange, for the exclusive benefit of one of the partners. Although each partner in the transaction of partnership business is an agent for and authorized to represent the firm, yet, he has no implied authority to apply property of the firm to the satisfaction of other than partnership debts, and, hence, is not justified in paying his own debts out of partnership and buggy business and conducting a blacksmith and general repair shop. Brooks had charge of the books and looked after the office affairs of the firm, while Eady assumed the management of the shop. Shortly after the partnership was formed Brooks approached J. M. Mills, manager of the Newton Coal & Lumber Company, and solicited the business of that concern, proposing to Mills that, if he would give the patronage of his company to Eady & Company, the individual accounts of its members for supplies purchased from his company would be allowed as a credit on such account as he might run with the partnership, and that they would in this manner "swap" accounts. Mills assented to this arrangement, and

Brooks afterwards purchased from the Newton Coal & Lumber Company supplies for his individual use to the amount of $113.51, and supplies for his firm to the amount of $59.02. In January, 1898, Mills and Brooks effected a settlement of accounts, which included the individual indebtedness of the latter. Brooks made no entry of this settlement on the books of his firm, and his partner had no knowledge thereof, or of the arrangement under which it was made. In June, 1902, Brooks effected another settlement with a representative of the Newton Coal & Lumber Company, whereby an account of $19.36 against Eady & Company and an account against Brooks of $121.44 were satisfied. Eady was not present and funds, or by a transfer of partnership property.

On the subject of the use of firm property for private purposes, Parsons on Partnership, 4th ed. § 90, says "that whenever a party receives from any partner, in payment for a debt due from that partner only, whether the debt be created at the time or before existing, or by way of settlement of or security for a debt, the indebtedness or obligation of the firm in any form, the presumption of the law is that the partner gives this and the creditor receives it in fraud of the partnership."

These principles are applied in cases taken from various jurisdictions. Thus, in Hartness v. Wallace, 106 N. C. 427, 11 S. E. 259, the court denied the right of one partner, without the knowledge or consent of his copartner, to transfer a firm note in discharge of his individual indebtedness. The court said: "It is very clear that one partner has no right, without the consent of his copartners, to use, devote, or apply the funds, securities, or other effects of the partnership to the payment or discharge of debts, contracts, or obligations binding upon himself individually, and with which the partnership has no connection. Such use of such securities would be, not simply a misapplication thereof, but, as well, a fraud upon the partnership, participated in by the partner so misapplying the same." The same rule is applied in Cannon v. Lindsey, 85 Ala. 198, 7 Am. St. Rep. 38, 3 So. 676, to a similar statement of facts.

In Rogers v. Batchelor, 12 Pet. 221, 9 L. ed. 1063, the rule was established that one partner cannot apply the funds of the partnership in discharge of his own separate, pre-existing debts without the express or implied assent of the other partners; and it makes no difference, in such case, that the creditor did not at the time know that the property was partnership property.

In Union Nat. Bank v. Underhill, 102 N. Y. 336, 7 N. E. 293, the court denied the right to recover on a firm note, executed by one partner without the knowledge or consent of his copartner, in payment of his own debt, the holder of the note knowing that it was so executed. The court said: 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

"Each member of a firm is the general agent of the firm in relation to all the business of the firm, and can bind the firm in what he says and does in such business. But, when one partner has a transaction with a third person which is neither apparently nor really within the scope of the partnership business, the partnership is not bound by his declarations or acts in the transaction." In McNaughton's Appeal, 101 Pa. 554, the same doctrine was applied.

In Cotzhausen v. Judd, 43 Wis. 213, 28 Am. Rep. 539, it was held that a desire to retain patronage will not authorize one partner, without the consent of his copartners, to apply a partnership claim in payment of an individual debt.

In Forney v. Adams, 74 Mo. 138, the court sustained the right of one partner to recover the value of firm goods which his copartner had transferred in payment of his private debt without the former's consent.

In Janney v. Springer, 78 Iowa, 617, 16 Am. St. Rep. 460, 43 N. W. 461, the court held that an agreement between a member of a partnership dealing in feed and his individual creditor, who was engaged in selling horses, by the terms of which the latter was to receive feed in payment of the former's note, is void as against the firm, unless the other member ratifies it.

In Woolson Bros. v. Fuller, 71 Vt. 335, 45 Atl. 753, it was held that a tailor who delivers suits to a member of a hardware firm is not entitled to a judgment against the firm for nonpayment for the goods, although there was an understanding between him and such member, unknown to his copartner, that the goods so delivered should apply in payment of the firm's account against the tailor.

Some other cases applying the same principles are Carter Bros. v. Galloway, 36 La. Ann. 734; Johnson v. Crichton, 56 Md. 119; Rogers v. Betterton, 93 Tenn. 630, 27 S. W. 1017; Clift v. Moses, 112 N. Y. 426, 20 N. E. 392; Buck v. Mosley, 24 Miss. 170; Farwell v. St. Paul Trust Co. 45 Minn. 495, 22 Am. St. Rep. 742, 48 N. W. 326; Davies v. Atkinson, 124 Ill. 474, 7 Am. St. Rep. 373, 16 N. E. 899; Pepper v. Peck, 17 R. I. 55, 20 Atl. 16.

took no part in this settlement, and the transaction was not entered on the books of his firm, nor did Brooks charge his individual account with the amount which he received thereunder. In April, 1903, the partnership was dissolved, and Eady became the sole proprietor of the business. Brooks was at the time hopelessly insolvent. On December 5, 1904, Eady, as the successor of the firm and as transferee of the accounts which it held against its debtors, brought suit against the Newton Coal & Lumber Company and the individuals who conducted business under that firm name to recover $200.80 on an open account claimed to be due by it to Eady & Company. The defendants filed an answer in which they admitted an indebtedness of $16.65, but by special plea they set up the agreement made between the manager of the Newton Coal & Lumber Company and Brooks, one of the members of the firm of Eady & Company, and the settlement of the accounts made in pursuance of that agreement. The defendants alleged that Brooks was authorized to enter into this agreement; that it was made in the usual course of dealings which had prevailed for a number of years, with the knowledge and approval of all of the members of the two partnerships; and that the settlement of accounts was made with knowledge and consent of Eady and in accordance with the custom recognized and followed by his firm in settling accounts between it and other firms in Griffin with which it transacted business.

On the trial of the case Brooks testified that he had no direct authority from Eady to enter into the agreement made with the manager of the Newton Coal & Lumber Company, but that Eady had knowledge that settlements of the character made with that company were effected with parties with whom his firm had business dealings, and that he never raised any objections to settlements being made which included the individual accounts of its members. Eady testified that he never authorized any such agreement, had no knowledge that it was entered into, and never consented to any settlement in accordance with its terms. As to transactions with other firms in Griffin, he explained that on certain occasions he had consented that, when parties called for a settlement of accounts, the indebtedness of the members of his firm should be entered as a credit on the demands which his firm had against such parties, but that in each instance the account against him individually had been presented to him, he had marked it "O. K.," and he and his partner had agreed that the settlement with the firm should embrace an allowance of the indebtedness held by its debtor against them individually. He 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

denied that he had ever conferred upon Brooks any authority to make any such settlement without his express assent and approval. A number of merchants testified to having made settlements with the firm of Eady & Company, in which demands against the members of that firm were allowed. In some instances Eady was present and consented to this arrangement; in other instances the settlement was made with Brooks in the absence of Eady. Only one of the transactions of this nature which was made by Brooks without the express consent of his partner appeared on the books of the firm, and Eady undertook to swear positively that the entry thereof was made after the firm was dissolved, by changing a former entry of $2.75 to $580.95, and that he had no knowledge of this transaction till after he had become the sole owner of the business. After the dissolution of the partnership, Eady repudiated the agreement entered into between Brooks and the manager of the Newton Coal & Lumber Company, saying he had no information in regard to it, and that the company would have to look to Brooks for the payment of his individual indebtedness to it. The defendants sought to show that Eady in point of fact knew of and tacitly assented to that agreement, but the only evidence adduced on this point was to the following effect: After this arrangement was agreed on between Brooks and Mills the latter was asked by Eady if he "didn't want a wagon" Mills replied, "You don't owe us quite enough to get a wagon yet," and Eady then said, "We will owe you enough." Subsequently Eady & Company wanted to buy a car load of coal. Mills went to the office of the firm, and in the presence of both members said that coal was sold at a very small profit, and that he could not charge it,—that he "could not swap accounts as to this." They accordingly paid cash for the coal, giving him a check for the price of it, and Eady took part of the car load, Brooks part of it, and a part of it was devoted to the use of the firm. Several bookkeepers, who had at different times been in the employ of the firm, knew of the custom of settling the individual indebtedness of its members when settlements were effected between the firm and other business concerns, and they were under the impression that Eady knew of this practice, as he looked pretty closely after the business.

After both sides had announced closed, the court, on motion of the defendants, directed the jury to return a verdict for only the amount which they admitted to be due, $16.65, holding that the plaintiff was not entitled under the evidence to recover the amount sued for. To the direction of this verdict exception is taken. Complaint is also made that the court admitted, over the plaintiff's objection, evidence as to the making of the agreement under which Brooks settled his individual indebtedness to the Newton Coal & Lumber Company, and as to the general custom of the firm of Eady & Company to make with persons with whom it dealt settlements of the character effected by Brooks with the defendant partnership.

Evans, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

1. Counsel for the defendant in error insists that the agreement between Brooks and the manager of the Newton Coal & Lumber Company was an engagement in furtherance of the partnership business, which Brooks had the right to make, and by which his co-partner is bound. This proposition is claimed to be supported by the case of Perry v. Butt, 14 Ga. 699. The report of that case discloses that the partnership concern did a cash and credit business and bartered goods for other articles. The defendant was a tavern keeper, and, in a conversation with one of the partners upon the subject of boarding, said that, when merchants or their clerks boarded with him, it was his custom to trade it out, and that he did not expect cash. It was the understanding that the tavern keeper's charge for the board of one of the partners was to be allowed for any goods he might buy of the firm. The tavern keeper had twice settled his account with the firm for goods purchased prior to the time the note on suit had been given, and in each settlement the partner's board had been allowed as a credit. These settlements were duly entered on the books of the firm. Upon these facts the great judge who delivered the opinion of the court said that one partner, in furtherance of the joint business, may agree with a hotel keeper that, if he will deal with the firm, his account shall be settled by the board of the partners, and the contract will be binding on the firm. It is perfectly clear and manifest from the entire report of the case that the court did not intend to hold that one partner could sell the firm's goods for his private benefit. Otherwise it would have been entirely useless for the court to discuss ratification because of prior entries on the books. And to make it more clear that such was not the intent is the express recognition of the principle that one partner cannot appropriate the partnership effects in payment of his individual debt. Still, as the language used is susceptible of the construction placed upon it by counsel for the defendant in error, leave was granted to review the ruling announced in the fifth division of the opinion filed in that case.

We think the true rule of liability is well stated in Warder v. Newdigate, 11 B. Mon. 177, 52 Am. Dec. 567: "If a firm sells goods and receives various commodities in payment, the act of one partner in relation thereto binds the firm, because it is in the course of its trade and done in the name and for the benefit of the partnership. But, when goods are purchased to be paid for in commodities furnished, not for the firm, but for one of the partners individually, and this fact is known to the purchaser, the act of one partner in such a case does not bind his copartners, unless they assent to it." To bind the partnership it is essential that a contract of this character be made not only in the name of the firm, but at least ostensibly for the firm's benefit. Otherwise it will not be binding on the partnership. One of the reasons advanced why such a contract would be binding on the copartners is that a partner has a right to accept specifics in payment of the goods of the firm; and, when firm goods are sold under a contract to be paid for in specifics for the individual use of one of the partners, and the goods are paid for in this way, a suit in the firm name to recover the value of the goods is not maintainable, because the goods have been paid for in terms of the contract under which they were purchased. Fay v. Green, 1 Aik. (Vt.) 71; Strong v. Preserved Fish, 13 Vt. 277; M'Kee v. Stroup, Rice, L. 291; White v. Toles, 7 Ala. 569 (overruled in Cannon v. Lindsey, 85 Ala. 198, 7 Am. St. Rep. 38, 3 So. 676). The fallacy of this argument is that the truth of the premise is assumed. The goods have never been paid for. The firm has never received any quid pro quo from the customer. As was said in Thomas v. Pennrich, 28 Ohio St. 55: "The assumption is true, if the setting off of a debt due the firm against the private debt of the partner is a payment of that debt; but it is conceded that a partner cannot pay his own debt by using the firm property to that end." Other cases are based on the observation of Lord Ellenborough, in Henderson v. Wild, 2 Campb. 561, to the effect that a receipt by one of the partners discharging the firm debtor in consideration of the settlement of a private debt of the partner executing the receipt is binding on the firm. Halls v. Coe, 4 M'Cord, L. 136. But this doctrine is repudiated by the great weight of authority, and recognition is given to the principle that one member of a partnership has no implied authority to dispose of property of the partnership in satisfaction of his individual debt or for his individual benefit. Columbia Nat. Bank v. Rice, 48 Neb. 428, 67 N. W. 165; Evernghim v. Ensworth, 7 Wend. 326; Thomas v. Pennrich, 28 Ohio St. 55; Minor v. Gaw, 11 Smedes & M. 322; Flower v. Williams, 1 La. 22; Atkin v. Berry, 1 Lea, 91; Thomas v. Stetson, 62 Iowa, 537, 49 Am. Rep. 148, 17 N. W. 751; Dob v. Halsey, 16 Johns. 34, 8 Am. Dec. 293; Cotzhausen v. Judd, 43 Wis. 213, 28 Am. Rep. 539; Chase v. Buhl Iron Works, 55 Mich. 139, 20 N. W. 827; Brooks Waterfield Co. v. Carpenter, 21 Ky. L. Rep. 851, 53 S. W. 40; Taylor v. Rasch, 5 Nat. Bankr. Reg. 399, Fed. Cas. No. 13,801; McNair v. Platt, 46 Ill. 211; Bell v. Faber, 1 Grant, Cas. 31; Gullat v. Tucker, 2 Cranch, C. C. 33, Fed. Cas. No. 5,866.

Several American courts have followed the English case of Jones v. Yates, 9 Barn. & C. 532, assigning as the reason why a partnership could not sue for the value of goods sold by one of the partners to a customer, under an executed agreement that the goods were to be paid for by delivery of specifics to the partner's private use, that it would allow a plaintiff in a court of law to rescind his own act on the ground that such act was a fraud on some other person. Greeley v. Wyeth, 10 N. H. 15; Homer v. Wood, 11 Cush. 62; Craig v. Hulschizer, 34 N. J. L. 363. As was clearly demonstrated in Purdy v. Powers, 6 Pa. 494, "this action does not proceed upon a suggestion of mala fides or imputed fraud in one of the parties, but upon the foot of the original claim springing from the debt contracted with the firm in the usual course of dealing, and therefore there is nothing standing in the way of the action which requires to be rescinded." An agreement between one partner and a purchaser to sell partnership goods and receive in exchange therefor commodities to be applied to the private benefit of the individual partner is a void act, in that it is beyond the scope of the authority of a partner to make such an agreement, and the very nature of the agreement informs the purchaser that the firm is parting with its property and receiving nothing in exchange. A private agreement by one partner for his separate advantage would work a great injury to partnership assets, and thereby to associates in the firm and the creditors of it. Several cases upon practically the same facts as are involved in the case under consideration have been before the courts, and a brief reference to some of them may aid in illustrating our position. In Brickett v. Downs, 163 Mass. 70, 39 N. E. 776, Brickett and Shorey were coal dealers, and the defendant was a dentist. The suit was for the price of coal, and the defendant pleaded that Shorey was having teeth fixed in the defendant's office, and proposed that defendant take coal in part payment for dental work done and to be done for Shorey and his family, and to this proposition the defendant assented. At that time Shorey owed defendant from $23 to $27, and defendant soon afterwards did work that increased the bill to $38.75. He had received the coal in part payment of his bill for dental work. Knowlton, J., said: "To receive property of a partnership, from one of the partners in payment of his personal debt, without the consent of his copartner, is no less a fraud upon the partnership than to pay a debt due the firm by doing or furnishing something for the personal benefit of one of its members. Such an arrangement, accompanying the receipt of partnership property, would be void against the other partner, and would leave the party receiving the property liable upon an implied contract to pay the firm its value." In North Carolina it was held that, in an action by a surviving partner for a debt alleged to be due to the firm, the defendant cannot avail herself of a debt due to her by a deceased member of the firm, though the contract between the latter and the defendant was that the debt, which was for the board of this partner, should be paid out of the store in which the plaintiff and the defendant's debtor were partners. Norment v. Johnston, 32 N. C. (10 Ired. L.) 89. In Goode v. McCartney, 10 Tex. 193, the plaintiff brought suit upon an account for merchandise sold the defendant. The latter pleaded in set-off an account for medical services rendered a partner of the plaintiff, who had furnished the goods under an agreement that the medical services rendered him by the defendant should be received in satisfaction. The court held that such an agreement between the customer and one of the partners did not bind the copartners, and the plaintiff was allowed to recover. To the same effect is Pierce v. Pass, 1 Port. (Ala.) 232.

It has frequently been held that, while a partner may apply partnership property to the payment of a partnership debt contracted in the prosecution of the partnership enterprise, he has neither a legal nor a moral right to appropriate partnership effects to the payment of his individual debt without the assent of his partner. Wise v. Copley, 36 Ga. 508; Harper v. Wrigley, 48 Ga. 495; Murphey v. Bush, 122 Ga. 715, 50 S. E. 1004. There can be no distinction in reason between the payment of a private debt with partnership assets and the delivery of partnership goods to one who engages to do or to give something in exchange for the exclusive benefit of one of the partners. In either instance the transaction amounts to a conversion of partnership property to the private use of one of the partners, with the knowledge of the person who receives the firm's property. Hence we conclude that an agreement between a customer and a member of a partnership that its goods may be purchased and paid for by the customer in commodities furnished by him for the benefit of such member of the firm is neither in furtherance of the partnership business nor within the scope of his apparent authority. See Parsons on Partnership, § 90, and cases cited. In so far as the decision rendered in Perry v. Butt, 14 Ga. 669, conflicts with the views above announced, that decision is formally overruled. We are not constrained to follow the early English decisions hereinbefore referred to, as they were pronounced subsequently to the period mentioned in our "adopting statute" as the period to be looked to in ascertaining what was the common law as understood and declared by the courts of England prior to the Revolution.

2. During the course of his examination as a witness, Brooks was permitted to testify as to the custom of his firm with reference to making settlements with its customers which embraced accounts held by them against its members as individuals. This testimony was admissible, as the witness undertook to swear that his partner had knowledge of the custom which prevailed, and raised no objection thereto. It is pertinent to remark, however, that, before such a custom or business usage would become binding upon a partner who did not expressly sanction or authorize it, the circumstances would have to be such as to indicate that he not only knew of settlements being made in particular instances in accordance with the custom, but contemplated and tacitly assented to a regular course of dealing with the public, rather than with a few customers who held small demands against the individuals composing the firm. The mere fact that in two or more isolated instances he agreed to a settlement whereby the customer was given credit for a private debt against his copartner would not suffice to establish his assent to a practice so general as to amount to a custom. It would have to appear that there was a general usage or habit of so conducting the affairs of the firm, acquiesced in by all of its members. 1 Bates, Partn., § 319. In a case where a partnership had frequently drawn checks against its funds in bank for the purpose of paying the individual debts of its members, this court held there was not sufficient proof of such "a course of dealing" as would justify the bank in assuming that it was within the scope of the partnership business to pledge its credit and give its promissory note in satisfaction of a debt due by one of the partners to the bank. People's Sav. Bank v. Smith, 114 Ga. 185, 39 S. E. 920. A customer has no right to assume that, because a partner expressly assents on one occasion to the allowance of a set-off of a demand for a particular amount held against his copartner, a like assent will be given to a similar settlement on another occasion, or that his copartner has any authority to bind the firm by any promise to settle its accounts in this manner.

What is said above disposes of all the questions which the record before us presents for determination. The next trial of the case should be conducted in accordance with the rulings above announced.

ALABAMA SUPREME COURT.

C. C. MONTGOMERY, Appt.,
v.

WILLIAM E. HENRY.

(.... Ala.)

Unnumbered ballots—validity.

Unnumbered ballots are not void under a statute merely providing that each ballot shall be numbered to correspond with the name of the person voting the same on the poll list, although omission to number the ballots is made a misdemeanor.

(November 21, 1905.)

A PPEAL by contestant from a judgment of the Probate Court for St. Clair County in favor of opponent in an election contest. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Case Note.—The opinion of the court quite extensively reviews the other decisions on the question of the effect of failing to number ballots as the statute requires. Its conclusion, that the failure to number ballots in the manner provided by statute does not necessarily render them void unless the statute expressly provides that they shall not be counted, is supported by the following cases in addition to those which are cited in the opinion:

In Kreitz v. Behrensmeyer, 125 Ill. 141, 8 Am. St. Rep. 349, 17 N. E. 232, under a statute which required the rejection of unnumbered ballots if they were in excess of the 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Messrs. Inzer & Montgomery, Smith & Herring, and James T. Greene for appellant.
Messrs. Goodhue & Blackwood for appellee.

Denson, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

At the general election held in November, 1904, C. C. Montgomery and William E. Henry were opposing candidates for the office of tax collector in St. Clair county. When the returns from the various precincts in the county were canvassed by the board of supervisors, it was ascertained that Montgomery had received 963 votes and Henry 976 votes, and Henry was declared duly elected to said office. Montgomery then instituted a contest against Henry before the judge of the probate court in said county. The cause was tried by the judge on an agreed statement of facts, judgment was rendered in favor of the contestee, and from that judgment Montgomery prosecuted this appeal.

By the agreed statement of facts it is shown that the election was in all respects fairly held and the result in each precinct was correctly ascertained and properly returned by the inspectors. There is no imputation of fraud or evil practice against any candidate, voter, or election officer. But in four of the precincts the inspectors neglected to number the ballots, and as shown by the agreed statement of facts, this irregularity on the part of the inspectors in failing to number the ballots constitutes the basis for the contest; or, as stated in the agreed statement of facts: "It is agreed that, if the court should hold that the unnumbered ballots should not have been counted, then the contestant is entitled to judgment." Thus, by the agreed statement of facts all questions except the rightfulness of the counting of the unnumbered ballots were eliminated. And so the record stands before us. The case involves a construction of §§ 34½ and 78 of the act of the legislature approved October 9, 1903, entitled "An Act to Further Regulate number of ballots shown by each of the three poll lists to have been cast, it was held that, where there was one unnumbered ballot, and the total number was one in excess over the number shown on one of the poll lists, it was error to reject the ballot, because it did not appear that the other poll lists agreed with the one examined.

And in Behrensmeyer v. Kreitz, 135 Ill. 591, 26 N. E. 704, it was held that where there was an excess of one ballot over the number shown by all the poll lists, an unnumbered ballot among them could not be counted; but where the total number of ballots cast was one in excess of the lists, and Elections in the State of Alabama." Gen. Acts 1903, p. 438. Those sections of the act are in the following language:

"Sec. 34½. Each ballot shall be numbered by one of the inspectors to correspond to the number of the voter voting the same on the poll list. A voter may write his name on his ballot. The number corresponding with the voter's name on the poll list must be plainly entered in ink on the back of the ballot of the voter. Any person who compares the number on the ballot with the poll list shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and on the conviction shall be fined not less than $100; provided, this shall not apply on the trial of any contested election case."

"Sec. 78. The inspector receiving the ballot shall detach the stub and pass the ballot to each of the other inspectors, and it must then, without being opened or examined, be deposited in the proper ballot box, after being numbered to correspond with poll list."

The acute question is, Are the requirements of the sections mandatory or directory? We deem the exigencies of the case do not call for a discussion of the origin and purpose of the enactment. Anyone who may desire to prosecute that inquiry may be greatly aided by consulting the cases cited in the briefs of counsel, wherein similar statutes were discussed and construed, and some of which will be hereinafter cited. In the discussion we shall endeavor to be as brief as we possibly may be, considering the importance of the question. As has already been disclosed, the case does not involve the act of any candidate or voter, but the acts of the inspectors of the election in the four precincts mentioned in the agreed statements of facts and the acts of the inspectors assailed are untainted with fraud or dishonesty. Section 190 of the Constitution authorized the legislature to enact laws not inconsistent with that instrument to regulate and govern elections. And the legislature shall provide by law for the manner of holding elections and of ascertaining the result of the same, and of registration, etc.

"Such laws will necessarily sometimes have the effect of preventing the elector from voting or of having his vote counted. For instance, a law for the registration of voters, to be effectual, must provide that one not registered shall not vote, and may require of the elector other conditions. But in all these matters the voter had the privilege of voting by a compliance with the law, and his failure to do so is somewhat owing to his negligence or misfortune. . . . The right to vote and have the vote counted should not be taken away by any doubtful construction of a statute, and before the voters should be shorn of the privilege it must be clear that, under the circumstances then existing, the legislature intended such to be the case."

We deem the doctrine well settled that statutes tending to limit the citizen in the exercise of the right to vote and of having the vote counted should be liberally construed in his favor. This doctrine, we think, should be applied in construing the statute before us. Lynip v. Buckner, 22 Nev. 426, 30 L. R. A. 354, 41 Pac. 702; Owens v. State, 64 Tex. 500; State ex rel. Law v. Saxon, 30 Fla. 668, 18 L. R. A. 721, 32 Am. St. Rep. 46, 12 So. 218. The courts, in order to give effect to the will of the majority and to prevent the disfranchisement of legal voters, have uniformly held those provisions to be formal and directory merely which are not essential to a fair election, unless such provisions are declared to be essential by the statute itself. In McCrary on Elections, § 190, the rule is stated as follows: "If the statute expressly declares any particular act to be essential to the validity of the election, or that its omission shall render the election void, all courts whose duty it is to enforce such statutes must so hold, whether the particular act in question goes to the merits, or affects the result of the election, or not. Such a statute is imperative, and all considerations touching its policy or impolicy must be addressed to the legislature. But if, as in most cases, that statute simply there were two of them that were unnumbered, only one of them should be rejected and the other counted.

In People ex rel. Bradshaw v. Bidelman, 69 Hun, 596, 23 N. Y. Supp. 954. under a statute which required the ballots to be numbered consecutively, and some of them were not, but were given much higher numbers, it was held that, in the absence of any fraud, they were not void. The court laid stress on the fact, that as the stubs showing the numbers had been removed before the ballots were deposited, they could not be identified, and there was no provision of the statute against counting them.

But under the Missouri statute requiring ballots to have registration numbers on them, and expressly providing that no ballot not so numbered shall be counted, it is held that the lack of such registration numbers on the ballots makes them void. Donnell v. Lee, 101 Mo. App. 191, 73 S. W. 997.

The effect of numbering ballots improperly is considered in various cases, but the question raised in respect to them is a different one, and usually arises under provisions of the statutes against marking ballots.

provides that certain acts or things shall be done within a particular time or in a particular manner, and does not declare that their performance is essential to the validity of the election, then they will be regarded as mandatory if they do, and directory if they do not, affect the actual merits of the election." Section 225, and citations in note 2. Paine, in his work on Elections (§ 498), expresses the same view in the following language: "In general, those statutory provisions which fix the day and the place of the election and the qualifications of the voters are substantial and mandatory, while those which relate to the mode of procedure in the election, and to the record and return of the results, are formal and directory. Statutory provisions relating to elections are not rendered mandatory, as to the people, by the circumstance that the officers of the election are subjected to criminal liability for their violation. The rules prescribed by the law for conducting an election are designed chiefly to afford an opportunity for the free and fair exercise of the elective franchise, to prevent illegal votes, and to ascertain with certainty the result. Generally such rules are directory, not mandatory, and a departure from the mode prescribed will not vitiate an election, if the irregularities do not deprive any legal voter of his vote, or admit an illegal vote, or cast uncertainty on the result, and have not been occasioned by the agency of a party seeking to derive a benefit from them." Judge Post, speaking for the supreme court of Nebraska in the case of State ex rel. Waggoner v. Russell, 34 Neb. 116, 15 L. R. A. 740, 33 Am. St. Rep. 625, 51 N. W. 465, said: "The view expressed by these authors has the support of the great majority of cases in this country and England. In fact, we are not aware that there is to be found in the reports any diversity of opinion on the subject. The following are a few of the many cases in point: Gass v. State, 34 Ind. 425; Piatt v. People, 29 Ill. 54; Barnes v. Pike County, 51 Miss. 305; Fry v. Booth, 19 Ohio St. 25; Tarbox v. Sughrue, 36 Kan. 225, 12 Pac. 935; State ex rel. DuBerry v. Nicholson, 102 N. C. 465, 11 Am. St. Rep. 767, 9 S. E. 545." Parvin v. Wimberg, 130 Ind. 561, 15 L. R. A. 775, 30 Am. St. Rep. 254, 30 N. E. 790; Stackpole v. Hallahan, 16 Mont. 40, 28 L. R. A. 502, 40 Pac. 80.

As to whether language should be construed as mandatory or directory, the doctrine is thus stated in Wheeler v. Chicago, 24 Ill. 105, 76 Am. Dec. 736: "The word 'may' is construed to mean 'shall' whenever the rights of the public or third persons depend upon the exercise of the power or the performance of the duty to which it refers. And so, on the other hand, the word 'shall' 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

may be held to be merely directory when no advantage is lost, when no right is destroyed, when no benefit is sacrificed, either to the public or to any individual, by giving it that construction. But, if any right to anyone depends upon giving the word an imperative construction, the presumption is that the word was used in reference to such right or benefit. But, where no right or benefit to anyone depends upon the imperative use of the word, it may be held to be directory merely." Endlich, Interpretation of Statutes (1888) §§ 433, 436, 437. Mr. Wigmore, in an appendix to the second edition of his Treatise on the Australian Ballot System (p. 193), after examining all of the reported cases upon the subject, concludes in the following language: "Wherever our statutes do not expressly declare that particular informalities avoid the ballot, it would seem best to consider their requirements as directory only. The whole purpose of the ballot as an institution is to obtain a correct expression of intention, and if, in a given case, the intention is clear, it is an entire misconception of the purpose of the requirements to treat them as essentials; that is, as objects in themselves, and not merely as means." State ex rel. Waggoner v. Russell, supra. The rule of construction was thus stated by the supreme court of Kansas in the case of Jones v. State, 1 Kan. 273, and approved in Gilleland v. Schuyler, 9 Kan. 569: "Unless a fair consideration of the statute shows that the legislature intended a compliance with the provision in relation to the manner [and procedure] to be essential to the validity of the proceeding, it is to be regarded as directory merely." In the case of Lee v. State, 49 Ala. 54, 55, which was a case that involved irregularities on the part of a manager of an election, this court said: "Did the irregularities in the conduct of the election. . . as stated in the record, render the election . . . invalid, in the absence of any fraud, or intended fraud, on the part of the persons who actually performed the duties of inspectors of election in conducting it; it not appearing that there was any misconduct on their part calculated to prevent a free, fair, and full exercise of the elective franchise? We think this question ought to be answered in the negative. Statutes directing the mode of proceeding by public officers are directory, and a strict compliance with their provisions is not essential to the validity of their proceedings, unless it is so declared by the statute; . . . and the court say that this rule should have a liberal application in respect to the duties of inspectors of elections, when we consider the character of the duties and of the men who are necessarily selected to fill these offices." Lee v. State, 49 Ala. 43; People v. Cook, 14 Barb. 259, and the same case on error, 8 N. Y. 67, 59 Am. Dec. 451. In those jurisdictions where the law requires the inspectors to number the ballots, but does not provide that unnumbered ballots shall be rejected or not counted, the courts have held that the law is directory. 10 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 716; Hodge v. Linn, 100 Ill. 397; Blankinship v. Israel, 132 Ill. 514, 24 N. E. 615; State ex rel. Waggoner v. Russell, supra. But in other jurisdictions, where the statute required that the ballots should be numbered, and that an unnumbered ballot should not be counted, it has been held that the requirement is mandatory. 10 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 716; West v. Ross, 53 Mo. 350; Ledbetter v. Hall, 62 Mo. 422; Hugher's Election, 3 Lack. Jur. 313; State v. Connor, 86 Tex. 133, 23 S. W. 1103.

The law of Nevada directs that the number of each ballot shall be the same as that of the corresponding stub, and that the number of the ballot shall be written upon the registry list opposite the name of the voter receiving it. After preparing the ballot, it must be delivered to the inspector, who shall separate the strip bearing the number from the ballot and deposit the ballot in the ballot box. At one of the precincts the inspector, through ignorance of the law, and not wilfully, neglected to separate the strip bearing the number from the ballot. The entire vote of the precinct was cast in this way. The law further provided that no ballot should be deposited in the ballot box unless the slip containing the number of the ballot had been removed therefrom by the inspector. It was held by the supreme court of that state in the case of Lynip v. Buckner, 22 Nev. 426, 30 L. R. A. 354, 41 Pac. 762, that the ballots should not be rejected. The court, among other things, remarked that "it is to be observed that the voters of this precinct were themselves in no wise in fault. They possessed every qualification for voting, and had complied with every requirement of the law as to registration, marking their ballots," etc. The law of Missouri requires the ballots to be numbered, and provides that any ballot not numbered shall not be counted. "The judges of election through inadvertence neglected to number any of the ballots; but the court held that the statute was mandatory, and all of the ballots were rejected." West v. Ross, supra. Rev. Code Miss. 1880, § 137, provided that all ballots shall have "a space of not less than one fifth of an inch between each name," and that a ticket different from that described should not be received or counted. The supreme court, construing the statute in the case of Keller v. Toulme, (Miss.) 7 So. 508, said: "Under § 137, a ballot L.R.A. (N.S.) lot other than that prescribed is not to be received or counted by the election officers. The standard prescribed is arbitrary, and, by the unequivocal provision of this section, its provisions are made mandatory, and not directory." The precedents referred to seem to support the correctness of the rule heretofore referred to as stated by the supreme court of Kansas.

In the case in hand no fault whatever has been ascribed to the voters nor to the candidates, but the trouble arose from what must have been ignorance of the law, or inattention to it on the part of the inspectors. The ballots were voted by the voters without any challenge, and were counted by the inspectors as they were cast, without a protest from any source. No one questions that the votes were the expression of the will of the voters, and that, when given to the contestee, entitled him to be declared the successful candidate. The court below held that the votes were properly counted for the contestee, and we are by this appeal asked to hold that the requirement of the statute with reference to the numbering of the ballots is mandatory, and that the unnumbered ballots should not be counted. Section 34½ (p. 453), while it provides that the ballots shall be numbered by one of the inspectors, does not direct that the ballots shall not be counted if not numbered. Neither does § 78 (p. 470) contain any prohibition against counting an unnumbered ballot. Section 87 (p. 473) is the only section in the act that has a requirement with reference to the rejection of votes; it is in this language:

"Sec. 87. In counting, the returning officer or one of the inspectors must take the ballots, one by one, from the box in which they have been deposited, at the same time reading aloud the names of the persons voted for and the office for which such person is voted for; they must separately keep a calculation of the number of the votes each person receives and for what office he receives them; if the elector has marked more names than there are persons to be elected to an office, or if, for any reason, it is impossible to determine the elector's choice for any office to be filled, his ballot shall not be counted for such office; but this shall not vitiate the ballot so far as properly marked, nor shall any ballot be rejected for any technical error which does not make it impossible to determine the elector's choice, and nothing in the election law shall be construed so as to prevent any elector from voting for any qualified person other than those whose names are printed on the ballot."

It is true, that § 50 of the act (p. 456) makes it a misdemeanor punishable by fine for any officer without lawful excuse to neglect, fail, or refuse to perform any official duty required by the act. But we have seen that provisions in statutes relating to elections are not rendered mandatory, as to the people, by the circumstances that the officers of the election are subject to criminal liability for their violation. Paine, Elections, § 498; Lindstrom v. Board of Canvassers, 94 Mich. 467, 19 L. R. A. 171, 54 N. W. 280. In the case of Lindstrom v. Board of Canvassers, supra, it was said by the supreme court of Michigan, that "it may be stated as a general rule that the provisions of law relating to the manner of conducting elections will not be held so far mandatory as that a departure . . . [from the rule] will result in the disfranchisement of a district or a class of voters, or the defeat of a candidate, himself free from fraud, except in cases where the legislative intent that such departure [from the prescribed rule] shall have that effect is clearly and unequivocally expressed." To the same effect is the ruling by the supreme court of Kansas in the case of Boyd v. Mills, 53 Kan. 594, 25 L. R. A. 480, 42 Am. St. Rep. 306, 37 Pac. 16.

The legislature, by § 87 of the act under consideration, safeguards the elector against the loss of his vote on account of technical errors committed by himself which do not make it impossible to determine his choice. But in the case at bar, we repeat, no complaint is made with reference to the conduct of any elector; but it is on account of the inadvertence of the inspectors that the contestant would have votes of four precincts in the county rejected and the will of the majority of the county (conceded to have been fairly and honestly expressed) thwarted. While it is well enough to insist on a proper and strict performance of duty by officers conducting elections, and to have been regular the officers should have followed the letter of the law in this instance, yet, the legislature not having declared irregularities like the one complained of in this case fatal, we conclude that the provision of the law with reference to numbering the ballots, pertaining, as it does, to the mode of procedure in the election, is directory, and not mandatory, and, of consequence, that the judge properly rendered judgment against the contestant. Paine, Elections, § 498; McCrary, Elections, § 225; Bowers v. Smith, 111 Mo. 45, 16 L. R. A. 754, 33 Am. St. Rep. 491, 20 S. W. 101; Lee v. State, supra.

The judgment appealed from will be affirmed.

CALIFORNIA SUPREME COURT.

WILLIAM R. MORTON et al., Respts.,

v.

JOHN MORTON, Appt.

(.... Cal.)

1. Unfair trade—injunction.

One who has established a business under a particular name, which he places on the hats of his agents to inform customers that they are his representatives, may enjoin another of the same name, who has engaged in the same business, from using such name as a hat label in such a way as to deceive the public into believing that the one bearing it is connected with the former's business.

2. Same—insolvency not necessary.

Insolvency of one attempting to make fraudulent use of another's trade name need not be shown to entitle the latter to an injunction.

3. Same—pendente lite.

An injunction to restrain a person and his agents from representing themselves to be connected with another's business, and from wearing his badge on their hats, is prohibitive, and not mandatory, and therefore may be granted pendente lite.

(October 14, 1905.)

A PPEAL by defendant from an order of the Superior Court for the City and County of San Francisco granting an injunction.

Case Note.—The doctrine that every person has the right to use his own name honestly in his own business, even though he may thereby incidentally interfere with and injure the business of another having the same name, is well settled. A person cannot make a trademark of his name, so as to prevent others of the same name from using it honestly in their own business. The inconvenience and injury that may result by the legitimate use of one's own name to one having the same name, and engaged in the same kind of business, is damnum absque injuria.

But, while the right of no one can be denied to employ his name in connection with his business, or with articles of his own production, so as to show the business or product to be his, yet he will not be allowed to designate his article by his own name in such a way as to cause it to be mistaken for the manufacture or goods of another, already on the market, or to use his name in such a way as to deceive the public into believing that his business is that of another. The maxim that one must so use his own as not to injure the possession or right of another applies to the use of one's own name as well as to the use of any other possession. Meyer v. Dr. B. L. Bull Vegetable Medicine Co. 7 C. C. A. 558, 18 U. S. App. 372, 58 Fed. 884; Allegretti v. Allegretti Chocolate Cream Co. 177 Ill. 129, 52 tion to restrain defendant from making wrongful use of plaintiffs' trade name. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. William J. Herrin, for appellant:

There is nothing to show absence of remedy at law.

Gardner v. Stroeve, 81 Cal. 150, 6 L. R. A. 90, 22 Pac. 483; Mechanics' Foundry v. Ryall, 62 Cal. 418; Tomlinson v. Rubio, 16 Cal. 204.

The showing is not such as to entitle respondents to have the objectionable sign removed from appellant's hat pending the final determination of the rights of the parties in the disputed name.

Gardner v. Stroeve, supra; Schwarz v. Superior Court, 111 Cal. 106, 43 Pac. 580; Hagen v. Beth, 118 Cal. 330, 50 Pac. 425.

N. E. 487; Nolan Bros. Shoe Co. v. Nolan, 131 Cal. 271, 53 L. R. A. 384, 82 Am. St. Rep. 346, 63 Pac. 480; Frazier v. Dowling (Ky.) 39 S. W. 45; Dodge Stationery Co. v. Dodge, 145 Cal. 380, 78 Pac. 879.

In other words, one man will not be allowed, although his name be the same as that of another person or manufacturer, to represent his goods as and for the goods of another. Brown Chemical Co. v. Meyer, 139 U. S. 540, 35 L. ed. 247, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 625.

But in such cases, however, an injunction issues, not because the name of the person first in the market is a trademark, but because such conduct on the part of the second comer is fraudulent. Brown Chemical Co. v. Myer, 31 Fed. 453.

As stated in Jamieson v. Jamieson, 15 Rep. Pat. Cas. 169, it is not a question, as has been sometimes suggested, of the right of the law to restrain a man from using his own name. The right and duty of the court always is to restrain a man from using a name that has come to be recognized as the name of a particular trader's goods, so as to suggest that the second comer's goods are the goods of the other party, and to pass them off as such.

And the court in Valentine Meat Juice Co. v. Valentine Extract Co. 83 L. T. N. S. 250, says that there is no distinction between cases as to the right of a person to use his own name to describe goods sold by him, where that name has already become associated with the goods of another party, and cases as to the right to adopt a fanciful name or particular words which by long use have become associated with the goods of another; though the court said that "of course, it is more difficult to deal with cases where the name is the name of the person, or the name of both the persons, as distinguished from a fancy name which has been created for the purpose of the particular goods," and that it is more abundantly necessary, where the name is that of the person accused of wrongfully using it, that it should be clearly established that the name has come to designate in the market the goods of the other party.

Messrs. Naphtaly, Freidenrich, & Ackerman, for respondents:

A person cannot use his own name as against another person of the same name unless he uses a form of stamp or label different from the stamp or label used by the other person.

Gilman v. Hunnewell, 122 Mass. 139; McLean v. Fleming, 96 U. S. 245, 24 L. ed. 828; Weinstock, L. & Co. v. Marks, 109 Cal. 529; 30 L. R. A. 182, 50 Am. St. Rep. 57, 42 Pac. 142; Schmidt v. Brieg, 100 Cal. 672, 22 L. R. A. 790, 35 Pac. 623; Sperry v. Percival Mill. Co. 81 Cal. 252, 22 Pac. 651; Draper v. Skerrett, 116 Fed. 206; Shaver v. Heller & M. Co. 65 L. R. A. 878, 48 C. C. A. 48, 108 Fed. 821.

The injunction is prohibitive, and not mandatory.

While the fact that another person of the same name has already made a reputation in a particular business cannot prevent a person from entering into that business under his own name, he must use every means reasonably possible to distinguish his business from that of the other party, and his goods from those made by the other. Royal Baking Powder Co. v. Royal, 58 C. C. A. 499, 122 Fed. 337; Walter Baker & Co. v. Baker, 77 Fed. 181; Walter Baker & Co. v. Sanders, 26 C. C. A. 220, 51 U. S. App. 421, 80 Fed. 889; Walter Baker & Co. v. Baker, 87 Fed. 209; Chickering v. Chickering & Sons, 56 C. C. A. 475, 120 Fed. 69.

Therefore, where the name "Valentine" has for many years been associated with a certain preparation of meat juice or meat extract, a person of the same name will be restrained from carrying on the business of manufacturing and selling meat extracts under the name "Valentine" without clearly distinguishing his business from that of the other party, and from selling or offering for sale any such preparation without clearly distinguishing it from the goods of the other. Valentine Meat Juice Co. v. Valentine Extract Co. 83 L. T. N. S. 250.

And the fact that the boxes in which the preparation of the second comer are packed are entirely different from the package of the party first in the market is of no importance, where the name has for so many years been associated with the goods of the latter that it has come to have a secondary meaning as designating his goods, and it would be impossible for anyone to use the same name in connection with the same class of goods without passing off his goods as those of the other party. Ibid.

Nor does the fact that the two names are spelled differently constitute a defense, if they are idem sonans, as in case of the names "Stuart" and "Stewart" (Stuart v. F. G. Stewart Co. 33 C. C. A. 480, 63 U. S. App. 561, 91 Fed. 243) or "McLane" and "McLean" (McLean v. Fleming, 96 U. S. 258, 24 L. ed. 833).

Even though the packages in which the two articles are put up are in some respects

Van Dyke, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal from an order granting an injunction upon a verified complaint at the time of issuing the summons, and without notice to the defendant. The complaint alleges substantially the following facts, viz.: Plaintiffs have for more than ten years previous to the bringing of the action (August 5, 1902), under the name of "Morton's Special Delivery," conducted the business of transferring for hire the baggage and luggage of persons from their places of landing in San Francisco to their hotels or places of destination therein, and from their hotels and residences to the depots or wharves whence they were about to depart. In that business they employed a large number of solicitors, whose business it was and is to solicit custom from travelers. Each solicitor had for some time been caused by plaintiffs, while actually employed in his work, to wear upon his hat a badge upon which is printed in conspicuous letters the word "Morton." This badge indicated to the public that the solicitor was representing the Morton Special Delivery, which is well and favorably known, and that any baggage intrusted to any solicitor wearing such a badge would be handled by the persons doing business under that name. The defendant, within a few months prior to the bringing of the action, became engaged in the same character of business, under the name of "Morton Transfer Company." For the purpose of misleading and deceiving the public, as alleged, into the belief that he was a solicitor of plaintiffs, and that they will handle all baggage intrusted to him to transfer, he has and still uses in connection with his business a badge affixed to his hat, with the single word "Morton's" thereon. Such badge is of the same size, color, and general appearance as plaintiffs' badge, and the letters thereon are precisely similar in size, color, and general appearance as those of plaintiffs' badge; the only difference being the additional "s," with an apostrophe, to the name "Morton." During such time defendant has and still does represent to the public that he is acting for plaintiffs, and by the use of this artifice he deceives the public into the belief that he represents the plaintiffs, and thereby procures from them much of their baggage for the purpose of transfer. It is alleged, further, that plaintiffs' business has become well and favora-

Nor is it essential that there should be a deliberate purpose or intention to mislead. Courts in such cases do not require proof of any peculiarly iniquitous, perfidious dealing. If the representation as to what or whose the goods are is calculated to deceive the purchaser, equity will enjoin its continuance, although the deceitful representation was placed upon the goods carelessly, or from lack of appreciation of the meaning conveyed to the purchaser, or from an honest mistake as to the party's right to use it. Tarrant & Co. v. Johann Hoff, 22 C. C. A. 644, 45 U. S. App. 143, 76 Fed. 959; Jameson v. Dublin Distillers' Co. [1900] 1 Ir. Ch. 43.

If a person resorts to any artifice to deceive the public in connection with the use of his name, as by imitating the trademarks or labels of another person, such use of his name will, of course, be enjoined. Holloway v. Holloway, 13 Beav. 209; Croft v. Day, 7 Beav. 84; McLean v. Fleming, supra; Drake Medicine Co. v. Glessner, 68 Ohio St. 337, 67 N. E. 799; Pillsbury v. Pillsbury-Washburn Flour Mills Co. 12 C. C. A. 432, 24 U. S. App. 395, 64 Fed. 841; Stonebraker v. Stonebraker, 33 Md. 252; Meyer v. Dr. B. L. Bull Vegetable Medicine Co. 7 C. C. A. 558, 18 U. S. App. 372, 58 Fed. 884; El Modello Cigar Mfg. Co. v. Gato, 25 Fla. 886, 6 L. R. A. 823, 93 Am. St. Rep. 537, 7 So. 23; Shaver v. Shaver, 54 Iowa, 208, 37 Am. Rep. 194, 6 N. W. 188; 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

For, as well stated by the court in Croft v. Day: "It has been very correctly said . . . that no man has a right to sell his own goods as the goods of another. You may express the same principle in a different form and say that no man has a right to dress himself in colors or adopt and bear symbols to which he has no peculiar or exclusive right, and thereby personate another person for the purpose of inducing the public to suppose either that he is that other person, or that he is connected with and selling the manufacture of such other person, while he is really selling his own. It is perfectly manifest that to do these things is to commit a fraud."

And positive proof of fraudulent intent is not required if the simulation is clearly shown. Drake Medicine Co. v. Glessner, and McLean v. Fleming.

The courts, however, will not enjoin a person from any use whatever of his own name because it is already used as a trade name by another, but will simply forbid its use in such a way as will be likely to deceive the public.

Thus, in Rock Springs Distillery Co. v. Monarch, it was held that the fact that a person had used his name, which was the same as that of another party in the same business, on a brand so similar to that of the other party as to indicate an intent to deceive the public, did not justify an inbly known under the name of "Morton," and that as a result of the defendant's misrepresentations in the use of said badge they have been damaged in the sum of $500, and, if such use and misrepresentations are continued, will suffer and sustain other damage, and that such loss or damage will be irreparable, and that they have no plain, speedy, or adequate remedy at law. All these allegations must, for the present purpose, be considered as confessed, the defendant having failed to answer. The injunction having been issued according to the provisions of § 527, Code of Civil Procedure, the defendant in the lower court might have moved to vacate or modify said injunction under the provisions of § 532, Code of Civil Procedure. He appears, however, to have failed to make any move in that direction, but, on the contrary, chose to take an appeal directly from the ex parte order granting the injunction, and to stand upon his contention that the order does not find sufficient support in the complaint on which it is based.

From the foregoing summary of the complaint, evidently this position of the appellant is untenable, as the complaint certainly states facts sufficient to entitle plaintiffs to an injunction. As in Weinstock, L. & Co. v. Marks, 109 Cal. 529, 30 L. R. A. 182, 50 Am.

junction placing an absolute prohibition on his use of his name in that business, and that the injunction should be limited to restraining him from using his name as a part of his brand in such a way as to simulate the brand of the other party.

But, where it appeared that it would be impossible for a person trading under his own name of "Cash" to sell frillings without their being known as "Cash's Frillings," which was a name that was universally used to designate the goods of another party, it was held, in Cash v. Cash, 84 L. T. N. S. 349, 745, that he would be restrained from any use whatever of his name in connection with the sale of frillings, since to sell "Cash's Frillings" would be to represent that they were the goods of the other party. This seems to be an extreme case, but the court said the circumstances were such that it would hardly be possible for the second comer so to differentiate his goods from those of the other party as to avoid misleading the public.

Other cases illustrating the extent to which the use of one's name will be enjoined are Royal Baking Powder Co. v. Royal, 58 C. C. A. 499, 122 Fed. 337; Lever Bros. v. Smith, 112 Fed. 998; Allegretti v. Allegretti Chocolate Cream Co. 177 Ill. 129, 52 N. E. 487; Tarrant & Co. v. Johann Hoff, 22 C. C. A. 644, 45 U. S. App. 143, 76 Fed. 959; Jameson v. Dublin Distillers' Co. [1900] 1 Ir. Ch. 43; Walter Baker & Co. v. Baker, 87 Fed. 209; Walter Baker & Co. v. Sanders, 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

St. Rep. 57, 42 Pac. 142, and Dodge Stationery Co. v. Dodge, 145 Cal. 380, 78 Pac. 879, the basis of plaintiffs' action is that defendant is attempting, by fraudulent representations to the effect that defendant's business is plaintiffs' business, to appropriate the benefit of the good will of plaintiffs' established business. The principle applicable was stated in the Weinstock Case, as follows, viz.: "When one tradesman resorts to the use of any artifice or contrivance for the purpose of representing his goods or his business as the goods or business of a rival tradesman, thereby deceiving the people by causing them to trade with him when they intended to and would have otherwise traded with his rival, a fraud is committed,—a fraud which a court of equity will not allow to thrive." This statement was approvingly quoted in the Dodge Case. The only appropriate and adequate remedy in such a case as this is the remedy of injunction; and this is so, regardless of the question of the insolvency of the person committing the fraud. If an injunction could not be granted as against a financially responsible person guilty of such fraud, the fraud upon the rival business and the public could be continued indefinitely, and the only right of the owner of the rival business would be in a multiplicity of actions for 26 C. C. A. 220, 51 U. S. App. 421, 80 Fed. 889.

For examples of the use that may legitimately be made of one's own name in such cases, see Burgess v. Burgess, 3 De G. M. & G. 896; Duryea v. National Starch Mfg. Co. 25 C. C. A. 139, 45 U. S. App. 649, 79 Fed. 651; and Rogers v. Wm. Rogers Mfg. Co. 17 C. C. A. 575, 35 U. S. App. 848, 70 Fed. 1019.

The rule as to the right of a person to engage in business under his own name notwithstanding the fact that another of the same name has already established a similar business does not apply to the right of a corporation to use the name of a stockholder or director as a trade name, since the name of a corporation is an artificial thing.

And a person may lose the right to use his own name by a transfer of his business with the good will and trademarks. Le Page Co. v. Russia Cement Co. 17 L. R. A. 354, 2 C. C. A. 555, 5 U. S. App. 112, 51 Fed. 941.

Though it has been held that the words "Fish Bros. & Co." and the picture of a fish may be applied by brothers named Fish to vehicles manufactured by them, although such words and picture were previously used by them in a business which has now passed with its good will and trademarks to a corporation, provided their use is not such as to induce persons to buy their vehicles as and for those manufactured by the corporation. Fish Bros. Wagon Co. v. La Belle Wagon Works (Fish Bros. Wagon Co. v. Fish) 82 Wis. 546, 16 L. R. A. 453, 33 Am. St. Rep. 72, 52 N. W. 595.

damages; whereas it might be, in many cases, practically impossible to ascertain the amount of damage done. The allegations in this complaint as to the nature of business here involved show beyond doubt that such would be the situation in this case. It is urged that, in so far as the injunction herein granted was mandatory, it was erroneously granted; the contention being that a mandatory injunction should not be granted pending trial, or until the rights of the parties had been definitely ascertained by the chancellor. We are, however, of the opinion that the injunction granted in this case was prohibitory only, and in no respect mandatory. The injunction complained of restrains the defendant, his agents and employees, from representing himself as the representative of plaintiffs, and from wearing on his hat, while engaged in the business of soliciting the transfer of baggage and luggage, a badge with the word "Morton's" thereon, or any badge similar thereto. This injunction does not restrain the defendant from carrying on his business in a legitimate manner and without the artifice referred to, by which it is sought to unjustly obtain some of the business of the plaintiffs. We are satisfied that the injunction was entirely justified by the allegations of the complaint, and went no further than was necessary to restrain the continuance of an artificial contrivance resorted to by defendant for the sole purpose of deceiving the public into the idea that in patronizing him they were patronizing plaintiffs, and of thus acquiring patronage intended to be given to plaintiffs. It is well settled that, while a person undoubtedly has the right to engage in business in his own name, he will not be allowed to resort to any artifice or contrivance in the use of that name for the purpose of deceiving the public as to the identity of his business or products, and that to prevent this result a certain manner of use of one's own name may, in a proper case, be prohibited. See Dodge Stationery Co. v. Dodge, supra, and other cases cited.

The order appealed from is affirmed.

EVELYN DICKINSON
v.
CITY OF BOSTON.

(188 Mass. 595.)

1. Action for suffering—evidence—disease.

In an action to recover for the conscious suffering prior to death of one injured by another's negligence, evidence is admissible that he was suffering, and finally died, from an intercurrent disease.
1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

2. Same—disease in family.

Refusal to admit evidence, in an action to recover for the conscious suffering prior to death of one injured by another's negligence, that members of the family had died of tuberculosis, for the purpose of raising the presumption that the injured person died of that disease, is not reversible error.

3. Declarations—notice of accident.

Serving a notice of accident on a city, as required by statute, is not a bringing of an action, within the meaning of a statute permitting the admission of evidence of declarations of an injured person made before action brought.

4. Municipal corporations—injury by street lamp.

A municipal corporation is liable for injuries caused by the negligent management by its agents of lamp posts erected for the lighting of its streets, where the duty of street lighting is not imposed by statute, but is undertaken under statutory authority, to lessen its liability to actions for unsafe highways.

5. Same—negligence of officer.

A superintendent of the lamp department of a city, whether appointed by the mayor or elected by the city council, is not a public officer, for whose negligence the city is not liable, where the maintenance of street lights is not required by statute, but is undertaken by the city for its own convenience.

(September 7, 1905.)

EXCEPTIONS by defendant to rulings of the Superior Court for Suffolk County, made during the trial of an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence, which was prosecuted after plaintiff's death by her administrator, and resulted in a verdict in plaintiff's favor. Overruled.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Samuel M. Child for defendant.

Messrs. Charles W. Bartlett, Elbridge R. Anderson, and Arthur T. Smith for plaintiff.

Braley, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action of tort to recover damages for injuries suffered by the plaintiff's intestate, caused by the fall of a defective lamp post owned by the defendant. Originally the deceased sought to sustain the action under Rev. Laws, chap. 51, § 18, for injuries received as a traveler upon the highway. But, if the lamp post which fell stood in a public way, at the time of the accident she was on her own premises, and this statutory provision is inapplicable. Upon her death, the plaintiff, as administrator, being admitted to prosecute the suit, by an amendment duly allowed, declared in tort at common law for the alleged negligence of the defendant in not keeping and maintaining the lamp post in repair, and allowing it to become defective and unsafe. The plaintiff having obtained a verdict in the superior court, the defendant brings the case here on exceptions to the exclusion and admission of certain evidence, and to a refusal to rule that, upon all the evidence, the action could not be maintained.

No argument has been advanced at the bar, nor is found in the defendant's brief, that, if the action could be maintained, there was no evidence for the jury of its negligence, or that the deceased was not in the exercise of due care. This leaves for our consideration such matters only as were argued, or appear in the briefs. Before taking up the principal question of liability, the correctness of the rulings relating to evidence may be considered. The cause of action was for the conscious suffering of the plaintiff's intestate from the time of the accident to her death, and evidence which had a tendency to prove that during this period she was suffering and finally died from an intercurrent disease was admissible. But the attempt of the defendant for this purpose to elicit on cross-examination from the mother of the deceased, who was a witness for the plaintiff, that others of Case Note.—The distinction between public and private functions of a municipality, as affecting liability for the negligence of its agents, has been recognized in a large number of cases, the municipality being held liable if the negligence is with respect to its private or corporate functions or duties, while no liability attaches, in the absence of statutory provisions, if the negligence is with respect to its public or governmental duties. The rule is variously stated, and various reasons given therefor, in different cases.

Thus, in Esberg-Gunst Cigar Co. v. Portland, 34 Or. 282, 43 L. R. A. 435, 75 Am. St. Rep. 651, 55 Pac. 961, the court states that there is a well-established distinction between the liability of a municipal corporation for the acts of its servants, agents, officers, or employees in the exercise of powers and duties granted to, or imposed upon, it as a mere agency of the state, and performed exclusively for public governmental purposes, and for acts done in the exercise of powers granted to it, or privileges conferred upon it, for its own profit, advantage, and emolument, although inuring incidentally to the public.

And in Galveston v. Posnainsky, 62 Tex. 118, 50 Am. Rep. 517, the court states that in so far as municipalities exercise powers conferred on them for purposes essentially public,—purposes pertaining to the administration of general laws, made to enforce the general policy of the state,—they should be deemed agencies of the state, and not subject to be sued for any act or omission occurring while in the exercise of such power, unless the action is given by statute; but that in so far as they exercise powers voluntarily assumed, and intended for the private advantage and benefit of the locality and its inhabitants, there seems to be no sufficient reason why they should be relieved from that liability to suit, and that measure of actual damages, to which an individual or private corporation exercising the same power for a purpose essentially private would be subject.

And in Wagner v. Portland, 40 Or. 389, 60 Pac. 985, 67 Pac. 300, the court says: 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

"Municipal corporations exist in a dual capacity, and their functions are twofold. In one, they exercise the right springing from sovereignty, and, while in the performance of the duties pertaining thereto, their acts are political and governmental. Their officers and agents, though elected or appointed and paid by them, are nevertheless public functionaries, performing a public service in which the corporations, as such, have no particular interest, and from which they derive no special benefit or advantage in their private or corporate capacity. Such officials are not, strictly speaking, the servants and agents of the municipalities through which they derive their authority, but are officers, agents, and servants of the state . . . and for their acts of omission and commission the municipalities themselves are not liable. In the other, they exercise a private, proprietary, or corporate right, arising from their existence as legal persons, and where the duty is one that rests upon the municipalities in respect of their special or local interests, and not as public agencies, and is absolute and perfect, not discretionary or judicial, in its nature, their officers and agents, in the performance of the function or duty, act in behalf of, or as the alter ego of, the municipalities in their corporate capacity, and not for the state or public at large, and for their acts the municipalities are held to accountability."

The distinction is also recognized in 2 Dill. Mun. Corp. 4th ed. § 974, where it is stated that if the municipal corporation appoints or elects the servants or agents for whose acts it is claimed to be liable, and can control them in the discharge of their duties, and continue or remove them, and hold them responsible for the manner in which they discharge their trust, and if such duties relate to the exercise of corporate powers, and are for the peculiar benefit of the corporation in its local or special interest, they may justly be regarded as its agents or servants, and the maxim respondet superior applies; but that if they are elected or appointed by the corporation, in obedience to statute, to perform a public her children had died from pulmonary tuberculosis, and hence there was a presumption that her daughter also had died from this disease, well may have been deemed, in the discretion of the presiding judge, as too remote to be of any probative value, and its exclusion affords no just ground of exception. Jennings v. Rooney, 183 Mass. 577, 67 N. E. 665; Perkins v. Rice, 187 Mass. 28, 72 N. E. 323. Furthermore, whatever benefit might have been derived from an answer to the question later was obtained by the defendant when, from one of its medical witnesses, uncontroverted evidence of the presence of this disease in the family, and under such circumstances that, if infectious, the deceased might have contracted it, was admitted. Morrison v. Lawrence, 186 Mass. 456, 72 N. E. 91.

Under an objection, but without an exception being taken at the time, though subsequently allowed as an exception of the defendant, a witness for the plaintiff, who had acted as counsel for her intestate, was permitted to give evidence of declarations she had made to him before the commencement of the action, whereby she fully narrated the circumstances under which the accident occurred. It now is urged that, as this conversation was held after a notice under Rev. Laws, chap. 51, § 20, had been served upon the city, it is not brought within the provisions of Stat. 1898, chap. 535, now Rev. Laws, chap. 175, § 66, because service, not peculiarly local or corporate, and are independent of the corporation as to the tenure of their office and the manner of discharging their duties, they are not to be regarded as agents or servants of the municipality, but as public, or state, officers, and the doctrine of respondeat superior is not applicable.

The doctrine also finds expression in a different form in some cases, such as Rochester White Lead Co. v. Rochester, 3 N. Y. 463, 53 Am. Dec. 316; Bowden v. Kansas City, 69 Kan. 587, 66 L. R. A. 181, 105 Am. St. Rep. 187, 77 Pac. 573, and Kobs v. Minneapolis, 22 Minn. 159, which draw a distinction between those duties which are legislative or judicial in their nature, and therefore discretionary, in which case there is no liability, and those duties which are absolute and perfect, or merely ministerial, for negligence in the performance of which the municipality is held liable. In regard to this distinction the statement is made in 2 Dill. Mun. Corp. 4th ed. § 966, that it is the almost, but not quite, uniform doctrine of the courts that municipal corporations proper are liable where the wrong resulting in an injury to others consists in a mere neglect or omission to perform an absolute and perfect, as distinguished from a legislative, discretionary, quasi judicial, or imperfect, corporate duty owing by the corporation to the plaintiff, or in the performance of which he is specially interested.

The court, however, in Black v. Columbia, 19 S. C. 412, 45 Am. Rep. 785, expresses itself as opposed to making any distinction between public and private functions because of the difficulty of carrying the doctrine into anything like uniform practice.

But the distinction spoken of is quite generally recognized, and the courts seldom disagree in stating the rule, although it is admitted that considerable difficulty is often experienced in determining the class to which a given case belongs, and conclusions reached do not always agree; and although many cases are decided by applying other principles, without any reference to such distinction.

Some of these duties or functions are very generally recognized as public, for negligence (L.R.A. (N.S.)

gence in the performance of which there is no liability. One of these is as to police officers,—liability being denied in such cases as reckless shooting by a policeman (Whitfield v. Paris, 84 Tex. 431, 15 L. R. A. 783, note, 31 Am. St. Rep. 69, 19 S. W. 566); for an assault in making an unlawful arrest (Calwell v. Boone, 51 Iowa, 687, 33 Am. Rep. 154, 2 N. W. 614); and injuries inflicted while attempting to enforce an ordinance forbidding the running at large of unmuzzled dogs (Culver v. Streator, 130 Ill. 238, 6 L. R. A. 270, 22 N. E. 810).

Municipal liability has generally been denied also for the same reason for the negligent acts of the fire department; as, in permitting apparatus to get out of repair, causing injury to an employee (Peterson v. Wilmington, 130 N. C. 76, 56 L. R. A. 959, 40 S. E. 853); an injury to one in the street while members of the department were going to a fire (Greenwood v. Louisville, 13 Bush, 226, 26 Am. Rep. 263); the frightening of a horse by steam escaping from a fire engine (Burrill v. Augusta, 78 Me. 118, 57 Am. Rep. 788, 3 Atl. 177); or the destruction of property by fire, due to permitting the water pipes and hydrants to become clogged or out of repair (Mendel v. Wheeling, 28 W. Va. 233, 57 Am. Rep. 664; Miller v. Minneapolis, 75 Minn. 131, 77 N. W. 788).

But in Lenzen v. New Braunfels, 13 Tex. Civ. App. 335, 35 S. W. 341, a city which voluntarily maintained a system of waterworks for general purposes and the extinguishment of fire, for its own advantage and profit, was held liable for the destruction of property by fire, due to insufficiency of water supply, on the ground that the duty was not a public, but a corporate, one.

The power or duty to provide for the public health is also held to be public in its nature, so that the liability of a municipal corporation for negligence has been denied in such cases as the death of an employee from smallpox, contracted in tearing down a smallpox hospital (Nicholson v. Detroit, 129 Mich. 246, 56 L. R. A. 601, 88 N. W. 695); for sickness or death from permitting a drainage ditch to become obstructed and filled with filth and offal (Williams v. Greenville, 130 N. C. 93, 57 L. R. A. 207, 89 serving such a notice is the bringing of an action within the meaning of the statute, after which such declarations are declared inadmissible. The presumption, however, is plain that it was the legislative purpose that this language should have its ordinary meaning as used in our laws, and the words "commencement of the action" refer to the date when proceedings are instituted by a writ or other legal process issuing from the clerk's office. Ford v. Phillips, 1 Pick. 202; Gardner v. Webber, 17 Pick. 407, 411; Com. v. Casey, 12 Allen, 214, 217. While a preliminary finding of the good faith of the declarant by the court is required before such declarations can be received, this judicial action is to be inferred from the admission of the evidence itself, where the exceptions fail to state that the inquiry was not made. Dixon v. New England R. Co. 179 Mass. 242, 246, 60 N. E. 581. These declarations, therefore, were within the statute, and properly admitted in evidence. Brooks v. Holden, 175 Mass. 137, 55 N. E. 802.

By an ordinance duly enacted the city had established a lamp department, that included the lamps and other property used in its system of street lighting, the management of which was intrusted to an officer, therein designated as a "superintendent of lamps." The defendant now insists that he was a public officer, for whose negligence it was not responsible. It relies, in support of

Am. St. Rep. 860, 40 S. E. 977); and for injury by falling into a vault on private premises, left open after removing its contents (Bryant v. St. Paul, 33 Minn. 289, 53 Am. Rep. 31, 23 N. W. 220).

On the other hand, the maintenance by a city of its own waterworks, from which it derives revenue and profit, is generally held to be of a private or corporate nature, so that it has been held liable in such cases as an injury to goods stored in a cellar, due to the bursting of a water main (Esberg-Gunst Cigar Co. v. Portland, 34 Or. 282, 43 L. R. A. 435, 75 Am. St. Rep. 651, 55 Pac. 961); and an injury due to the bursting of a dam, unskillfully constructed (Bailey v. New York, 3 Hill, 531, 38 Am. Dec. 669). But, as has been said before, liability has generally been denied in case of loss by fire from failure to furnish a sufficient water supply.

The use of public streets has been held quite generally to come within the police power, so that liability has been denied in such cases as injury by firing of a cannon by private individuals (Arms v. Knoxville, 32 Ill. App. 604; Norristown v. Fitzpatrick, 94 Pa. 121, 39 Am. Rep. 771; O'Rourke v. Sioux Falls, 4 S. D. 47, 19 L. R. A. 789, 46 Am. St. Rep. 760, 54 N. W. 1044); and injury due to coasting, permitted by the public authorities (Wilmington v. Vandegrift, 1 Marv. (Del.) 5, 25 L. R. A. 538, 65 Am. St. Rep. 256, 29 Atl. 1047; Dudley v. Flemingsburg, 115 Ky. 6, 60 L. R. A. 575, 103 Am. St. Rep. 253, 72 S. W. 327).

But in Taylor v. Cumberland, 64 Md. 68, 54 Am. Rep. 759, 20 Atl. 1027, the court, without referring to the distinction between public and private duties, held that a municipal corporation is under an obligation to exercise for the public good the powers conferred on it by its charter to prevent such nuisances as coasting, and that its duty in that regard was not discharged by merely passing an ordinance forbidding it.

And in Speir v. Brooklyn, 139 N. Y. 6, 21 L. R. A. 641, 36 Am. St. Rep. 664, 34 N. E. 727, a city was held liable for injuries during a display of fireworks by private individuals, on the ground that it permitted a nuisance.

In applying the doctrine to the question of liability for injuries due to the condition of the streets, the conflict between the authorities becomes very pronounced.

Thus, in Hill v. Boston, 122 Mass. 344, 23 Am. Rep. 332, the court, Gray, Ch. J., writing the opinion, after a very thorough and exhaustive discussion of the authorities, both English and American, on the question of liability for injury due to defects in highways, denies the liability of a city for injuries to a pupil in a public school, caused by a defective stairway, on the ground that the neglect was with regard to a public duty.

The city's liability was also denied for the same reason for an injury due to a defective cross walk, in Detroit v. Blackeby, 21 Mich. 84, 4 Am. Rep. 450; and for injuries due to plaintiff's horse falling into a hole in a drain across one of the streets, in Young v. Charleston, 20 S. C. 116, 47 Am. Rep. 827.

But Galveston v. Posnainsky, 62 Tex. 118, 50 Am. Rep. 517, holds a city liable for injuries by falling into a drain along an unguarded sidewalk, on the ground that its duties in regard thereto were ministerial.

The liability of a municipal corporation proper for injuries due to defects in the streets is sustained by the majority of the cases, and in reaching such conclusion the courts have relied upon the existence of a right of action expressly given by statute, the existence of a statutory duty resting on the municipality as such, either directly expressed, or to be implied from a proper construction of the statute; the fact that the municipal corporation has sole care and control of its streets, or upon the application of some other principle of a similar nature, rather than upon the distinction between public and private functions.

This distinction has been recognized in many other kinds of cases, but from the illustrations given it will be seen that there is practical unanimity of opinion as to the application of the doctrine to some powers and duties, and that there has been great difficulty and much conflict of opinion in making the application as to others.

this position, upon Stat. 1825, chap. 3, p. 313, permitting the city to set up and maintain lamps in its streets, so far as might be convenient and necessary for the purpose of lighting them, "and to make all necessary contracts, rules, orders, and regulations respecting said lamps." Under the Prov. Stat. 1773-74, chap. 12, 5 Prov. Laws (state ed.), 301, confirmed by Stat. 1796, chap. 69, enacted when Boston was a town, and Stat. 1825, chap. 3, p. 313, passed after it became a city, the defendant was authorized, but not required, to maintain lamps to light its streets, and to enact proper ordinances providing for the punishment of those "breaking or otherwise damaging the same." No general statutory duty is imposed upon cities and towns, requiring them to light their streets for any purpose. See Pub. Stat. 1882, chap. 203, § 76. But, when they are lighted at the expense of the municipality, authority to tax for such an expenditure must be given by statute. Minot v. West Roxbury, 112 Mass. 1, 17 Am. Rep. 52; Coolidge v. Brookline, 114 Mass. 592, 594. And it has been said that the probable reason for the passage of these special laws was the limitation on the taxing power of the defendant; as without them neither the town nor the city could have established and maintained lawfully a system of artificial lighting of its streets, to be paid for out of the public revenue. Spaulding v. Peabody, 153 Mass. 129, 131, 132, 10 L. R. A. 397, 26 N. E. 421.

In suits for damages caused by defects in streets which at night may become dangerous to travelers because they are dark and unlighted, it uniformly has been held that, as a city or town is under no statutory requirement to light them, an omission to do so does not constitute negligence. Sparhawk v. Salem, 1 Allen, 30, 32, 79 Am. Dec. 700; Randall v. Eastern R. Co. 106 Mass. 276, 8 Am. Rep. 327; Lyon v. Cambridge, 136 Mass. 419; Spillane v. Fitchburg, 177 Mass. 87, 88, 83 Am. St. Rep. 262, 58 N. E. 176. But if, under no obligation imposed by statute, the defendant undertook this service for the general convenience of its citizens and travelers within its borders, it also by so doing derived an incidental benefit by the protection thus afforded of decreasing the probability of actions against it for defective public ways, under Rev. Laws, chap. 51, §§ 1, 18. An unlighted public way, indeed, may be dangerous when used at night, though not thereby rendered defective. If, however, it is out of repair, and this condition has been undiscovered, or, if discovered, not remedied, the probability that travelers using it would be less likely to be injured when lighted than if unlighted is apparent and appreciable. It was unnecessary for the plaintiff to show that any direct commercial profit had been derived. The indirect benefit thus conferred supplied a sufficient motive for the defendant's action. Having voluntarily undertaken the enterprise for its private benefit, and not acting in the performance of any public duty, it is liable for negligence in the management of its corporate property, when used for such purpose. Perry v. Worcester, 6 Gray, 544, 66 Am. Dec. 431; Bigelow v. Randolph, 14 Gray, 541, 543; Hawks v. Charlemont, 107 Mass. 414; Sullivan v. Holyoke, 135 Mass. 273; Tindley v. Salem, 137 Mass. 171, 50 Am. Rep. 289; Waldron v. Haverhill, 143 Mass. 582, 10 N. E. 481; Doherty v. Braintree, 148 Mass. 495, 20 N. E. 106; Coan v. Marlborough, 164 Mass. 206, 208, 41 N. E. 238; Collins v. Greenfield, 172 Mass. 78, 51 N. E. 454; Butman v. Newton, 179 Mass. 1, 88 Am. St. Rep. 349, 60 N. E. 401.

By the ordinance the superintendent of lamps, among other duties, was required, at the expense of the city, to keep and maintain "all lamp posts" in good repair. It was through his negligence that the lamp post that fell was allowed to fall into decay. That the city could act as well by ordinance in the creation and appointment of agents charged with duties to be performed in its behalf as by a direct vote of the city council is settled. Jensen v. Waltham, 166 Mass. 344, 346, 44 N. E. 330; Butman v. Newton, supra. But, as we have said, the defendant was under no municipal duty to establish and maintain street lights, which were classified by its ordinance as a lamp department. It follows that the superintendent of this department, whether elected by the city council or appointed by the mayor, does not belong to that class of public officers, of which highway surveyors afford a familiar illustration, for whose official acts cities and towns are not held liable. For he is not charged with the performance of duties prescribed by any statute, where he would act independently, but he acts, if at all, under the ordinance as a municipal agent of the defendant. Walcott v. Swampscott, 1 Allen, 101; Hawks v. Charlemont, supra; Sullivan v. Holyoke, supra; Deane v. Randolph, 132 Mass. 475; Waldron v. Haverhill, supra; Butman v. Newton, supra. Being thus under the immediate direction and control of the city, it had full authority to direct the manner in which his department should be conducted. If the defendant lighted its streets as a matter of convenience and safety for those having occasion to use them at night, without being required by law to undertake the performance of such a duty, the superintendent of lamps for this purpose became its servant, for whose negligent-

FELIX J. CLOUTIER et al.

(.... Mass.)

Injury by fellow servant—absence of instructions.

Failure to warn a servant as to the danger of throwing an ice pick over a partition into a room where others are working without giving adequate notice, upon giving him a direction to do so, is not negligence on the part of the master which will render him liable for personal injuries caused by absence of such notice, since the servant had such knowledge, and the order must be interpreted as a direction to perform the service in a proper way.

(October 19, 1905.)

EXCEPTIONS by plaintiff to rulings of the Superior Court for Hampden County, made during the trial of an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries for which defendants were alleged to be responsible, which resulted in a verdict in their favor. Overruled.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. T. B. O'Donnell, for plaintiff:

The order to throw the pick was a negligent and reckless order.

Corrigan v. Union Sugar Refinery, 90 Mass. 577, 96 Am. Dec. 685; Hickey v. Merchants & M. Transp. Co. 152 Mass. 39, 24 N. E. 860.

A master is bound to use ordinary and reasonable care to prevent injury to a servant in the course of his employment.

20 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 54.

If the defendants failed to use due care they may be held responsible, although the negligence of a fellow servant with the plaintiff contributed to the accident.

Myers v. Hudson Iron Co. 150 Mass. 137, 15 Am. St. Rep. 176, 22 N. E. 631; Griffin v. Boston & A. R. Co. 148 Mass. 145, 1 L. R. A. 698, 12 Am. St. Rep. 526, 19 N. E. 166.

Defendants are responsible for giving negligent orders to a fellow servant which result in an injury to the plaintiff.

Elmer v. Locke, 135 Mass. 576; Atchison T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Vincent, 56 Kan. 344, 43 Pac. 251; Foster v. Missouri P. R. Co. 115 Mo. 165, 21 S. W. 916; Myhre v. Tromanhauser, 64 Minn. 541, 67 N. W. 660.

Messrs. Brooks & Hamilton, for defendants:

Plaintiff's injury resulted, not from any negligence of the defendants, but from the negligence of a fellow servant, in the execution of a proper order.

Gouin v. Wampanoag Mills, 172 Mass. 222, 51 N. E. 1078.

Lathrop, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action of tort at common law for personal injuries received by the plaintiff while in the employ of the defendants. At the trial in the superior court, at the close of the plaintiff's evidence, the judge

Case Note.—The Massachusetts cases cited in the opinion of the court to the effect that an order or direction to an employee to do a certain act is not to be interpreted as an order to do it without due regard to the safety of his fellow servants are in effect supported by the cases which hold that the failure of an employee, in performing the work which he is directed to do, to give a fellow servant warning when doing an act which may endanger him, is not attributable to the master. Besides various other instances in which this rule has been applied, it has been so held in respect to the failure to warn coservants that a blast is to be fired. Donovan v. Ferris, 128 Cal. 48, 79 Am. St. Rep. 25, 60 Pac. 519; Gallagher v. McMullin, 25 App. Div. 571, 49 N. Y. Supp. 734; Ward v. Naughton, 74 App. Div. 71, 77 N. Y. Supp. 344; contra, Belleville Stone Co. v. Mooney, 61 N. J. L. 253, 39 L. R. A. 834, 39 Atl. 764. Also as to the failure of a hatch tender to give warning that a bail is about to be thrown down. Ocean S. S. Co. v. Cheeney, 86 Ga. 278, 12 S. E. 351. And as to failure to warn that blocks are to be thrown down where workmen are engaged from a height. Donnelly v. San Francisco Bridge Co. 117 Cal. 417, 49 Pac. 559.

As to the effect of a specific order from a superintendent to a workman to "throw down cotton," in the execution of which another workman was injured, the court, in Gouin v. Wampanoag Mills, 172 Mass. 222, 51 N. E. 1078, says: "The order can only be interpreted as directing Pat to throw down cotton in a proper way, and in a proper place, and not as telling him to throw it down upon the plaintiff when he was standing underneath."

As declared by the Massachusetts court in Ciriack v. Merchants' Woolen Co. 151 Mass. 152, 6 L. R. A. 733, 21 Am. St. Rep. 438, 23 N. E. 829: "An employer is under no obligation to warn an employee of dangers which are obvious, nor to instruct him in matters which he may fairly be supposed thoroughly to understand."

This seems to be as pertinent and as sound when applied to the duty to tell a servant to warn his fellow servants as it is when applied to telling him of his own peril.

ruled that the action could not be maintained, and directed a verdict for the defendants. The case is before us on the plaintiff's exceptions.

The defendants were the proprietors of an ice business, and had an ice house, divided by partitions into compartments or rooms, each about 50 by 75 feet in extent. The partitions, according to the plaintiff's testimony, were about 27 feet in height, and extended to within 5 feet of the roof. At the time of the accident the plaintiff was working with others in room 2, and was injured by being struck in the foot by an ice pick, which was thrown over the partition from room 1 by a fellow servant named McFadden. The surface of the ice in both rooms was at the time within about 12 feet of the top of the partition, and there was a ladder to each opening in the building, which was used by the workmen as the surface of the ice was raised. McFadden testified that as he was going up the ladder leading to room 1, and when he was 5 feet from the ground, one of the defendants "told him to take the pick and throw it over in the other room;" that he "took the pick and got on top of the ice, and threw the pick, and called out to the men below to look out;" that "he hollered, 'Look out!' before he threw the pick over, and then he threw the pick." He was then asked: "How long after you hollered, 'Look out below!' that you threw the pick?" He answered: "When I threw the pick I hollered."

This evidence indicates very strongly that the warning and the act of throwing were separated by only a slight interval of time, if they were not simultaneous. This, too, is shown by the testimony of the plaintiff, who testified through an interpreter. He was asked, "How long was it after you heard somebody call out to look out was it before you got hurt?" The answer was, "He only had time to get his head up." The plaintiff had previously testified that at the time he was hurt he had just put a cake of ice in its place; that he was stooping down, and, as he straightened up, the pick fell on his foot. There can be no doubt that the evidence shows an act of negligence on the part of McFadden in not ascertaining where the men were who were working in the room, and in throwing the pick over immediately after once shouting, "Look out!" But, as McFadden was a fellow servant of the plaintiff, the defendants cannot be held liable for McFadden's act. It is sought, therefore, to hold the defendants on the ground that the order given was an act of negligence, and that McFadden should have been warned of the danger of throwing the pick over without giving adequate notice. But this McFadden knew as well as anyone. The order can be interpreted only as an order to throw over the pick in a proper way and in a proper place, and not as telling him to throw it over, regardless of the safety of those in the other room. This view of the meaning of the order was taken in a somewhat similar case. Gouin v. Wampanoag Mills, 172 Mass. 222, 51 N. E. 1078. See, also, Gorman v. Woodbury, 173 Mass. 180, 53 N. E. 373.

ILLINOIS SUPREME COURT.

CHICAGO UNION TRACTION COMPANY,
Appt.,
v.

ADOLPH SAWUSCH.

(218 Ill. 130.)

1. Fellow servants—barn man and street-car conductor.

A barn man of a street car company, who is charged with the duty of substituting a perfect car for one which has become disabled during a run, represents the company so far as the selection of the car and its fittings is concerned, and is not a fellow servant of conductors on the road.

2. Injury to servant—assumption of risk.

A street-car conductor does not assume the risk of injury from the failure of a barn man, charged with the duty of substituting a perfect car for one which has be-

Case Note.—Negligence of a servant whose duty it is to send out safe cars for use by other servants has been considered in many cases, though the above case is one of but few that have raised the question with respect to a street car. There is no obvious difference, however, between such duty in case of street cars and the case of cars used on ordinary railroads. Though the question as to what constitutes a proper car for street-railway use may be different from that relating to a car on an ordinary railroad, the duty manifestly must be, in either case, to furnish a car that is proper and suitable for the use to be made of it.

Liability of the master for negligence of servants in sending out cars which are defective, in consequence of which other servants are injured, has been sustained in a goodly number of cases, among which are Griffin v. Boston & A. R. Co. 148 Mass. 143, 1 L. R. A. 698, 12 Am. St. Rep. 526, 19 N. E. 166; Goodrich v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 116 N. Y. 398, 5 L. R. A. 750, 15 Am. St. Rep. 410, 22 N. E. 397; Troxler v. Southern R. Co. 124 N. C. 189, 44 L. R. A. 313, 70 Am. St. Rep. 580, 32 S. E. 550; Pennsylvania R. Co. v. LaRue, 27 C. C. A. 363, 65 U. S. App. 20, 81 Fed. 148. Similarly, it has been repeatedly held—and this is almost the same in effect as the doctrine just stated—that employees whose duty it is to inspect cars are come disabled, to furnish a controller handle which fits the motor, so that the car is partially uncontrollable.

3. Same—imperfect appliances.

Negligence of a street car company in delivering to a crew a car without any, or with a defective, controller handle, will render it liable for injuries thereby caused to an employee on the road.

4. Same—concurrent negligence of master and fellow servant.

A master is not absolved from liability for injury to an employee which would not have occurred without his negligence, by the fact that the negligence of a fellow servant of the injured person contributed to the accident.

(October 24, 1905.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Appellate Court, First District, affirming a judgment of the Superior Court for Cook County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. W. W. Gurley, with Messrs. John A. Rose and Albert M. Cross, for appellant.

Messrs. Pinckney, Tatge, & Abbott and Thomas A. Leach, for appellee:

The rule of nonliability on the part of the master for the negligence of a fellow servant has no application in this case, where the negligence in question was the master's neglect of duty to provide a proper reverse lever or power handle.

Boggs, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In an action on the case by the appellee against the appellant company, judgment was entered in the superior court of Cook county in favor of the appellee in the sum of $12,000, which, on appeal, was affirmed by the appellate court for the first district in the sum of $10,000, a remittitur of $2,000 having been entered; and a further appeal has brought the record into this court. Two grounds for reversal are urged: First, that the trial court erred in refusing to direct a peremptory verdict, as requested by the appellant company; and, second, that the court erred in refusing to give instruction No. 1 asked by the appellant company.

The contention of the appellant company as to the facts proved by the testimony is stated by its counsel as follows: "The not fellow servants of the trainmen or other employees exposed to danger from defects in the cars. Among the numerous cases on this point are Union P. R. Co. v. Daniels (Union P. R. Co. v. Snyder) 152 U. S. 684, 38 L. ed. 597, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 756; Eaton v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 163, N. Y. 391, 79 Am. St. Rep. 600, 57 N. E. 609; Coontz v. Missouri P. R. Co. 121 Mo. 652, 26 S. W. 661; International & G. N. R. Co. v. Kernan, 78 Tex. 294, 9 L. R. A. 703, 22 Am. St. Rep. 52, 14 S. W. 668; Tierney v. Minneapolis & St. L. R. Co. 33 Minn. 311, 53 Am. Rep. 35, 23 N. W. 229; Mixer v. Imperial Coal Co. 152 Pa. 395, 25 Atl. 587.

Application of the same rule in respect to furnishing defective street cars has been made in some cases prior to that of CHICAGO UNION TRACTION CO. v. SAWUSCH.

In McNamara v. Brooklyn City R. Co. 11 Misc. 667, 32 N. Y. Supp. 913, where a conductor on a trolley car was injured because of alleged defects in the car brakes, which 1 L.R.A.(N.S.)

caused a collision, the court said that the duty of the company "unquestionably was to furnish adequate brakes for its cars, and to keep them in proper order; and it cannot discharge itself from the consequences of a failure to perform that duty by directing its servants or agents to do it, and then, when the duty is left unperformed, shield itself from liability on the ground that the injuries complained of were due to the negligence of a fellow servant."

In Leigh v. Omaha Street R. Co. 36 Neb. 131, 54 N. W. 134, where the driver of a horse car was kicked by one of the animals drawing the car, which the owner knew was likely to kick on being struck, the court said: "It is the duty of such driver to stand on the front platform, close to the horses. In effect, a defective, and under some circumstances dangerous, appliance in the propelling power of the car was used. The fact that it was an animal instead of a steam engine can make no difference."

evidence in this case is practically harmonious, and shows the following undisputed facts: The accident occurred July 3, 1901, about 11 o'clock at night, on Van Buren street between State street and Plymouth place. The defendant has double street car track in that part of Van Buren street, together with a switch track connecting the two main tracks. There are two lines of cars running on that street,—the Van Buren street cars, which run east and west on Van Buren street from State street to Kedzie avenue, and the Twelfth street cars, which run east and west on Van Buren street from State street to Fifth avenue and then turn off into another street. Both these lines are operated by means of an overhead trolley. At the time of the accident the plaintiff was a conductor running on the Van Buren street line, and had been running on that line for about five years. The cars are trolley cars, capable of running in either direction and with a fender at each end, the fender at the rear of the car being usually fastened up and the one in the front of the car extended while the car is running. Of course, when the car changes from one direction to the other it is necessary to put down one fender and raise the other. At the time of the accident the plaintiff's car, which was east-bound, had nearly reached the terminus of its run, and was about to switch over into the other track on its return trip. It was standing still at the time, on the east end of the southerly track, the motorman being still at the east end of the car. The plaintiff reversed the seats in the car preparatory to the return trip, and then got off and went to the rear of the car in order to let down the fender at that end, which had been fastened up while the car was going east. This, he says, was his duty. When he reached that point he found that a Twelfth street car, which had also just come in from the west, was so close to his car that he could not lower the fender. He therefore asked the motorman of the Twelfth street car, with whom he was acquainted, having met him at that point nearly every evening, to move his car back. The motorman promised to do this, but in attempting to turn the handle so as to reverse the power he unintentionally made the car go forward instead of backward, with the result that the plaintiff's leg was caught between the two cars.

"The cause of the unexpected motion of the Twelfth street car was this: On the defendant's lines there are in use trolley cars having two different sizes of motors, and these different motors have different kinds of handles. These handles are removable, and whenever the cars are in the barns the handles are taken off and put in a place by themselves, ready to be used again when occasion requires. The motor on the Twelfth street car in question was a small motor, and the handle which the motorman was using was one adapted to the large motor. With such a handle it was possible apparently to make the car go forward and also to stop it, but if the attempt was made to reverse the car the handle was liable to slip, so as to cause the car to go forward instead of backward: and that is what happened on this occasion. The cause of the motorman's having the wrong handle on this occasion is thus explained: He had been running another car that day, but something went wrong with his car and his conductor telephoned to the car barns for another car. The other car was sent out to him in charge of a man employed in the barns, and when the two cars met at a point about a mile from the barns, the barn man took the disabled car on to the barns and the motorman proceeded on his way back with the new car. The car which he had been operating had a large motor while the car in which he now found himself had a small motor, and it is clear that in transferring from the one car to the other he carried his motor handle with him, instead of leaving it in the car and taking the motor handle which had been used in the other car. This matter is sworn to directly by one witness, the conductor on this car in question, who said they 'changed the handle,' and it clearly appears by necessary inference from the evidence in the record. Thus Anderson, the barn man, swore that when he took the car in question out of the barns that night he had a motor handle that fitted the motor in that car. He turned that car over to this motorman, and yet it clearly appears that at the time of the accident the motorman on the Twelfth street car had a handle which did not fit the motor on his car. The only possible explanation of this phenomenon is that, in the hurry of changing cars, the motorman kept and transferred the motor handle which he had been before using, instead of leaving the motor handle on the car which it fitted. Both Anderson (the barn man) and Hunt (the motorman) say that they do not remember whether they changed handles at the time when they changed cars or not. The motorman did not discover that he had the wrong handle until the accident happened. The motor itself, the handles, car, and other apparatus were all right, in good repair."

The contention that Hunt, the motorman, and the appellee were fellow servants may be conceded. Anderson, the barn man, was clearly not a fellow servant of the appellee. He had no duty to perform which had any connection with the duties of the appellee. The car which the motorman, Hunt, had been operating proved to be out of repair, and, in order to enable Hunt to perform the work of the master, the latter undertook to send him another car. Anderson, the barn man, was chosen by the master to select the car to be sent to Hunt and to take it out on the line of the road and there deliver it to Hunt. Anderson was therefore, while engaged for the master in supplying to Hunt a car, performing a duty which devolved on the master to perform. It was the duty of the appellant company to furnish the cars to be operated by its servants. The law charged upon it the positive obligation to furnish reasonably safe cars and with no necessary part omitted therefrom, and holds it responsible for any failure to discharge that obligation, and makes it liable for the failure of any servant it may employ to discharge that obligation. Any servant so employed is engaged in the performance of a duty or obligation of the appellant company, and is acting as the representative and agent of the appellant company, and for any want of proper caution on the part of any such agent or representative the appellant company is liable as for its own personal negligence. The neglect to properly perform that duty by such a representative or agent of the master is not a peril which other servants of the master assume. Chicago & A. R. Co. v. Maroney, 170 Ill. 520, 62 Am. St. Rep. 306, 48 N. E. 953.

We think it clearly deducible from the proof, either that Anderson, the barn man and the representative of the appellant company, delivered to Hunt the car which he (Anderson) brought from the barn with the improper handle thereon which was on that car when appellee was injured, or that Anderson delivered that car to Hunt without any handle on it. Anderson returned the defective car to the barn, and Hunt ran the car which came to him from the barn on his trip on appellant's tracks on the street, and both of the cars must have had motor handles after the change was made. If the handle remained on each car when the cars were changed, then Anderson, the representative of the appellant company, delivered to Hunt a car supplied with an improper handle, and this negligence was that of the appellant company, and was the cause of the injury to the appellee. If, when the cars were changed, each motorman carried with him the handle from the car he was operating, then Anderson delivered to Hunt a car without any handle, which was a negligent act on the part of the appellant company and the proximate cause of the injury to appellee. We think it very clear that each motorman, when the cars were changed, carried away with him the handle he was using, and hence that each man got a car without a handle. If Hunt carried the handle which was on the defective car to the car which Anderson delivered to him and Anderson had not taken the handle therefrom, Hunt would have had two handles and the car which he delivered to Anderson would have been without any handle, and Anderson could not have run it back to the barn, as he did. Anderson, however, ran that car which he got from Hunt, back to the car barn, and it follows either that Hunt did not carry the handle from that car and Anderson used the handle he found upon it, or that Anderson carried the handle from the car he had brought from the barn and used that handle, and consequently delivered the other car to Hunt unprovided with any handle.

These conclusions do not result from mere conjecture or speculation as to what may have occurred, but are logically and reasonably to be deduced from the existence of facts that are established by the proofs. It may be that it is fairly to be deduced, also, from the evidence that Hunt, the motorman, if he had exercised due care, would have discovered that the car which was delivered to him by Anderson, the barn man, was operated by a different and smaller motor requiring a different and smaller handle than the car he had been operating, and the injury received by the appellee may have been, in part, chargeable to this lack of due care on the part of Hunt, a fellow servant. But if the negligence of Anderson, who was the representative of the appellant company and whose negligence was its negligence, contributed to the injury, and the injury would not have occurred but for the lack of care of Anderson, the appellant company would be liable. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. v. Gillison, 173 Ill. 264, 64 Am. St. Rep. 117, 50 N. E. 657; Armour v. Golkowska, 202 Ill. 144, 66 N. E. 1037. The trial court did not, therefore, err in refusing to direct a verdict as a matter of law.

By instruction No. 1, asked by the appellant company and refused, the court was requested to direct the jury that the motorman, Hunt, and the appellee, were fellow servants, and that the appellee could not recover under the first count of the declaration, even if the jury should believe that Hunt was guilty of negligence in the manner in which he operated the car at the time and place when and where the appellee was injured. The first count in the declaration charged the "defendant, by its said servants, so carelessly, negligently, and improperly drove and managed the said motor or trolley car, that by and through such carelessness, negligence, and improper driving of said motor or trolley car said car then and there ran and struck with great force and violence upon and against the plaintiff." No instructions were asked in behalf of the appellee. Twenty-four instructions were asked in behalf of the appellant company. In these instructions the relation of fellow servants, what constituted the relation, and when it existed, were fully made known to the jury in language selected by counsel for the appellant company, and the question whether that relation existed between the motorman, Hunt, and the appellee, was fully and fairly submitted to the jury, to be determined from the testimony under concededly correct instructions of the court; and the jury were expressly instructed in instruction No. 5, that if they believed, from the evidence, "under the instructions of the court, that the plaintiff and the servant or servants in control of and operating such car, at the time, and place in question, were fellow servants as defined in these instructions, then the plaintiff cannot recover under the first count of his declaration." This instruction, under the conceded facts of the case, secured to the appellant company all benefit that could have resulted from instruction No. 1 had it been given.

The verdict is entirely consistent with the view that the jury concluded that Hunt and the appellee were fellow servants, and followed the direction of the court given in instruction No. 5, but found, from the evidence, that the appellant company furnished to such fellow servant an improper, unsafe, and defective motor or trolley car, and that the injury was occasioned by such failure of the appellant company to discharge its duty as master, as charged in the second count of the declaration.

We think there is no error in the record reversible in character.

The judgment is affirmed.

ILLINOIS SUPREME COURT.

CHICAGO, ROCK ISLAND, & PACIFIC RAILWAY COMPANY, Appt.,

v.

ANDERSON HAMLER.

(215 Ill. 525.)

1. Sleeping-car porter—contract releasing claim for negligent injuries.

A contract by one employed as porter on a sleeping car to release railroad companies, which may haul such car, from liability for injuries which may result to him from their negligence, is valid.

2. Same—consideration.

Continued employment as a porter on a sleeping car is a sufficient consideration for the signing of a release of liability for personal injuries caused through the negligence of the railroad company hauling the car.

3. Same—not servant of railroad company.

A porter hired, paid, and subject to the orders of a sleeping car company is not the servant of the railroad company which hauls the car in which he works, within the rule that a contract between master and servant for release of liability for negligent injuries is void.

4. Same—absence of contract between railroad and car company.

That no express contract between a railroad and sleeping car company is shown, does not prevent the railroad company from taking the benefit of a provision in a contract between the sleeping car company and its employees releasing railroad companies over whose tracks the cars are drawn from liability for negligent injuries to such employees.

5. Negligence—degrees—release from liability for.

No distinction between the degrees of negligence of which a railroad company is guilty can be founded on speculation, so as to avoid the effect of a contract releasing it from liability for negligent injuries in case the negligence is found to be gross.

6. Gross negligence—release from liability for.

Injuries caused by gross negligence are included in a release, by a sleeping-car porter, of the railroad company hauling the car on which he is employed, from liability for negligent injury to him.

Case Note.—The trend of the courts away from the old distinction between degrees of negligence clearly appears from the opinion of the court in CHICAGO, R. I. & P. R. CO. v. HAMLER. As to the attempt to maintain such a distinction, notwithstanding the general rule, when the question arises as to the effect of a contract stipulation for liability, the decision follows also the trend of other authorities.

In addition to the cases cited in the opinion of the court on this point, particularly those of Kelly v. Malott, 67 C. C. A. 548, 135 Fed. 74, and the leading case of New York C. R. Co. v. Lockwood, 17 Wall. 357, 21 L. ed. 62, it has been generally held in similar cases where a contract stipulated against liability, whether it expressly included negligence, or was in general terms which the court held to cover negligence, that the stipulation extended to gross negligence.

In the language of Quain, J., in McCawley v. Furness R. Co. L. R. 6 Q. B. 57, which was a case of stipulation in a drover's pass that he should travel at his own risk, it was held that "negligence, even gross, is the very thing which the contract stipulates that the defendants shall not be liable for."

The language of the Lockwood Case, denying the distinction between degrees of negligence, is cited with approval in Trenton Pass. R. Co. v. Guarantors' Liability Indemnity Co. 60 N. J. L. 246, 44 L. R. A. 213, 37 Atl. 609, in upholding the validity of the policy of insurance of a common carrier against liability for losses occasioned by its negligence.

In Perkins v. New York C. R. Co. 24 N. Y. 207, 82 Am. Dec. 289, and Wells v. New York C. R. Co. 24 N. Y. 181, an exemption of a carrier, in a pass, was held to include negligence, even if it were culpable and gross.

The same was held in Griswold v. New York & N. E. R. Co. 53 Conn. 371, 55 Am. Rep. 115, 4 Atl. 261.

An apparent exception is found in Meuer v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 5 S. D. 575, 25 L. R. A. 81, 49 Am. St. Rep. 901, 59 N. W. 947, but this decision was rendered under a provision of the Code of the state which excepts "gross negligence," as well as fraud or wilful wrong, from the stipulations that a common carrier may make to exempt itself from liability. Under that statute, it was necessarily held that such a stipulation, as affecting negligence, could not extend to gross negligence.

Also, in the case of Hart v. Western U. Tele. Co. 66 Cal. 579, 50 Am. Rep. 119, 6 Pac. 645, the court, in reversing a judgment against the telegraph company, said that, as the message was unreported, and there was a stipulation that no recovery for mistake or failure to deliver such a message should be had beyond the amount received for sending it, the recovery must be thus limited, unless the plaintiff proved wilful misconduct or gross negligence of the defendant. The statutes of the state, however, provided that such company must use "great care and diligence;" and one of the judges, who dissented on the ground that the alleged error of the instructions in assuming the fact of gross negligence was not prejudicial, said: "Construed as an ordinary phrase, the term 'gross negligence,' as used by the court in its instructions to the jury, may, therefore, be considered as the equivalent of that want of great care and diligence exacted by the Code."

A good proportion of the cases most often cited as authorities for a conclusion contrary to that of the court in the above reported Illinois case are earlier cases from the same state, which have been overruled by the change of doctrine in Illinois, by which the theory of comparative negligence, and the classification of negligence into degrees, have been abolished in that state.

Wabash R. Co. v. Brown, supra; Chicago & E. I. R. Co. v. Schmitz, 211 Ill. 446, 71 N. E. 1050.

Cartwright, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

On January 18, 1902, Anderson Hamler, the appellee, was a porter in the employ of the Pullman company in a sleeping car attached to a passenger train of appellant running in a westerly direction in the state of Iowa. As the train passed through a station called Victor the engine exploded. The engineer and fireman were killed, and the Pullman sleeping car in which appellee was at work was thrown on its side, and he was injured. He brought this suit in the circuit court of Cook county to recover damages for his injuries, and alleged in each count of his declaration that he was employed by the Pullman company as a porter; that his duties were the care of the sleeping car, the making up and taking down of berths therein, and providing for the necessities and comforts of passengers; and that he was, with all due care and diligence, performing his duties as such porter when the car was thrown from the track. In the first count he charged negligent, careless, and wrongful management and operation of the boiler which exploded and threw the car from the track; in the second count he alleged that the engine was negligently, carelessly, and wrongfully equipped with a defective boiler; and the third count contained a general charge of the negligent operation of the train, causing the car to be thrown from the track. There was a plea of the general issue, and upon a trial there was a verdict of guilty, and damages were assessed at $15,000. On a motion for a new trial plaintiff remitted $7,500, and judgment was entered for $7,500. Appellant appealed from the judgment to the appellate court for the first district, where the cause was assigned to the branch of that court. One of the judges of the branch court presided at the trial in the circuit court, and took no part in the consideration of the appeal, and, the other judges disagreeing, the judgment was affirmed by operation of law. One of the judges was disqualified, and the judgment became final as to controverted questions of fact by operation of law, and not by consideration and judgment of the court.

On the trial the defendant offered in evidence a contract of employment with the Pullman company, dated January 2, 1902, signed by the plaintiff, the execution of which was admitted by him, and which fixed the terms and conditions upon which he accepted the employment and entered into the service of said company. Among other things, the contract recited that plaintiff was aware that the Pullman company secured the operation of its cars upon lines of railroad by means of contracts wherein said company agreed to indemnify the corporations or persons owning or controlling such lines of railroad against liability on their part to the employees of said Pullman company, and he thereby released the corporations or persons over whose lines of railroad the cars of said Pullman company might be operated from all claims for liability on account of any personal injury to him while traveling over such lines in said employment or service. This contract was the basis of the defense to the suit, and the defendant tendered to the court an instruction to be given to the jury that the defendant was not a common carrier of the sleeping cars of the Pullman company; that it could not be compelled to haul such sleeping cars, but might or might not haul the same, as it desired; that, if it undertook to haul such cars in its trains, it might do so, and in so doing might make such contract or demand such conditions as would protect it from liability for injury to the porter or other employees of the Pullman company on the said cars through negligence; and that, if the plaintiff voluntarily entered into the agreement releasing the railroad company from all liability for any injury he might receive while acting as a Pullman porter, he could not recover, and the verdict should be that the defendant was not guilty. The court refused to give the instruction.

The principle involved and the rights of the parties under such a contract as this was considered and decided in Blank v. Illinois C. R. Co. 182 Ill. 332, 55 N. E. 332, which was an action brought by an employee of the American Express Company for personal injuries received while engaged in the service of that company in an express car. The defense was a contract made by the plaintiff with the express company to obtain employment, by which he released from any liability to him any corporation operating any railroad over which the express cars should run. It was decided that such a contract is valid, and not void as against public policy, and that the direction of the court to find the defendant not guilty was justified by the contract, which was a complete defense. There is no difference whatever, in principle, between the case of a porter on a car of the Pullman company and a messenger in an express car. It is no part of the contract or obligation of a common carrier of passengers to furnish berths, or the services of a porter to make up beds or perform other services for passengers. The passenger pays the Pullman company for the services performed by it, and not the railroad company; and, if one desires such services as are rendered by the Pullman company and its porter, he must contract with that company for them. In its business as a common carrier of passengers a railroad company is bound to carry all who apply, and to treat all alike, and its duties and obligations to them are imposed by law. The obligations of a common carrier arise from the public nature of the employment, and, being imposed by law, it would be against public policy to allow the obligations so imposed to be changed by a contract exempting the carrier from the consequences of negligence in the employment. A railroad company, in its business as a common carrier, undertakes to use the care and diligence required by law in the transportation of passengers, and will not be permitted to absolve itself from its duties by a stipulation in the contract of carriage by which a passenger is to take the risk of its negligence; but, if the service is one that is not imposed upon it as a duty, it may undertake it upon such terms as it may see fit. There can be no doubt that the defendant is not bound to haul sleeping cars tendered to it by the Pullman company, with its conductors, porters, or other employees. The defendant is a common carrier of passengers, and as to them it assumes the duties and liabilities of a common carrier; but the Pullman company furnishes special facilities and services to passengers, and the defendant is not a common carrier of Pullman cars and employees performing duties therein. The defendant might undertake to receive and haul the cars of the Pullman company, but in doing so had a right to impose such terms as it might elect. This has been the opinion of the courts in all cases involving such contracts as the one here in question, which have been enforced in cases of express cars, circus trains, and Pullman cars, which the carrier was not bound to receive and haul as a common carrier. Bates v. Old Colony R. Co. 47 Mass. 255, 17 N. E. 633; Hosmer v. Old Colony R. Co. 156 Mass. 506, 31 N. E. 652; Louisville, N. A. & C. R. Co. v. Keefer, 146 Ind. 21, 38 L. R. A. 93, 58 Am. In the last two of these cases the validity of the contract with the Pullman company was involved. In the case of Blank v. Illinois C. R. Co. supra, appellant relied upon the decision of Judge Taft in Voight v. Baltimore & O. S. W. R. Co. 79 Fed. 561, but that decision was reversed by the Supreme Court of the United States in 176 U. S. 498, 44 L. ed. 560, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 385, where it was held that Voight could not avoid his agreement on the ground that it was against public policy. The court, affirming the doctrine that a common carrier of passengers cannot lawfully stipulate for exemption from responsibility for the negligence of himself or his servants, said: "At the same time it must not be forgotten that the right of private contract is no small part of the liberty of the citizen, and that the usual and most important function of courts of justice is rather to maintain and enforce contracts than to enable parties thereto to escape from their obligation on the pretext of public policy, unless it clearly appear that they contravene public right or the public welfare." Upon an extensive review of the authorities, it was decided that the contract was not against public policy, but was valid, and constituted a defense to the action.

It is urged, however, that the contract in this case was without consideration, and was therefore void. Upon the cross-examination of the plaintiff he was presented with the contract, and admitted that he signed it. It bore date at the time of his employment by the Pullman company, but after it was introduced in evidence by the defendant he was called in rebuttal, and testified that it was executed by him about seven months after he was employed by the Pullman company, and that he did not read it. It is on the ground that the contract was executed after the employment began that counsel urge it was without consideration. There was evidence that the contract was signed before employment was given to the plaintiff; but, whatever the fact may be, the employment was at certain daily wages, payable monthly, and for no particular time. The contract bore date at the commencement of the service, and recited on its face that it was entered into in consideration of the employment. If it was signed as he claimed, and the employment continued, it would be, in any event, effective as to any occurrence after its execution. It does not seem to be claimed that plaintiff was not bound by the contract because he did not choose to read it. He testified that he was able to read and write, and there was no evidence of fraud or misrepresentation, or that he was in any manner prevented from reading the contract. Under such circumstances the fact that he did not read it does not affect its validity.

It is contended that plaintiff was a servant of the defendant, and that the contract was also void as a contract between master and servant. The declaration averred that the plaintiff was in the employ of the Pullman company, and, as a question of fact, the uncontradicted evidence was that the Pullman company owned the car and had charge of its operation; that it employed the men who ran its cars, paid the porters; and that the defendant paid a compensation to the Pullman company for running the Pullman cars over its road. The master of a servant is one to whose order he is subject, and the plaintiff was not subject to the order of the defendant in any particular, and therefore was not its servant. Under this head it is also urged that no contract was proved between the defendant and the Pullman company. Plaintiff's contract recited that the Pullman company secured the operation of its cars on lines of railroad by means of contracts, and it released from liability any corporation over whose lines the cars should run. In Russell v. Pittsburgh, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. 157 Ind. 305, 55 L. R. A. 253, 87 Am. St. Rep. 214, 61 N. E. 678, in which a contract identical with this one was under consideration, the supreme court of Indiana held that the contract, referring generally to the transportation companies over whose lines the Pullman company should run its cars, comprehended the appellee in that case; that the contract was prima facie for its benefit, and 1 L.R.A. (N.S.) that it would be presumed to have accepted its provisions, and might claim rights under it as one in whose interest it was executed.

Finally, it is contended that a contract of this character only exempts from liability for ordinary negligence, and is no defense in an action for an injury caused by gross negligence. It is contended that, if the degree of negligence is high, and the negligence great, the agreement is of no effect; and the trial court adopted that view in giving instructions to the jury. In the first instruction the court defined gross negligence as the want of slight diligence and care, and in other instructions told the jury that, if the plaintiff was not guilty of negligence, and the defendant was guilty of gross negligence, they should find for the plaintiff, and that, if the contract in evidence was signed by the plaintiff, and he was not guilty of negligence, and the defendant was guilty of gross negligence causing the injury, the contract was not a good defense, and they should find for the plaintiff. The cause of the explosion was not definitely proved, but there was evidence that tended to show that the water was low in the boiler. The engineer and fireman were both killed, and it can never be known whether they were misled on account of the water gauge or other appliances not working properly. There was no evidence tending in the remotest degree to prove that there was any wilful or intentional failure on the part of either of them to perform any duty respecting the boiler or the management of it. Their own safety was involved, and there can be no presumption that they lost their lives through a wilful or intentional disregard of duty.

We are of the opinion that no distinction as to the rights of the parties can be founded upon speculation as to different degrees of mere negligence, and that the trial court erred in instructing the jury to find for the plaintiff if they concluded that the defendant was guilty of gross negligence. Formerly this court, in expounding the doctrine of comparative negligence, classified negligence into three degrees, as slight, ordinary, and gross; but that doctrine was long ago abolished, and, while negligence may since that time have been alluded to in opinions as gross or slight, no weight has been given to the question, and no liability has been based on any distinction in degrees unless the negligence was wilful or intentional, where it assumes an entirely different character from that of negligence in its ordinary meaning. In negligence, merely, there is no intention to do a wrongful act or omit the performance of a duty. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Johnson, 103 Ill. 512. Even when gross it is but the omission of a duty. Jacksonville S. E. R. Co. v. Southworth, 135 Ill. 250, 25 N. E. 1093. The many refinements concerning the degrees of such omissions of duty grew out of the application of the rule of comparative negligence, and were devalued of all importance by the decision that to justify a recovery the person injured must be in the exercise of ordinary care, and the injury must have resulted from a want of ordinary care on the part of the defendant. Calumet Iron & Steel Co. v. Martin, 115 Ill. 358, 3 N. E. 456. The rule since that time has been that, if a plaintiff has exercised ordinary care, and the defendant has failed to exercise due care,—i. e., the care demanded under the circumstances,—the rights of the parties are thereby fixed and determined, and there is an end of controversy. If those conditions exist, there is actionable or culpable negligence, which will justify a recovery of damages resulting therefrom; and it makes no difference in the liability or the damages by what name the negligence is designated. Where an injury results from a failure to exercise ordinary care, and not from a wilful or intentional failure to perform a duty, the question of degree is of no importance. Speculations on that subject lead to no practical result, as shown by the various cases, among which is Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. v. Hessions, 150 Ill. 546, 37 N. E. 905, where it was said that slight negligence is not necessarily incompatible with due and ordinary care; and, inasmuch as there is no negligence unless there is a failure to exercise due care, which is the care required by law under the circumstances of a case, the remark was equivalent to holding that slight negligence was not negligence at all.

Where the doctrine of comparative negligence is not applied, the authorities make no distinction in rights, duties, or liabilities based on degrees of negligence. Judge Cooley, in his work on Torts, p. 630, says: "Some writers classify negligence as gross negligence, ordinary negligence, and slight negligence. But this classification only indicates this: that under the special circumstances great care and caution were required, or only ordinary care, or only slight care. If the care demanded was not exercised, the case is one of negligence, and a legal liability is made out when the failure is shown." Judge Thompson classifies negligence as of two kinds,—negligence, which consists of carelessness and inattention; and wilful negligence, consisting of wilful and intentional failure or neglect to perform a duty; and he repudiates any further classification. He says (1 Thompson on Negligence, § 18): "Lord Holt, Ch. J., in a celebrated case divided negligence into three degrees,—slight, ordinary, and gross. In this he is supposed to have made an attempt to follow the Roman law; but later investigators have pointed out that culpa levissima, or slight negligence, was unknown to the Roman law, but was one of the refinements of the Middle Ages. I confess myself careless, ignorant, and indifferent upon this whole subject of the degrees of negligence. It is plain that such refinements can have no useful place in the practical administration of justice. Negligence cannot be divided into three compartments by mathematical lines. Ordinary jurors, before whom, except in cases in admiralty, actions grounded on negligence are always tried, are quite incapable of understanding such refinements. . . . No effort can extract from the current American decisions the conclusion that there are three degrees of culpable negligence,—slight, ordinary, and gross. On the one hand, it has been held that slight negligence may be compatible with ordinary care, and therefore not actionable at all. On the other hand, it has been laid down that there is no distinction between gross negligence and the want of ordinary care. . . .

If the care demanded is not exercised, the case is one of negligence, and a legal liability is made out when the failure is shown." The author of the chapter on Negligence in the American and English Encyclopedia of Law, 2d ed., vol. 21, p. 459, says: "While not infrequent references are still found in judicial discussions of the subject to the classification of negligence into degrees, the tendency of modern authority and the weight of the best-considered cases are now opposed to this view, holding that in every case negligence, however described, is merely a failure to bestow the care and skill which the situation demands; and hence it is more accurate to call it simply negligence. Some decisions even go further, and declare that the classification of negligence into degrees is a matter of pure speculation, and of no practical consequence; that it is useless, and tends to confusion; and that in fact it is unsafe to base any legal decision on distinctions in the degrees of negligence." One of the reasons given by the courts for disregarding supposed distinctions in degrees of negligence is the inability to give the terms "slight," "ordinary," and "gross" any definite meaning, and the impracticability of applying any rule based on the supposed distinction. It is clear that negligence cannot be divided into slight, ordinary, and gross by definite lines, so that a jury may understand the limits of each, and assign each case to its own department. In Hinton v. Dibbin, 2 Q. B. 847, Lord Denman said: "Again, when we find 'gross negligence' made the criterion to determine the liability of a carrier who has given the usual notice, it might, perhaps, have been reasonably expected that something like a definite meaning should have been given to the expression. It is believed, however, that in none of the numerous cases upon this subject is any such attempt made, and it may well be doubted whether between gross negligence and negligence merely any intelligible distinction exists."

In The New World v. King, 16 How. 469, 14 L. ed. 1019, it was said: "The theory that there are three degrees of negligence described by the terms 'slight,' 'ordinary,' and 'gross' has been introduced into the common law from some of the commentators on the Roman law. It may be doubted if these terms can be usefully applied in practice. Their meaning is not fixed or capable of being so. . . . Recently the judges of several courts have expressed their disapprobation of these attempts to fix the degrees of diligence by legal definitions, and have complained of the impracticability of applying them. . . . It may be added that some of the ablest commentators on the Roman law and on the Civil Code of France have wholly repudiated this theory of three degrees of diligence as unfounded in principles of natural justice, useless in practice, and presenting inextricable embarrassments and difficulties."

In Perkins v. New York C. R. Co., 24 N. Y. 196, 82 Am. Dec. 281, the court of appeals said: "The difficulty of defining gross negligence, and the intrinsic uncertainty pertaining to the question as one of law, and the utter impracticability of establishing any precise rule on the subject, renders it unsafe to base any legal decision on distinctions of the degrees of negligence. Certainly, before cases are made to turn, by the verdicts of juries, upon any such distinction, the judges should be able to define with some precision what they mean by gross negligence, slight negligence, and ordinary negligence. It will be seen, on examining the many cases reported where the question has arisen, that this has been found utterly impracticable by the judges when called upon to instruct juries on the question, and also when called on to declare the law more carefully in bank. . . . What is negligent in a given case may easily be affirmed by a jury, but in what degree the negligence consists in any scale of classification of degrees of negligence is not so easily determined, will ordinarily be a matter of pure speculation, and of no practical consequence."

In Wilson v. Brett, 11 Mees. & W. 113, it was held that there is no legal difference between negligence and gross negligence; that it is the same thing, with the addition of a vituperative epithet; and that the question in any case is whether there was culpable negligence.

L. R. 1 C. P. 600, it was complained that the lord chief justice misdirected the jury because he made no distinction between gross and ordinary negligence. In deciding the case Willes, J., said: "I quite agree with the dictum of Lord Cranworth in Wilson v. Brett that gross negligence is ordinary negligence with a vituperative epithet,—a view held by the exchequer chamber. Beal v. South Devon R. Co. 3 Hurlst. & C. 337. Confusion has arisen from regarding negligence as a positive, instead of a negative, word. It is really the absence of such care as it was the duty of the defendant to use."

In the case of Beal v. South Devon R. Co. supra, above referred to, the failure to exercise reasonable care, skill, and diligence was called gross negligence, although it would be called ordinary negligence under most definitions where there is any division into degrees.

It will be found that the words "slight," "ordinary," and "gross," as applied to negligence, are not used in the decisions with the same meaning, or any definite and well-understood meaning. Illustrations are numerous, but a few will suffice for the present purpose. The words "gross negligence" are often used as the antithesis of "slight care;" but in many relations the law only requires the exercise of slight care, and the failure to exercise it cannot be different in degree from the failure to exercise a very high degree of care where it is demanded by the law. The absurdity of such a standard for determining supposed degrees of negligence is manifest. It has been noted that slight negligence is not regarded as inconsistent with due care, and, if due care is exercised, there is no actionable negligence, and therefore, in a legal sense, no negligence at all. In Bloor v. Lafield, 69 Wis. 273, 34 N. W. 115, it was held that a slight want of ordinary care on the part of the plaintiff, contributing proximately to cause the injury, would defeat his action, while only slight negligence on his part contributing thereto would not. The supreme court of Wisconsin also holds that no mere degree of carelessness or inattention constitutes gross negligence (Decker v. McSorley, 116 Wis. 643, 93 N. W. 808), and that the term "gross negligence" signifies wilfulness, involving intent, actual or constructive, to cause injury; and if one is guilty of wilful misconduct causing injury to another the former's fault is denominated gross negligence. Rideout v. Winnebago Traction Co. 123 Wis. 297, 69 L. R. A. 601, 101 N. W. 672. In Kansas City, M. & B. R. Co. v. Crocker, 95 Ala. 412, 11 So. 262, the court drew a distinction between negligence charged to be reckless and a wilful and wanton injury; and in Stringer v. Alabama Mineral R. Co. 99 Ala. 397, 13 So. 75, it was said: "The words 'gross,' 'reckless,' when applied to 'negligence' per se, have no legal significance which import other than simple negligence or a want of due care." The court recognized but two grades of negligence,—one being simple negligence, or the want of due care, and the other such reckless or wanton disregard of probable consequences as to be equivalent to an intentional injury; and expressed doubt whether the latter could be strictly and technically called negligence,—certainly a well-founded doubt. In McAdoo v. Richmond & D. R. Co., 105 N. C. 140, 11 S. E. 316, it was held that in torts there is no degree of negligence which can be described by the word "gross" alone. In Milwaukee & St. P. R. Co. v. Arms, 91 U. S. 489, 23 L. ed. 374, the court, after citing and quoting from the English decisions holding that there is no intelligible distinction between ordinary and gross negligence, said: "'Gross negligence' is a relative term. It is doubtless to be understood as meaning a greater want of care than is implied by the term 'ordinary negligence,' but after all it means the absence of the care that was necessary under the circumstances." In Smith v. New York C. R. Co. 24 N. Y. 222, it was said: "Attempts have been made to fix a liability upon the distinction between gross negligence and negligence merely; but courts have been compelled to abandon the attempt, and to say that negligence does not change its character and become anything but negligence by the application of any epithet to it."

The United States circuit court of appeals for the seventh circuit considered the same question involved in this case in Kelly v. Malott, 67 C. C. A. 548, 135 Fed. 74. The suit was for damages on account of the death of a messenger of the Adams Express Company, and the declaration charged that he was killed in a collision that occurred through the gross negligence of the defendant. A contract similar to the one in this case was pleaded, and the question was whether the injection of the word "gross" in the declaration made out a case despite the plea. The court said: "It seems to us that the whole attempt to classify negligence has resulted from a misapprehension. 'Negligence' is merely a word of denial. 'Care' is the positive word. It is familiar and sound doctrine that there are degrees of care. But 'care' cannot properly be divided into abstract and absolute classes. The quantum of care required in a particular case is determined from the relations of the parties and the facts of the situation, and is proportionate to the danger reasonably to be apprehended. Whatever the required degree of care, the failure to measure up to it is the ground of complaint. But failure is failure. The cause of action flows from the failure to exercise the full degree of care that was due. The injuries are what they are. The innocent sufferer is entitled to full compensation on account of the defendant's failure to bestow the fullness of care demanded by the situation. He is to receive no more, no less, than full compensation, because, though the defendant's lack may be a variable, any lack supplies a cause of action; and his injuries, which measure the value of the cause of action, are a constant. The division of negligence into slight, ordinary, and gross may have originated in an endeavor, unconscious perhaps, to justify exemplary damages where only compensatory should be allowed. One who unintentionally fails in his duty, and thereby causes an injury, should make complete compensation. But to warrant punishment there must be an actual or constructive intent to inflict the injury. Negligence and wilfulness are as unmixable as oil and water. 'Wilful negligence' is as self-contradictory as 'guilty innocence.' The substantive remains the same substantive, whatever the adjective. In New York C. R. Co. v. Lockwood, 17 Wall. 357, 21 L. ed. 627, the Supreme Court said: "In each case the negligence, whatever epithet we give it, is failure to bestow the care and skill which the situation demands; and hence it is more strictly accurate, perhaps, to call it simply "negligence." And this seems to be the tendency of modern authorities. . . . In the case before us, the law, in the absence of special contract, fixes the degree of care and diligence due from the railroad company to the persons carried on its trains. A failure to exercise such care and diligence is negligence. It needs no epithet properly and legally to describe it." See also Milwaukee & St. P. R. Co. v. Arms, 91 U. S. 489, 492, 23 L. ed. 374, 375; Purple v. Union P. R. Co. 57 L. R. A. 700, 51 C. C. A. 564, 114 Fed. 123."

Whether the use of the word "wilful" negligence is proper and consistent or not, there can be no doubt that it is not equivalent to gross negligence, and the question whether exemplary damages shall be awarded does not justify any classification into degrees, since negligence, however gross, will not authorize such damages. A tort must be aggravated by an evil intent to enable a party to recover exemplary damages. Milwaukee & St. P. R. Co. v. Arms, supra. The only question in any case is whether there is actionable negligence, and, if there is, the authorities establish the proposition that the rights of the parties are not affected by any question of the degree of such negligence. The instructions that the contract was not a good defense in case the jury found the defendant guilty of gross negligence were incorrect, and should not have been given.

At the close of all the evidence there was a motion on the part of the defendant to direct a verdict of not guilty. The court denied the motion, and refused to give the instruction. Under the authority of Blank v. Illinois C. R. Co. 182 Ill. 332, 55 N. E. 332, that instruction should have been given.

The judgments of the Appellate Court and Circuit Court are reversed, and the cause is remanded to the Circuit Court.

KANSAS SUPREME COURT.

ATCHISON & EASTERN BRIDGE COMPANY, Plff. in Err.,
v.

LENA M. MILLER, Admr., etc., of William I. Miller, Deceased.

(....Kan....)

1. Fellow servants.

All employees of the same master, engaged in the same general business, and Headnotes by BURCH, J.

Case Note.—The departmental theory, or consociation theory, of the relation between servants, which, as shown by Labatt on Master and Servant, § 506, p. 1401, obtains in a minority of the states, and which has been subject to much discussion and great diversity of views, is recognized by the above case, if at all, only to a limited and narrow extent. Two of the concurring judges decline to indorse the general doctrines declared in the opinion, and the facts of the case did not present a very complete separation of the work into departments. Though the employees involved in the accident were under different foremen, they were under a single superintendent.

But, without regard to the general theories of departmental work, it may be said that, under the authority of cases most nearly similar on the facts, the injured machinist employed in repairing, and, when necessary, operating, stationary engines used in hoisting and pile driving, which were located upon barges and upon a bridge in course of reconstruction that rested upon false work, and the member of the pile-driving crew by whose negligence a pile, while suspended, was allowed to fall and strike the machinist, may be regarded as fellow servants. Thus it has been held in the following cases that the employees were fellow servants: A laborer employed in building a bridge and an engineer operating hoisting machinery, both being under one foreman's orders. Ryan v. McCully, 123 Mo. 1 L.R.A. (N.S.) whose efforts tend to promote the same general purpose, and accomplish the same general end, are fellow servants.

2. Same—separate departments.

The assignment of servants of the same master to separate departments of the same general enterprise does not affect their relation as fellow servants, unless such departments are so far disconnected that each one may be regarded as a separate undertaking.

3. Same—opportunity of acquaintance.

It is not essential to the fellow-servant relation between employees of the same master that they should have an opportunity to become acquainted with each other, or to observe each other's conduct, or to take precautions against each other's negligence, or to influence each other in the formation of habits of foresight and care.

4. Same—assumption of risk.

Fellow servants assume the risk of injury from each other in their common conduct of the master's work.

5. Master's duty in selection of servants.

The master, however, contracts to exercise reasonable care in the selection of his servants, and to furnish them all with a reasonably safe place in which to work, and reasonably safe materials, tools, and appliances with which to work; and he is liable for injuries resulting from breaches of these duties, no matter what the ordinary duties

These cases may not be conclusive authority for the decision in ATCHISON & E. BRIDGE Co. v. MILLER, but they show that the tendency of the courts has been to regard as fellow servants those of different trades or kinds of work when engaged in building the same structure, or when one is operating some hoisting machinery or elevator and the other is injured by his negligence in working it.

or the rank or grade or department of the servant to whom their performance has been delegated.

6. Fellow servants—machinist and member of crew.

A member of a pile-driving crew, engaged in driving piling for the erection of false work essential to the reconstruction of a bridge, is a fellow servant with a machinist employed by the same master to repair stationary engines located in the midst of the work upon barges, upon the bridge, and upon the false work, and used for hoisting material and driving piling in the progress of the general enterprise of building the false work.

ERROR to the District Court for Atchison County to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for the alleged negligent killing of plaintiff's intestate. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. W. W. Guthrie and W. F. Guthrie, for plaintiff in error:

The fellow-servant rule proceeds on the theory that the ordinary risks of the employment, of which the negligence of co-servants is one, are taken into consideration by both parties in agreeing upon the terms of a contract of employment, and in fixing the compensation; and that, therefore, every person who enters the service of another must be assumed to have taken upon himself all the ordinary risks of the employment, including the negligence of competent co-servants.

12 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. pp. 893, 902.

The master's liability to one servant for the negligence of another in no wise depends upon the comparative rank of the negligent servant.

The different-department limitation upon the rule of nonliability is contrary to the weight of authority.

Farwell v. Boston & W. R. Corp. 4 Met. 49, 38 Am. Dec. 339; Brodeur v. Valley Falls Co. 16 R. I. 448, 17 Atl. 54.

The master owes to every servant whom he employs certain direct and positive duties, well understood and easily determined.

These are positive obligations of the master to the servant, which it is his duty to perform, and, if he delegates the performance of this duty to another, it still remains his duty, and the failure upon the part of one to whom he delegates it is still his failure.

Messrs. Z. E. Jackson and Jackson & Jackson, for defendant in error:

Whether two servants are fellow servants within the rule depends on whether they are under the orders and control of the same person.

Rourke v. White Moss Colliery Co. L. R. 1 C. P. Div. 556.

To bring employees within the fellow-servant rule the risk of injury from the negligence of the one must be so much a natural and necessary consequence of the employment which the other accepts that it must be included in the risks which have to be considered in his wages.

Morgan v. Vale of Neath R. Co. L. R. 1 Q. B. 149.

The reasons in Farwell v. Boston & W. R. Corp. 4 Met. 49, 38 Am. Dec. 339, for the rule of nonliability are: (1) That such injuries must be presumed to have been within the contemplation of the parties when they made their contract; and (2) that public policy requires the enforcement of such a rule, upon the theory that, by enforcing it, each servant is made closely observant of the acts of his fellow servant, and that the scrutiny of one another naturally tends to efficiency and care.

Union P. R. Co. v. Erickson, 41 Neb. 1, 29 L. R. A. 137, 59 N. W. 347.

The first reason has been completely set aside, and Chicago & St. P. R. Co. v. Ross, 112 U. S. 377, 28 L. ed. 787, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 184, fully answers the second reason.

Persons are in the same common work and fellow servants when engaged in such duties as bring them to work at the same place, at the same time, under such circumstances as make them co-operate with each other, or are, by their usual duties, brought into habitual consociation, from which it may be supposed that they have the power of influencing each other for their mutual protection and the avoidance of injury from negligence. It is a question of fact in each case as to whether the risk of injury from the want of care of the negligent employee was assumed by the injured employee in accepting service, and, as incident to such rule, it is a question of law for the court when there is no doubt about the facts.

As to whether the injured person and negligent person are coemployees, or as to whether there is consociation of the employees, is primarily a question of fact for the jury.

The burden of proof that the injury occurred through the fault of a fellow servant is on defendant.

When the thing is shown to be under the management of the defendant or its servants, and the accident is such as, in the ordinary course of things, would not happen if those who have the management use proper care, it affords reasonable evidence, in the absence of an explanation by the defendant, that the accident arose from want of care.

The rights of master and servant should be considered and determined in the light of existing conditions and relations, and not decided or settled by the mere adoption of precedents established sixty years ago.

Implied contracts are such as reason and justice dictate, and which, therefore, the law presumes that every man undertakes to assume.

In each case where the question of "fellow servant" was involved, the court determined the point by ascertaining the liability assumed in the employment, and decided as to such question in language which clearly applied to, or expressly recognized, the "different department" and "consociation" principle, and that the term "common employment" as used, referred to the community of employment in which the injured and negligent servants were engaged, and not the entire range or scope of the business of the master.

Tightmeyer v. Mongold, 20 Kan. 90.

Right reason and common justice would not imply a contract that the servant assumed the risk of injury from a coservant, and it would not be just or expedient to hold that the employee under such circumstances assumed a liability or risk which was not, or could not have been, known to him at the time he accepted employment, or while engaged in the performance thereof. Every reason suggests, as a foundation of the implied contract, that the assumption of liability L.R.A. (N.S.) ity shall be presumed only where the employee has, or can acquire, some knowledge of the risks and perils assumed.

The decision in this case is inconsistent with the rule heretofore adopted in this state.

Dow v. Kansas P. R. Co. 8 Kan. 642; Kansas P. R. Co. v. Salmon, 14 Kan. 512.

Burch, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

At the time the injury complained of in this litigation was inflicted, the Atchison & Eastern Bridge Company was engaged in the erection of false work essential to the reconstruction of the bridge across the Missouri river at the city of Atchison. The false work served as a substructure of the old bridge during the dismantling process, of the new bridge as piece by piece it replaced the old one, and of a temporary bridge for highway purposes alongside the bridge proper, over which railway traffic was not interrupted. Many men were employed in many kinds of service. A single superintendent managed the entire work, various branches of which were in charge of foremen who directed the operations of separate squads and gangs. Material was assembled and distributed by skiffs and barges on the river, and by cars on the bridge tracks. Many kinds of tools and much machinery were used and transported from place to place. Piles were driven and braced and capped, and a multitude of subsidiary acts performed, all to the ultimate end that the false work might be brought to completion. Stationary engines were used to hoist material and to drive the piling. These engines were located in the midst of the work, upon the barges, upon the bridge, and upon the false work. The plaintiff's intestate, Miller, was employed as a machinist by the bridge company to repair them, and, in addition, to operate them when necessary. On the first day of his service, while he was engaged in repairing an engine situated on the bridge, and only 3 feet from its north edge, a pile-driver barge moored below him, and the crew undertook to drive a pile. It met with an obstruction which rendered it necessary to raise it and resharpen the point. While it was suspended for that purpose, its top towering 30 feet above the floor of the bridge, it fell, and Miller was knocked under the wheels of a passing train, where he received injuries from which he died. His administratrix recovered a judgment against the bridge company, to reverse which this proceeding in error was instituted.

On the trial it sufficiently appeared that the injury was caused by the negligence of a member of the pile-driving crew in fastening the chain used to lift and hold the pile in suspension. The jury, however, returned special findings of fact which raise the question whether the member of the pile-driving crew charged with the duty of adjusting the chain was not a fellow servant of Miller in the general enterprise of constructing the false work. Such findings, arranged as well as they may be to develop the subject, are as follows:

"(81) State whether or not the defendant, at the time the pile fell, was engaged in the undertaking of constructing false work to support the iron-work of the bridge during the progress of reconstruction? A. Yes.

"(82) State whether or not, in constructing such false work, stationary engines were used for the purpose of raising and lowering timbers and on stationary and barge pile driver? A. Yes.

"(83) State whether or not Miller was employed to do any necessary work done on the stationary engines used by the defendant, which required attention from a machinist? A. Yes."

"(85½) If you answer question No. 83 in the affirmative, state what, if anything, in addition to work as a machinist, Miller was employed to do. A. Run an engine."

"(106) State whether or not, in the course of practice on that work, men in one crew were interchanged with men in others, in the judgment of the superintendent? A. Yes."

"(84) State whether or not the work which Miller took service to perform would require him to work in and around the places where other men engaged in putting up the false work were at work? A. Yes.

"(85) State whether or not the work which Miller took service to perform required him to work in and about places where negligence on the part of other employees engaged in putting in the false work might result in injury to him? A. Yes."

"(24) Was the line of service in which said William I. Miller was employed that of a machinist, to repair and keep in order the hoisting engines and machinery used by the defendant company in the prosecution of its work? A. Yes."

"(25) Was the duty and work in which the barge crew was employed at the time of the injury to said Miller that of operating the machinery upon the barge, and hoisting and driving in the bed of the Missouri river? A. Yes."

"(14) At the time said William I. Miller, deceased, received the injuries from which he died, was he engaged, as a machinist, in repairing a hoisting engine upon the floor of defendant's bridge? A. Yes."

"(1) Did a pile fall in the direction of and toward William I. Miller, deceased, at 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

the time he received the injury from which he died? A. Yes."

"(15) If you answer question 1 'Yes,' or in the affirmative, then was such pile being raised about ten (10) feet north and east from where said Miller was then at work? A. Yes.

"(16) If you answer question 1 'Yes,' or in the affirmative, then was such pile being raised from a barge or boat floating on the river? A. Yes.

"(17) If you answer question 16 'Yes,' or in the affirmative, then was such barge or boat about 20 feet lower elevation than the floor of the defendant's bridge? A. Yes.

"(18) If you answer question 16 'Yes,' or in the affirmative, then was such pile raised until the top was about 30 feet higher than the floor of defendant's bridge? A. Yes."

"(39) State whether or not the engine upon which Miller was working was located about three (3) feet from the north side of the bridge? A. Yes."

"(79) State whether or not Miller was working at the time on the engine within ten (10) or fifteen (15) feet of the pile driver? A. Yes."

"(80) State whether or not Miller, at the time the pile fell, was working where he could see the operations upon the pile driver? A. Yes."

These facts are sufficient to enable the court to draw the proper conclusion of law as to the relation of the deceased and the chairman of the pile-driver crew.

Each party to the suit sought the legal opinion of the jury upon certain phases of the controversy. To the plaintiff the jury responded as follows:

"Were said William I. Miller, deceased, at the time he received the injury from which he died, and the barge or boat crew employed in raising the pile, engaged in different lines of work or employment? A. Yes.

"Were the work and duties of said William I. Miller such as to bring him into habitual association with said barge crew, so that he might exercise an influence upon said barge crew promotive of proper care and caution, and the line of employment of said barge crew such that they might exercise an influence upon said Miller promotive of proper care and caution? A. No.

"At the time said Miller received the injuries from which he died, was he working in a different line of duty and service from that in which the barge crew was at work and employed? A. Yes."

To the defendant it answered thus:

"State whether or not all of the employees engaged in constructing false work to support the iron-work of the bridge during process of reconstruction, or in aiding them in such work, were engaged in the common enterprise of constructing such false work. A. Yes."

This court can say whether the repair of engines is a different kind of service from pile driving, and whether, from the nature of their duties, and the situations of the machinist and the chainman, they might, in their work, exercise an influence upon each other promotive of care and caution, and whether they were both engaged in a common enterprise, as well as the jury; and the questions and answers last presented are reproduced here chiefly for the purpose of elucidating the theories of counsel respecting the rules of law applicable to the case. From these questions and answers it is apparent the plaintiff relies upon the so-called departmental and consociation limitations of the fellow-servant rule acknowledged in certain jurisdictions, while the position of the defendant is that identity of department and consociation of duties are not tests of the master's liability, but that, if the injured and the injuring servants work under the control of a common master in a general employment directed to a common end, the master is not liable, provided, of course, the neglected duty be not one which the master himself must perform.

There is much force in the defendant's argument that the master is not liable in this case even under the consociation theory of the relation between the servants. Miller's duties called him into the most intimate association with the other men. The conduct of each was at all times likely to affect the others. If his tools should fly from his hand, or a separated part of the machinery he was repairing should escape him, they might strike a member of the barge crew. If a pile were unskilfully handled, it might strike him. Trucking crews passing and repassing with tools, machinery, and materials might injure him, and carelessness in his conduct might injure them. When he was injured he was within 10 or 15 feet of the barge crew, and in plain view of the pile, which hung almost over him, and his duties constantly exposed him to such perils. The nature of his employment was such that he might have been repairing or even running the engine used for hoisting the pile which fell at the time it fell. He was almost as intimately related to the chainman as the engineer upon the barge. In states where the consociation doctrine prevails, it is held that the length of time the different servants may have been at work is not material, and that all of them need not be engaged to do work precisely identical in kind. "It is true, they might have been fellow servants in the strictest sense, and yet they might not have been associated an hour before the happening of the injury. What is meant is, if the 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

parties continue to be engaged in a common service, they will be habitually associated, so that they may exercise any influence over each other promotive of common safety." Chicago & A. R. Co. v. Hoyt, 122 Ill. 369, 375, 12 N. E. 225, 227. "The fact that an employee was only temporarily engaged at a particular task, and that he had no acquaintance with his collaborators does not operate to bar the application of the doctrine of fellow servants." Klees v. Chicago & E. I. R. Co. 68 Ill. App. 244. "It is an error to suppose that a force of men cannot be engaged in a common service unless all are continuously working at the same time, and engaged in doing precisely the same kind of work. It is sufficient if all are actually employed by the same master, and that the work of each, whatever it may be, has for its immediate object a common end or purpose, sought to be accomplished by the united efforts of all. The skill of a carpenter, blacksmith, or other mechanic might be very useful in removing a wreck, and, when thus working together in such a service, though each one in his own particular way, they are all, within the meaning of the rule, engaged in a common employment." Abend v. Terre Haute & I. R. Co. 111 Ill. 202, 211, 53 Am. Rep. 616. If this be true, all the conditions of the consociation doctrine are fairly satisfied in this case, since the findings of fact disclose a very necessary dependence of the machinist and the pile drivers upon each other's care and vigilance or mutual safety, and abundant opportunity for the operation of reciprocal influences conducive to their common welfare. It is not the purpose of the court, however, to rest its decision upon this ground, if another and more fundamental one be discoverable. If the decisions of this court show that it has, in the main, consistently adhered to a logically defensible theory respecting the liability of a master for an injury to one of his servants caused by the negligence of another, those decisions, and the theory upon which they proceed, ought to be followed, unless great injustice would result from doing so. To discover the true position of the court upon this subject, an examination of its leading and best-considered cases is necessary.

In the early case of Dow v. Kansas P. R. Co. 8 Kan. 642, it was held that a conductor and a brakeman of the same railway train are fellow servants. The court was greatly impressed with the duty of railroad companies to make their service safe to the traveling public, and, believing that the watchfulness over each other of officers and agents charged with the running of trains would tend to promote the general welfare, it apparently undertook to encourage such conduct by preventing a recovery against the master in case one of those servants should injure another. In the opinion it is said: "The paramount object of nearly all the rules of law concerning the operation of railroads is security to the person and lives of human beings, and particularly security to the persons of passengers being transported on the trains from one portion of the country to another; and, in order to insure this security, the railroad companies are held to the strictest accountability with regard to passengers. They must use the utmost care and skill within the scope of human foresight or human knowledge practicable. They are liable to passengers for the slightest negligence on the part of their agents or servants. But this is not all. A rule must be adopted that will insure the most skilful and trustworthy agents and servants. . . . But it is also the policy of the law to make it to the interest of every servant or agent of the railroad company to see that every other servant or agent of the company is competent and trustworthy. This may be done by making it to the interest of every employee of the railway company to inform the company of every act of any other employee showing a want of skill, care, or competency. The employees of the railway company have the best opportunities of knowing the competency and trustworthiness of the other employees of such company, and, if they do not think the other employees are competent or careful, let them either inform the company, so that the incompetent or negligent employees may be discharged, or themselves quit the service of the company. Who can know better whether a conductor of a railroad train is competent and trustworthy than the brakeman on the same train? . . . As to passengers, and generally as to any person not in the employ of the company, the negligence of any agent or servant of the company is the negligence of the company. As to such persons even the negligence of the brakeman is the negligence of the company. But as between coemployees no one is peculiarly the representative of the company more than another, except, perhaps the higher officers whose duty it is to employ and discharge the other employees, and therefore as between coemployees the negligence of none but the higher officers aforesaid is the negligence of the company. If such higher officers are not careful and diligent in employing and discharging or retaining the other employees, then the company is responsible to the other employees for the negligence of such employees as have been employed or retained without proper care." From these extracts it is plain, however, that the court was not attempting to establish a general foundation for the law of coservice. Finding a peculiar state of facts to which the reasoning of the opinion would apply, it drew a limited conclusion, without discussing the bearing of the argument upon broader subjects. It was sufficient to make the interest of the public the controlling consideration in determining who should be liable for the negligent infliction of injuries upon each other by persons charged with the running of trains. As far as it went, the opinion was an affirmation of the views of Chief Justice Shaw in the epoch-making case of Farwell v. Boston & W. R. Corp. 4 Met. 49, 58, 59, 38 Am. Dec. 339. In that case it is said: "If we look from considerations of justice to those of policy, they will strongly lead to the same conclusion. In considering the rights and obligations arising out of particular relations, it is competent for courts of justice to regard considerations of policy and general convenience, and to draw from them such rules as will, in their practical application, best promote the safety and security of all parties concerned. This is, in truth, the basis on which implied promises are raised: being duties legally inferred from a consideration of what is best adapted to promote the benefit of all persons concerned, under given circumstances. To take the well-known and familiar cases already cited, a common carrier, without regard to actual fault or neglect in himself or his servants, is made liable for all losses of goods confided to him for carriage, except those caused by the act of God or of a public enemy, because he can best guard them against all minor dangers. . . . The liability of passenger carriers is founded on similar considerations. They are held to the strictest responsibility for care, vigilance, and skill on the part of themselves and all persons employed by them, and they are paid accordingly. The rule is founded on the expediency of throwing the risk upon those who can best guard against it. Story, Bailments, §§ 590 et seq. We are of opinion that these considerations apply strongly to the case in question. Where several persons are employed in the conduct of one common enterprise or undertaking, and the safety of each depends much on the care and skill with which each other shall perform his appropriate duty, each is an observer of the conduct of the others, can give notice of any misconduct, incapacity, or neglect of duty, and leave the service if the common employer will not take such precaution and employ such agents as the safety of the whole party may require. By these means the safety of each will be much more effectually secured than could be done by a resort to the common employer for indemnity in case of loss by the negligence of each other. Regarding it in this light, it is the ordinary case of one sustaining an injury in the course of his own employment, in which he must bear the loss himself, or seek his remedy, if he have any, against the actual wrongdoer." This interest of a portion of the public in a particular employment, however, cannot furnish a sound basis from which to determine the liability of masters generally. In multitudes of cases employees may not be able to exert any appreciable influence upon each other, and yet the risk of injury from a coservant be one clearly within the comprehension of the parties when the relation of master and servant was formed. In the Farwell Case the effect of the consociation of employees, and their separation into departments, upon the liability of the master, was reasoned out as follows: "It was strongly pressed in the argument that, although this might be so, where two or more servants are employed in the same department of duty, where each can exert some influence over the conduct of the other, and thus to some extent provide for his own security, yet that it could not apply where two or more are employed in different departments of duty, at a distance from each other, and where one can in no degree control or influence the conduct of another. But we think this is founded upon a supposed distinction on which it would be extremely difficult to establish a practical rule. When the object to be accomplished is one and the same, when the employers are the same, and the several persons employed derive their authority and their compensation from the same source, it would be extremely difficult to distinguish what constitutes one department and what a distinct department of duty. It would vary with the circumstances of every case. If it were made to depend upon the nearness or distance of the persons from each other, the question would immediately arise. How near or how distant must they be to be in the same or different departments? In a blacksmith's shop, persons working in the same building, at different fires, may be quite independent of each other, though only a few feet distant. In a ropewalk, several may be at work on the same piece of cordage at the same time, at many hundred feet distant from each other and beyond the reach of sight and voice, and yet acting together. Besides, it appears to us that the argument rests upon an assumed principle of responsibility which does not exist. The master, in the case supposed, is not exempt from liability because the servant has better means of providing for his safety when he is employed in immediate connection with those from whose negligence he might suffer, but because the implied contract of the master does not extend to indemnify the servant against the negligence of anyone but himself: and he is not liable in tort, as for the negligence of his servant, because the person suffering does not stand towards him in the relation of a stranger, but is one whose rights are regulated by contract, express or implied. The exemption of the master, therefore, from liability for the negligence of a fellow servant, does not depend exclusively upon the consideration that the servant has better means to provide for his own safety, but upon other grounds. Hence the separation of the employment into different departments cannot create that liability, when it does not arise from express or implied contract." Commenting upon this argument, the supreme court of Rhode Island, in an opinion of much force and clearness, said: "The reasons here set forth are a strong answer to the position taken in the Illinois cases. They show an obvious impracticability in trying to gauge the liability of an employer, in a complex business, by the independence of its different branches, or by the intercommunication of those employed. Not only would it be almost impossible, in many cases, to separate the work into distinct departments, and to discern their dividing lines, but incidental duties, changing the relations of workmen to each other, would vary also the master's liability. He would thus be liable for the negligence of a servant at one time or place, and not at another. Without a personal supervision of all his help in all their work, he could not know when he was responsible and when he was not. Moreover, such a rule would govern the liability of a master when the groundwork upon which the rule is founded did not exist. For if the test of liability be that of the separate and independent duties of the servants, they may nevertheless be so near each other as to be able to exert a mutual influence to caution, or, if it be that of association, they may still be in the same department, but unable, from their duties or position, to exert such influence. But, aside from these considerations, we do not think the rule is correct in principle. The principle upon which the determination of Farwell v. Boston & W. R. Corp., proceeded is the same that has been generally followed in England and in this country, namely, that the rights and liabilities of both master and servant are those which grow out of their contract relation. The master impliedly agrees to use due care for the safety of his servant, in providing suitable places and appliances for work; and, as is universally conceded, the servant agrees to assume the ordinary risks of his employment. The most common risks of service spring from the negligence of fellow servants. When one works with others, he knows that his safety depends on the exercise of care by those around him, as their safety depends, also, upon his own caution. No man can enter into an employment without a thought of this. Negligence, therefore, among workmen, is a breach of the duty which each owes to the others, and not a breach of the master's duty, if he has exercised the care that is required of him. For his own negligence the master must answer, but for that of others, which is a risk incident to every employment, he has not agreed to be responsible, but, on the contrary, the servant has impliedly agreed to assume it upon himself." Brodeur v. Valley Falls Co. 16 R. I. 448, 451. 17 Atl. 54, 55. In the Dow Case it will be observed that the distinction between superior and inferior servants is made to lie in the nature of the duty to be performed, and not in mere rank or grade. The simple fact that an officer or agent hires or discharges men does not in itself make the master liable for his conduct generally, but the negligence of such an officer or agent as a representative of the master in hiring or retaining incompetent employees entails responsibility if injury results.

In the case of Kansas P. R. Co. v. Salmon, 14 Kan. 512, the limit of the master's liability to his employees was quite clearly perceived and stated. It was said, in effect, that upon officers and agents who may employ, retain, or discharge men rests the duty of exercising reasonable care and diligence in furnishing a sufficient number of competent employees for the work to be done. Those who have the power to furnish implements, machinery, or materials to other employees must furnish them in sufficient number and amount, and of proper kind, to accomplish the work. These officers, agents, and employees discharge duties of a higher kind than those who merely do the work, and, to that extent, are regarded as higher or superior. Their employment in respect to such matters is not common with that of other employees. Having thus distinguished the duties which the master must perform, the court says: "A railway company is not responsible to one employee for the negligence of another employee, where they are both engaged in the same common employment. . . . The grade of the employee within the particular employment does not generally make much difference. If the employee performs the duties of one of the higher officers, agents, or servants, of which we have already spoken, the company is generally responsible for his negligence, whatever may be his grade. But if he is engaged in the same common employment with other employees, the company is generally not responsible for his negligence to the other employees, although he may be in fact the foreman for that particular work."

In the case of Kansas P. R. Co. v. Little, 19 Kan. 267, a superintendent had entire charge of the work of building a culvert. It was his duty to inspect machinery and see that it was in good order. A derrick became defective, to the knowledge of the superintendent, who failed to repair it, in consequence of which it fell and injured a workman. In the opinion it is said: "Owens, however, had the power to inspect said materials, tools, and implements, and if not sufficient, or if they became insufficient, to apply to his superior officers for others. The jury found specially that 'it was the duty of Owens to inspect the derrick and see that it continued in good order.' Said derrick was sufficient and in good order when Owens received it. But afterward, by use, it became insufficient. . . . That Owens was negligent in using said derrick after he knew that it had become insufficient and unsafe, we suppose no one will question; but whether this negligence was the negligence of the railroad company may be questioned, and is questioned. We think it was. Owens was the only representative that the railroad company had upon that work. He was really the superintendent of the railroad company for that particular work. As to the laborers on the work, he was the railroad company itself. If he had been merely a foreman working under a common employer, a common master, a common principal, along with the other employees, then we suppose, under the authorities, he would have been only a fellow servant with the others, and the company would not have been responsible for his negligence towards the others. But he was not merely a foreman working with the others under a common employer. As to the others he was the employer himself. He was their master, their principal." Further in the opinion it is stated, by way of showing the complete authority of the superintendent, that he hired and discharged men; but the basis of the decision is the master's failure to furnish to his employees safe instrumentalities with which to work.

In the case of Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Moore, 29 Kan. 632, 644, the true rule was stated by Mr. Justice Valentine in the following luminous way: "In all cases at common law a master assumes the duty toward his servant of exercising reasonable care and diligence to provide the servant with a reasonably safe place at which to work, with reasonably safe machinery, tools, and implements to work with, with reasonably safe materials to work upon, and with suitable and competent fellow servants to work with him; and when the master has properly discharged these duties, then, at common law, the servant assumes all the risks and hazards incident to, or attendant upon, the exercise of the particular employment or the performance of the particular work, including those risks and hazards resulting from the possible negligence and carelessness of his fellow servants and coemployees. And at common law, whenever the master delegates to any officer, servant, agent, or employee, high or low, the performance of any of the duties above mentioned, which really devolve upon the master himself, then such officer, servant, agent, or employee stands in the place of the master, and becomes a substitute for the master,—a vice principal,—and the master is liable for his acts or his negligence to the same extent as though the master himself had performed the acts or was guilty of the negligence. But at common law, where the master himself has performed his duty, the master is not liable to any one of his servants for the acts or negligence of any mere fellow servant or coemployee of such servant, where the fellow servant or coemployee does not sustain this representative relation to the master; nor is he liable for the failure of still other servants to perform certain acts, where the performance of such acts does not come within the proper line of their duties." This language has been quoted as authoritative by a large number of the state courts of this country and by the Supreme Court of the United States. It was written upon the theory that the negligence of coservants is not a breach or the master's duty, but a breach of the duty of servants toward each other; that the risk of injury from the negligence of fellow employees is one of the ordinary risks of any employment which are assumed when the contract of service is made; and that whatever in this respect the servant could reasonably foresee entered into the terms of his compensation.

In the case of St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. v. Weaver, 35 Kan. 412, 57 Am. Rep. 176, 11 Pac. 408, it was held that a section foreman or section boss whose duty consisted in keeping a railway track in a safe condition for the operation of trains was not a coemployee or fellow servant with the engineer of a locomotive drawing a train. In the opinion something of the confusion, even then deeply confounded, exhibited by the authorities upon the law of coservice, is reflected. In portions of the opinion the results of consociation and departmental separation are given weight, but the test of the liability of the master is finally placed upon the character of the duty to be performed, and not upon the assignment of servants to different lines of employment, or their opportunity to become acquainted with or to influence each other. The conclusion of the court is thus 1 L.R.A. (N.S.) expressed: "Therefore, where a railroad company delegates, directly or indirectly, to a section boss or section foreman, the duty of keeping a certain section of the railroad in proper condition and repair, and to warn trainmen in case of danger, and the section boss fails to perform his duty in these respects, and a trainman is injured by reason of such negligence, the railroad company is responsible."

In the case of Missouri P. R. Co. v. Peregoy, 36 Kan. 424, 14 Pac. 7, the opinion was written by a commissioner. Language is used recognizing the so-called superior control limitation of the common-law fellow-servant rule, and a quotation from Kansas P. R. Co. v. Salmon is inserted in a manner indicating a misapprehension of the meaning of that case. But stable ground for the decision is reached in the second paragraph of the syllabus, which reads as follows:

"Where such foreman directed an unskilled apprentice to do work that requires a skilled mechanic to perform, and directed him to call to his assistance other employees also ignorant of said work, and said work was dangerous, and such danger was known to the foreman, and was unknown to such employees, and no notice was given to them of the danger, and the foreman failed to give them instructions which, if given and followed, would have prevented the accident, and one was killed while at said work, the employer is liable in an action for damages."

Under all the authorities, such a risk is not one ordinarily incident to an employment. But to hold a company liable merely because the person injured was working under a foreman would undermine the authority of all the preceding Kansas decisions, some of which contain statements directly to the contrary. The necessary conclusion following a consideration of them is that, unless the duty neglected be one which the master is bound to perform, he cannot be liable, no matter what servant may be careless. He cannot be "represented" except in respect to his duty to furnish a safe place, careful employees, and the like. Having discharged this duty, his responsibility ends, and distinctions of rank and grade as between the injured and injuring servant are of no consequence whatever.

In the year 1898 the opinion in the case of Walker v. Gillett, 59 Kan. 214, 52 Pac. 442, was promulgated. It held that a train conductor is not a fellow servant with a brakeman acting under his orders. The only Kansas case cited in support of the opinion is that of Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Seeley, 54 Kan. 21, 37 Pac. 104, which has no application, because the neglected duty there under consideration was one of inspection, which the master was bound to perform, and the decision was expressly placed upon that ground. The Dow Case, 8 Kan. 642, which decided the same question in exactly the opposite way, and which had stood as law in this state for twenty-seven years, was not given even a passing reference. The doctrine in Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. v. Ross, 112 U. S. 377, 28 L. ed. 787, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 184, was adopted in full. From the decision in the Ross Case four justices dissented. When the Walker Case was decided, the Ross Case already had been questioned and branded as "extreme" by this court in the Weaver Case, 35 Kan. 412, 57 Am. Rep. 176, 11 Pac. 408. The Supreme Court of the United States had already receded from its doctrine, and the next year its authority was expressly repudiated in the case of New England R. Co. v. Conroy, 175 U. S. 323, 44 L. ed. 181, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 85, the headnotes of which are as follows:

"The negligence of a conductor of a freight train is the negligence of a fellow servant of a brakeman on the same train, who was killed by an accident occurring through that negligence.

"The negligence of such conductor is not the negligence of the vice or substituted principal or representative of the railroad company running the train, and for which that corporation is responsible.

"The general rule of law is that one who enters the service of another takes upon himself the ordinary risks of the negligent acts of his fellow servants in the course of the employment.

"An employer is not liable for an injury to one employee occasioned by the negligence of another engaged in the same general undertaking. It is not necessary that the servants should be engaged in the same operation or particular work. It is enough, to bring the case within the general rule of exemption, if they are in the employment of the same master, engaged in the same common enterprise, both employed to perform duties tending to accomplish the same general purposes, or, in other words, if the services of each in his particular sphere or department are directed to the accomplishment of the same general end. And, accordingly, in the present case, upon the facts stated, the conductor and the injured brakeman are to be considered fellow servants, within the rule."

If the discredited Ross Case and the Walker Case are to stand as authorities in this state, instead of the Conroy Case and the Dow Case, they must stand as arbitrary exceptions in the law of co-service, and not because they are justifiable upon any of the basic principles of that subject. Whether just cause exists for such a radical innovation cannot be determined in this case. It 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

is the present purpose of the court to find and state and adhere to a logical doctrine if that can be done.

Since qualifications of the fellow-servant rule on account of department, rank, grade, control, and consociation are all substantially similar, and all contradict the same fundamental propositions in the same way, the reasoning by which the Supreme Court of the United States overthrew the Ross Case applies to the case at bar, and extracts from its opinions upon the subject are pertinent here.

In the case of Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Baugh, 149 U. S. 368, 37 L. ed. 772, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 914, Mr. Justice Brewer said: "If the business of the master and employer becomes so vast and diversified that it naturally separates itself into departments of service, the individuals placed by him in charge of those separate branches and departments of service, and given entire and absolute control therein, are properly to be considered, with respect to employees under them, vice principals, representatives of the master, as fully and as completely as if the entire business of the master was by him placed under charge of one superintendent. It was this proposition which the court applied in the Ross Case, holding that the conductor of a train has the control and management of a distinct department. But this rule can only be fairly applied when the different branches or departments of service are, in and of themselves, separate and distinct. Thus, between the law department of a railway corporation and the operating department there is a natural and distinct separation,—one which makes the two departments like two independent kinds of business, in which the one employer and master is engaged. So oftentimes there is in the affairs of such corporation what may be called a manufacturing or repair department, and another strictly operating department. These two departments are, in their relations to each other, as distinct and separate as though the work of each was carried on by a separate corporation. And from this natural separation flows the rule that he who is placed in charge of such separate branch of the service, who alone superintends and has the control of it, is as to it in the place of the master. But this is a very different proposition from that which affirms that each piece of work in one of these branches of service is a distinct department, and gives to the individual having control of that piece of work the position of vice principal or representative of the master. . . . The truth is, the various employees of one of these large corporations are not graded like steps in a staircase; those on each step being as to those on the step below.

in the relation of masters, and not of fellow servants, and only those on the same steps fellow servants, because not subject to any control by one over the other. Prima facie all who enter into the employ of a single master are engaged in a common service, and are fellow servants, and some other line of demarcation than that of control must exist to destroy the relation of fellow servants. All enter into the service of the same master, to further his interests in the one enterprise. Each knows when entering into that service that there is some risk of injury through the negligence of other employees, and that risk, which he knows exists, he assumes in entering into the employment. . . . The danger from the negligence of one specially in charge of the particular work is as obvious and as great as from that of those who are simply coworkers with him in it. Each is equally with the other an ordinary risk of the employment. If he is paid for the one, he is paid for the other. If he assumes the one, he assumes the other. Therefore, so far as the matter of the master's exemption from liability depends upon whether the negligence is one of the ordinary risks of the employment, and thus assumed by the employee, it includes all coworkers to the same end, whether in control or not. . . . Therefore it will be seen that the question turns rather on the character of the act than on the relations of the employees to each other. If the act is one done in the discharge of some positive duty of the master to the servant, then negligence in the act is the negligence of the master; but, if it be not one in the discharge of such positive duty, then there should be some personal wrong on the part of the employer before he is held liable therefor. But, it may be asked, is not the duty of seeing that competent and fit persons are in charge of any particular work as positive as that of providing safe places and machinery? Undoubtedly it is, and requires the same vigilance in its discharge. But the latter duty is discharged when reasonable care has been taken in providing such safe place and machinery, and so the former is as fully discharged when reasonable precautions have been taken to place fit and competent persons in charge."

In the case of Northern P. R. Co. v. Hambley, 154 U. S. 349, 38 L. ed. 1009, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 983, Mr. Justice Brown said: "To hold the principal liable whenever there are gradations of rank between the person receiving and the person causing the injury, or whenever they are employed in different departments of the same general service, would result in frittering away the whole doctrine of fellow service. Cases arising between persons engaged together in the same identical service—as, for instance, between brakemen of the same train, or two seamen of equal rank in the same ship—are comparatively rare. In a large majority of cases there is some distinction, either in respect to grade of service, or in the nature of their employments. Courts, however, have been reluctant to recognize these distinctions unless the superiority of the person causing the injury was such as to put him rather in the category of principal than of agent,—as, for example, the superintendent of a factory or railway,—and the employments were so far different that, although paid by the same master, the two servants were brought no farther in contact with each other than as if they had been employed by different principals."

In the case of Central R. Co. v. Keegan, 160 U. S. 259, 40 L. ed. 418, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 269, the court quoted approvingly the following language from the decision in the O'Brien v. American Dredging Co. 53 N. J. L. 297, 21 Atl. 324: "Whether the master retain the superintendence and management of his business, or withdraws himself from it and devolves it on a vice principal or representative, it is quite apparent that, although the master or his representative may devise the plans, engage the workmen, provide the machinery and tools, and direct the performance of work, neither can, as a general rule, be continually present at the execution of all such work. It is the necessary consequence that the mere execution of the planned work must be intrusted to workmen, and, where necessary, to groups or gangs of workmen, and in such case that one should be selected as the leader, boss, or foreman to see to the execution of such work. This sort of superiority of service is so essential and so universal that every workman, in entering upon a contract of service, must contemplate its being made use of in a proper case. He therefore makes his contract of service in contemplation of the risk of injury from the negligence of a boss or foreman, as well as from the negligence of another fellow workman. The foreman or superior servant stands to him, in that respect, in the precise position of his other fellow servants."

In the case of Northern P. R. Co. v. Peterson, 162 U. S. 346, 40 L. ed. 994, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 843, the headnote reads: "H. was foreman of an extra gang of laborers for plaintiff in error on its road, and, as such, had charge of and superintending the gang in putting in ties and assisting in keeping in repair three sections of the road. He had power to hire and discharge the hands (thirteen in number) in the gang, and had exclusive charge of their direction and management in all matters connected with their employment. The defendant in error was one of that gang, hired by H., and subject, as a laborer, while on duty with the gang, to his authority. While on such duty the defendant in error suffered serious injury through the alleged negligence of H., acting as foreman in the course of his employment, and sued the railroad company to recover damages for those injuries. Held, that H. was not such a superintendent of a separate department, nor in control of such a distinct branch of the work of the company, as would be necessary to render it liable to a coemployee for his neglect, but that he was a fellow workman, in fact, as well as in law, whose negligence entailed no such liability on the company as was sought to be enforced in this action." In delivering the opinion of the court, Mr. Justice Peckham said: "In the Baugh Case it is also made plain that the master's responsibility for the negligence of a servant is not founded upon the fact that the servant guilty of the neglect had control over, and a superior position to that occupied by, the servant who was injured by his negligence. The rule is that in order to form an exception to the general law of nonliability, the person whose neglect caused the injury must be 'one who was clothed with the control and management of a distinct department, and not a mere separate piece of work in one of the branches of service in a department.' This distinction is a plain one, and not subject to any great embarrassment in determining the fact in any particular case. When the business of the master or employer is of such great and diversified extent that it naturally and necessarily separates itself into departments of service, the individuals placed by the master in charge of these separate branches and departments of service, and given entire and absolute control therein, may properly be considered, with respect to employees under them, vice principals and representatives of the master as fully and as completely as if the entire business of the master were placed by him under one superintendent. . . . This boss of a small gang of ten or fifteen men, engaged in making repairs upon the road wherever they might be necessary, over a distance of three sections, aiding and assisting the regular gang of workmen upon each section as occasion demanded, was not such a superintendent of a separate department, nor was he in control of such a distinct branch of the work of the master, as would be necessary to render the master liable to a coemployee for his neglect. He was in fact, as well as in law, a fellow workman."

These decisions are in accord with the overwhelming weight of authority both in England and in this country. 4 Thompson on 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Negligence, chap. 125, in which the consociation doctrine is described as "local and peculiar;" 12 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. pp. 975, 976; 2 Labatt, Mast. & S. chap. 27. The later text appears as a note to the report of the case of Sofield v. Guggenheim Smelting Co., in 50 L. R. A. 417.

The views of various state courts upon the subject are illustrated by the following quotations:

"The rule of law that a servant cannot maintain an action against his master for an injury caused by the fault or negligence of a fellow servant is not confined to the case of two servants working in company, or having opportunity to control or influence the conduct of each other, but extends to every case in which the two, deriving their authority and their compensation from the same source, are engaged in the same business, though in different departments of duty; and it makes no difference that the servant whose negligence causes the injury is a submanager or foreman, of higher grade or greater authority than the plaintiff. If a master uses reasonable care in employing suitable servants, in supplying and keeping in repair suitable structures and engines, and in giving proper directions and taking due precautions as to their use, he is not responsible to one servant for the negligence of another in the management and use of such structures and engines in carrying on the master's work. A railroad corporation is not liable to a brakeman on one of its trains for injuries suffered from the negligent setting up and use of a derrick by workmen employed in widening its railroad." Holden v. Fitchburg R. Co. 129 Mass. 268, 37 Am. Rep. 343.

"A carpenter who is injured while repairing an elevator shaft, and the operator of the elevator, both of whom were employed by the owner of the building, are fellow servants, employed in the same general business; and the master is not responsible for an injury resulting to the carpenter from the negligence of the operator of the elevator. Fellow servants are engaged in a common employment when each of them is occupied in service of such a kind that the others, in the exercise of ordinary sagacity, ought to foresee, when accepting their employment, that his negligence would probably expose them to injury; and, danger from the negligence of another employee being fairly apparent, all other employees assume the risk incident to that danger." Mann v. O'Sullivan, 126 Cal. 61, 77 Am. St. Rep. 149, 58 Pac. 375.

"The negligence of the foreman of a gang in failing to block a pile which was shoved against plaintiff, injuring him because it was not blocked, is the negligence of a fellow servant, although the foreman had authority to employ and discharge plaintiff, and the plaintiff was under his superintendence and control in doing the work in the performance of which he was injured. Whether a negligent servant is the fellow servant of an employee who is injured by the carelessness of the former depends not upon the relative ranks of the two servants, but upon the character of the work, the negligence with respect to which resulted in the injury. The negligent performance or omission to perform a duty which the master owes to his employees is at common law the negligence of the master, whatever the grade of the servant who is in that respect careless. The negligence of a servant engaged in the same general business with the injured servant is the negligence of a fellow servant, whatever position the former occupies with respect to the latter, as to all acts which pertain to the duties of a mere servant, as contradistinguished from the duties of the master to his employees." Ell v. Northern P. R. Co. 1 N. D. 336, 12 L. R. A. 97, 26 Am. St. Rep. 621, 48 N. W. 222.

"A founder in a blast furnace for the manufacture of pig iron, who has a separate department,—the inside work of the furnace,—and who has nothing to do with the other departments, except when acting through the general management or the foreman or boss of such departments, is held to be a fellow servant of an engineer whose business it is to move the cars on the furnace track as desired in the business, and to assume the risk that said cars might be handled negligently by said engineer." Adams v. Iron Cliffs Co. 78 Mich. 272, 18 Am. St. Rep. 441, 44 N. W. 270.

"When servants are employed and paid by the same master, and their duties are such as to bring them into such a relation that the negligence of the one in doing his work may injure the other in the performance of his, then they are engaged in the same common business, and, being subject to the control of the same master, they are fellow servants, within the generally accepted meaning of the rule, no matter how different the grades of service or compensation may be, or how diverse or distinct their duties may be. 3 Wood, Railway Law, 1494 et seq. And when the relation of fellow servants is established, there can be no recovery from the common master or employer by one of them for an injury occasioned to him through the negligence or misconduct of his coemployee. In order to render the master liable in such case, it would be necessary to show that the negligent servant was incompetent, and that he was selected without reasonable care and prudence, or that he was continued in the employment after notice to the master of his unfitness, or that the master had failed to furnish adequate means and materials for the work. Such is the law of this state, and such is the law as it has generally prevailed in America and England for many years." McMaster v. Illinois C. R. Co. 65 Miss. 264, 268, 7 Am. St. Rep. 653, 4 So. 59.

The earlier Kansas decisions are all in harmony with these cases, and in perfect consonance with them are the latest utterances of the court upon that subject:

"Whenever coemployees under the control of one master are engaged in the discharge of duties directed to one common end, such duties being so closely related that each employee must know he is exposed to the risk of being injured by the negligence of another, they are fellow servants, and each assumes the risk to which he is thus exposed. . . . Plaintiff and the operator of the elevator were engaged in one common pursuit,—that of curing and packing meat. Each worked in a different line of employment, but was engaged in the same general business, and so closely related that the negligence of one was liable to inflict injury to the other. Therefore he must be held to have assumed the risk of the negligence of his coemployee who ran the elevator." Donnelly v. Cudahy Packing Co. 68 Kan. 653, 75 Pac. 1017.

"But whenever a negligent act violates any duty which the master himself owes to the servant—as, for example, the duty to make the service and the place in which it is performed reasonably safe—that fact controls, irrespective of the rank or grade of service between employees, and notwithstanding the circumstance that they are engaged in a common employment, directed to a common end." Coffeyville Vitrified Brick & Tile Co. v. Shanks, 69 Kan. 306, 76 Pac. 856, 857.

In the light of these authorities, it must be concluded that the servant, in the contract of employment, assumes all the ordinary risks of the employment. In the exercise of ordinary sagacity, he must foresee that the negligence of those with whom he works may result in injury to him. Danger from that source is one of the ordinary incidents of the service, and, so far as it fairly may be anticipated, it is assumed. In the conduct of his business the master may utilize the economic principle of the division of labor, systematize and classify his work, and regiment his forces, without affecting his liability. Organization is not only essential to the successful management of all complex operations, but is demanded as a means of securing the safety of employees themselves, and the servant must anticipate its bearing upon his welfare. If the process proceed so far that different departments become, in effect, distinct enterprises, each one may be treated as a separate undertaking. The danger of injury from employees so completely disconnected is so remote that it fairly may be said to be excluded from the contemplation of the parties when the contract is made. But this cannot be true in respect to those employees who are engaged in the same general business, and whose efforts tend to promote the same general purpose and accomplish the same general end. Each one of such servants must know that his relations with the others may endanger his safety. They are all coservants, and each one takes the risk of breaches of duty on the part of the others likely to do him harm. This is true whether or not he may be able to become acquainted with all his fellows; whether or not he may be able to observe their conduct; whether or not he may be able to take precautions against their carelessness; whether or not he may be able to influence them in the formation of habits of foresight and care. The master does not contract to furnish him these opportunities. The master merely contracts to exercise reasonable care in the selection of his associates, and to furnish them all a reasonably safe place in which to work, and reasonably safe materials, tools, and appliances with which to work. The fact that the servant is assigned to a department does not augment or qualify any of these duties, nor does such fact make the negligence of an injuring servant belonging to another department, but who is not charged with the performance of any of these duties, the negligence of the master; and, before the master can become liable to an injured servant, the master must be negligent. All attempts to apply any other rule meet with unsurmountable difficulties. The admission of Justice Thomas in the case of Parker v. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. 109 Mo. 362, 403, 18 L. R. A. 802, 19 S. W. 1119, is deeply significant: "When the principle announced in the earlier cases—that all servants employed and paid by the common master to perform common service were fellow servants—was abandoned, the courts were left apparently with no sound principle by which they could be guided and controlled in concrete cases." The following observations of Judge Dillon in 24 Am. Law Rev., at page 189, contain an admonition which all courts dealing with the fellow-servant doctrine of the law should heed: "Any attempt to refine, based upon the notion of 'grades' in the service, or, what is much the same thing, distinct 'departments' in the service (which departments frequently exist only in the imagination of the judges, and not in fact), will only breed the confusion of the Ohio and Kentucky experiments, whose courts have constructed a labyrinth in which the judges that made it seem to be able to 'find no end, in wandering mazes lost.'"

In this case there can be no doubt that the machinist was engaged with the members of the pile-driving crew in the common employment of erecting the bridge company's false work, and was a fellow servant with them; that the danger to which he was exposed was one which was incidental to the work, and that the negligence of the chainman in securing the chain upon the pile was not the negligence of the master. Therefore the judgment of the District Court is reversed, with direction to enter judgment for the defendant on the findings of fact.

All the Justices concur.

Greene, J., concurring:

I concur in the decision reversing this case, but do not indorse the law of fellow servants, as stated and applied in some of the decisions quoted in the opinion.

C. A. Smith, J., concurring:

I concur in the decision of this case, but cannot concur in some of the statements of the general doctrine as to the law of fellow servants. I think some of them too broad. Nor would I have it understood that this court goes to the extent of some of the cases cited, with apparent approval, as authority for this decision.

Petition for rehearing overruled.

MICHAEL H. JEMMING, Appt.,

v.

GREAT NORTHERN RAILWAY COMPANY, Resp't.

(.... Minn.)

1. Steam shovel—operation of railway—fellow servants.

A crew of nine men, consisting of an engineer, a craneman, a fireman, two jackmen.

Headnotes by ELLIOTT, J.

Case Note.—The statutes of Iowa, Kansas, and Minnesota, abrogating the doctrine of common employment with respect to railway servants engaged in the operation of the road or subjected to its hazards, are substantially alike. Although these statutes are couched in general language applicable to all railroad employees, they have been construed by the state courts as applying only to servants engaged in the actual operation of the road. This construction has been made for the purpose of saving the acts from the imputation of being reand four pitmen, were engaged in operating a steam shovel in a gravel pit. The outfit consisted of a shovel, an engine house which contained the engine which operated the shovel, an old engine tender which contained the coal and water, and a caboosse. It was all located upon a short track which was made up of sections 6 feet long. As the work progressed, and it became necessary to move the shovel forward, a section of track was taken up from the rear, and placed in front of the shovel. The track was in no way connected with any other track. About 16 feet from the shovel outfit there was a temporary track upon which stood ballast cars, and this track was about 80 rods from the main railroad track, with which it connected at a point about 1 mile distant. The engineer employed and discharged the men, and generally controlled the crew. He personally had charge of the work of moving the crane, and controlled the speed and course of the bucket attached thereto. Plaintiff, one of the pitmen, was injured by the negligent manner in which the engineer caused the bucket to swing from the ballast car into the pit. Held:

(a) That the plaintiff and his fellow servants were not at the time of the accident engaged in operating a railway.

(b) That the danger to which the plaintiff was subjected was not one of the hazards peculiar to the operation of a railroad, and therefore was not within § 2701, Gen. Stat. 1894.

(c) That the engineer was a fellow servant of the plaintiff, who was a pitman, and whose work it was, with the assistance of others, to take the 6-foot section of track from the rear of the outfit, carry it forward pugnant to the Constitution as class legislation. The courts have experienced considerable difficulty in determining whether or not, upon the facts of a particular case, it falls within the statute as thus construed.

In Johnson v. St. Paul & D. R. Co. 43 Minn. 222, 8 L. R. A. 419, 45 N. W. 156, the court, after an examination of the adjudicated cases, came to the conclusion that the only construction which will furnish a definite or logical rule is to hold that the statute only applies to those employees who are exposed to the peculiar hazards connected with the use and operation of the road, and whose injuries are the result of such dangers.

In Deppe v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 36 Iowa, 52, it was held that the manifest purpose of the statute was to give its benefits to employees engaged in the hazardous business of operating the road.

A great many of the cases in which the courts of these states have applied the statute come so clearly within its provisions that a reference to them will throw no light upon the question involved in the case of JEMMING v. GREAT NORTHERN R. Co. above reported, and they will not be referred to here.

In Handelun v. Burlington, C. R. & N. R. Co. 72 Iowa, 709, 32 N. W. 4, it was held that an employee whose duty it was to assist in loading and unloading gravel cars, and to ride to and fro on the gravel train, was entitled to recover. And the same holding was had in McKnight v. Iowa & M. R. Constr. Co. 43 Iowa, 406, where an employee who was engaged exclusively in shoveling gravel from a train was injured by its sudden starting.

But the right of a section hand injured while loading timber on a car, to recover, was denied in Smith v. Burlington, C. R. & N. R. Co. 59 Iowa, 73, 12 N. W. 763; and the right of a member of a construction gang to recover, where his duties required him to ride upon and work about cars and tracks, but whose injury was caused by a heavy stone thrown by a coemployee, was denied in Matson v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 68 Iowa, 22, 25 N. W. 511.

The right of an employee in a railway coal house, who was injured through the negligence of a coemployee while coal was being loaded on a car, to recover, was denied in Luce v. Chicago, St. P. M. & O. R. Co. 67 Iowa, 75, 24 N. W. 600.

A section hand injured while loading railroad iron upon a flat car, by a rail falling upon his arm, does not come within the protection of the statute. Pearson v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 47 Minn. 9, 49 N. W. 302.

A case which comes very close to the border line in Deppe v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 36 Iowa, 52, where it was held that a laborer engaged in shoveling earth on flat cars, and sometimes going with the train and unloading the earth, and who was injured while undermining the bank which was being excavated, came within the provisions of the statute. In this case the court said that, although the injuries did not arise from the hazards of railroading, they could not be separated from the general employment of the plaintiff, which subjected him to the perils and hazards of the business of railroading.

The Deppe Case was distinguished in Foley v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 64 Iowa, 644, 21 N. W. 124, where it was held that a car repairer is not entitled to recover for injuries, although he was at times required to travel upon trains in going to his work, but was not required to engage in his employment at points where there were moving trains. The distinction was based on the ground that in the Deppe Case the plaintiff was one of a crew necessary on a construction train, and consequently his duties were peculiar to the operation of a railroad.

An employee handling a derrick used in coaling an engine cannot recover. Reddington v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 108 Iowa, 96, 78 N. W. 800.

An employee was permitted to recover, who was employed on a ditching machine on a railroad, which was operated by the movement along the track of the train of which the machine formed a part, and who was injured by being struck by the crank of a windlass used to lower the scoop. Nelson v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 73 Iowa, 576, and fasten in position in front of the steam shovel.

2. Pleading—specific acts of negligence—proof.

The rule that, where the complaint in an action to recover damages for personal injuries alleges specific acts of negligence, the proof will be confined to the matters thus alleged, applied.

(November 24, 1905.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from an order of the District Court for Wright County denying a motion for a new trial after the direction of a verdict in defendant's favor in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. F. E. Latham and James C. Tarbox, for appellant:

The duty of the master to his servant involves the furnishing of a safe place in which to work, suitable tools and machinery with which to do the work, and the establishment of proper rules for the carrying on of the work in a safe manner.

35 N. W. 611. The difference between this ditching machine and the steam shovel in JEMMING v. GREAT NORTHERN R. Co. is that the ditching machine was actually operated on a railroad track.

An employee engaged in filling tenders with coal from cars upon an adjoining track, who is injured by the negligence of a fellow workman in pushing into the coal car a plank after the work has been completed and the engine is about to start, is entitled to recover. Akeson v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. 106 Iowa, 54, 75 N. W. 676.

So is a person who is employed to travel on a train to remove snow and ice from the track at various points, although the train is not in motion at the time. Smith v. Humeston & S. R. Co. 78 Iowa, 583, 43 N. W. 545.

An employee comes within the statute, who, while working in a ditch along the track, was struck by a piece of coal from the tender of a passing engine. Croll v. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. 57 Kan. 548, 46 Pac. 972.

But a servant injured by the falling of loose coal dislodged from an engine tender which is standing still, by another servant standing on the tender, cannot recover. Weisel v. Eastern R. Co. 79 Minn. 245, 82 N. W. 576. 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Neither can a boiler maker's assistant injured by the negligence of a coservant in letting the smokestack of a locomotive fall. Lavallee v. St. Paul, M. & M. R. Co. 40 Minn. 249, 41 N. W. 974.

But a person employed in a railway car shop, who, while on a ladder leaning against one of the cars of a train, is injured by the negligence of those in charge of the train, in moving it without notice, can recover. Pierce v. Central Iowa R. Co. 73 Iowa, 140, 34 N. W. 783.

This was an accident due to the peculiar hazards attending the operation of engines and trains, and, therefore, is within the fellow-servant law of Minnesota.

Messrs. Rome G. Brown and Charles S. Albert, for respondent:

Elliott, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff was injured while in the employ of the defendant railway company, and brought this action to recover damages on the ground of the alleged negligence of the defendant. At the close of the plaintiff's case, the court directed a verdict in favor of the defendant, and, from an order denying a motion for a new trial, the plaintiff appeals to this court.

The facts are comparatively simple and easily understood. The plaintiff was employed by the defendant railroad company as a pitman with one of the steam-shovel crews engaged in shoveling gravel from a gravel pit in New London. He commenced work on the 12th of September, 1904, and was employed continuously from that date until the 10th of October, when he was injured. The steam-shovel outfit with which the plaintiff was working consisted of the shovel, an engine house, which contained the engine operating the shovel, an old engine tender, containing the coal and water for the use of the engine, and a sort of caboose. It was a steam shovel such as is ordinarily used for similar work in places in no way connected with the railway business. The shovel was located upon sections of track about 6 feet long, which were not connected in any way with any other track. About 16 feet from the shovel outfit, there was a temporary track, upon which stood ballast cars, and this track was about 80 rods away from the main railway track, with which it connected about 1 mile from the place where the steam shovel was located. The shovel worked into the bank immediately in front and on the left-hand side. In its operation the dirt was removed from the place immediately in front before commencing on the left-hand side. When enough had been removed from the front to make the necessary room, a section of the movable track was taken up from the rear of the outfit, carried forward by the pitmen, and placed in front of the shovel. The crew consisted of a fireman, engineer, crane-man, two jackmen, and four pitmen, of which the plaintiff was one. It was the duty of the pitmen to level off the place for a section of the track, and then pick up the ties and rails constituting the section, carry them around in front of the shovel, and put them in place. These rails were 6 feet long, and were fastened together by two bridal bars or pieces of iron, which could be moved forward and backward on the rail. The same section was used over and over again, as fast as the steam shovel moved ahead. The shovel was moved by the engine, which was used to do the digging. The movements of the shovel were controlled by the engineer and the craneman. The engineer would swing the crane around, raise and lower it, and when the dipper was filled would raise it up, and swing it over the ballast car. He governed the speed and the height and course of the dipper. He hired and discharged the men constituting the crew, and was in general charge of the operation of the shovel. The craneman attended to the raising and lowering of the dipper while they were dipping. As usually operated, when the men were in the pit, the shovel was swung around from the ballast car over and across the track, then lowered at something like a right angle with its first course, then brought back towards the machinery, and pushed forward into the bank until the dipper was filled; after which it was raised up over the track, and back again to the car, where it was emptied. On the day when the plaintiff was injured the shovel was being operated somewhat faster than usual. The plaintiff was in the pit, engaged in fixing the bridial bars, when the engineer brought the dipper down in an unusual course, "kind of cornerwise" from where it started, over the place where he was working, so that it would have struck him had he remained in that place. In trying to escape he fell on the track, and the dipper in its forward course towards the dirt struck him, and caused the injuries complained of. At the time of the accident both the ballast car and the steam shovel outfit were stationary, the machinery and crane mechanism only being in motion.

1. The appellant contends that the defendant was guilty of negligence in not framing such general rules and regulations as a prudent man would under the circumstances consider necessary and reasonable for the elimination of possible dangers and the protection of the employees. There is nothing in the record to show whether or not such rules were made in this instance. But the appellant is not in a position to predicate negligence upon the failure to make such rules, even if it appeared that none were made and promulgated. The allegation of the complaint is that, "while plaintiff was so working, and while he was exercising ordinary care and caution, and without fault or negligence on the part of plaintiff in any manner whatever, defendant wrongfully, negligently, and carelessly caused the heavy iron scoop or bucket for digging up and elevating the gravel, with the heavy arm or lever by which it was operated, to descend in a sudden and unexpected manner upon the plaintiff." The court will not consider acts of negligence not charged in the complaint. Connelly v. Minneapolis E. R. Co. 38 Minn. 80, 35 N. W. 582; Morrow v. St. Paul City R. Co. 65 Minn. 382, 67 N. W. 1002. In the Connelly Case the court used language which is equally applicable to the case at bar. "The appellant in his brief relies to some extent upon the duty of the defendant to make and promulgate general rules for the conduct of its employees so far as might be necessary for the protection of coemployees. The case does not involve any such consideration. The complaint does not allege any neglect of duty on the part of the defendant in that respect, nor otherwise than in the movement of these cars on this particular occasion; nor was such a question litigated." For applications of this principle, see Chicago City R. Co. v. Bruley, 215 Ill. 464, 74 N. E. 441; Hudgins v. Coca Cola Bottling Co. 122 Ga. 695, 50 S. E. 974.

This leaves but two questions for consideration: (a) Did the work that the plaintiff was engaged in involve hazards or dangers peculiar to the operation of railroads? And (b) if it did not, was the engineer of the steam-shovel outfit a vice principal or a fellow servant?

2. Laws 1887, chap. 13, p. 69 (Gen. Stat. 1894, § 2701), was enacted for the purpose of abolishing, under certain conditions, the common-law rule which exempts employers from responsibility for damages resulting from personal injuries occasioned by the negligence of a fellow servant.

(a) If the language of the statute had been given a literal construction, it would have applied to all the employees of railroad companies under all circumstances, whether the injury complained of was received in the course of the employment or otherwise. When the statute first came before the court in Lavallee v. St. Paul. M. & M. R. Co. 40 Minn. 249, 41 N. W. 974, it was recognized that such a reading would render the act unconstitutional as class legislation. It was, however, to be presumed that the legislature did not intend the statute to be construed in such a manner as to destroy its validity. It was therefore held to be intended for the benefit only of such employees as were engaged in the extremely hazardous business of operating railroads. Thus limited, the act was constitutional. As said by Chief Justice Gilfillan: "The frequency and magnitude of the dangers to which those employed in operating railroads are exposed; the difficulty—sometimes impossibility—of escaping from them with any amount of care when they come; the fact that a great number of men are employed, co-operating in the same work, so that no one of them can know all the others, their competency, skill, and care, so that he may be said to voluntarily assume the risk arising from the want of skill or care by any one of the number,—are a sufficient reason for applying a rule of liability on the part of the employer to the employee so employed different from that ordinarily applied between master and servant. But no just reason can be suggested why such difference should be founded, not on the character of the employment, nor of the dangers to which those employed are exposed, but on the character only of the employer." See Missouri P. R. Co. v. Mackey, 127 U. S. 205, 32 L. ed. 107, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1161; Labbatt, Mast. & S. §§ 643 et seq. This case was followed in Johnson v. St. Paul & D. R. Co. 43 Minn. 222, 8 L. R. A. 419, 45 N. W. 156, where, after full and careful reconsideration, the statute was held to apply only to the employees of railway corporations exposed to the peculiar hazards connected with the use and operation of railroads. After noting the unsatisfactory efforts which had been made to apply other theories, Mr. Justice Mitchell said: "Therefore, after mature consideration, our conclusion is that, if any limitation is to be placed by the courts upon the application of this statute (and on constitutional grounds there must be), the only one which will furnish any definite or logical rule is to hold that it only applies to those employees who are exposed to the peculiar hazards incident to the use and operation of railroads, and whose injuries are the result of such dangers." The rule, as thus established, that the statute includes only the class of servants exposed to injury by the dangers peculiar to the use and operation of railroads, has never since been departed from by this court. Pearson v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 47 Minn. 9, 49 N. W. 302; Weisel v. Eastern R. Co. 79 Minn. 245, 82 N. W. 576; Holtz v. Great Northern R. Co. 69 Minn. 524, 72 N. W. 805; O'Niel v. Great Northern R. Co. 80 Minn. 27, 51 L. R. A. 532, 82 N. W. 1086; Kline v. Minnesota Iron Co. 93 Minn. 63, 100 N. W. 681. And see Akeson v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. 106 Iowa, 54, 75 N. W. 676.

The statute is held not to apply to street railways, although included within its general language, for the reason that their employees are not exposed to the hazards and dangers incident to the operation of ordinary railroads. Funk v. St. Paul City R. Co. 61 Minn. 435, 29 L. R. A. 208, 52 Am. St. Rep. 608, 63 N. W. 1099. In the Lavallee Case the plaintiff at the time of his injury was employed as a boiler maker in the defendant's shops, and clearly did not come within the statute. In the Johnson Case plaintiff was one of a crew of men who were engaged in repairing a bridge on defendant's road, and in performing the work it was necessary to leave the draw partly open. Through the negligence of one of the crew, the draw was left unfastened. The plaintiff was at work between the stationary part of the bridge and the draw, when the wind blew the draw shut, and injured him. It was held that the injury was not caused by a hazard incident to the operation of a railroad, and there could be no recovery. In the Pearson Case a crew of sectionmen were engaged in loading railroad iron from the ground upon a flat car, when some of the crew negligently let one of the rails fall upon plaintiff's arm. The risk was not in any way different from that to which anyone is subjected who, with others, engage in loading or unloading ponderous articles. It was held that there could be no recovery. In Njus v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 47 Minn. 92, 49 N. W. 527, the plaintiff was engaged in removing iron bars from a car to the ground, and it was held that he was within the statute as construed by the supreme court of Iowa, in which state the accident occurred. In the Weisel Case the plaintiff was one of the crew of a steam shovel working in a gravel pit, which was being operated in a manner very similar to the one in the case at bar. For the purpose of supplying water to the shovel, a locomotive was brought into the pit near the shovel, and a hose attached to the locomotive was carried to the boiler of the steam shovel. The water under steam pressure was thus forced from the locomotive to the shovel. The locomotive with the tender loaded with coal came into the pit, and remained stationary. The plaintiff picked up the hose, and handed it to another member of the crew, who was standing on the loose coal upon the tender. In handling the hose the man on the coal dislodged a piece of coal, which fell upon the plaintiff, and injured him. The risk to which the plaintiff was subjected was held not to be a railroad hazard, as the danger of the coal falling was no other, different, or greater in any respect than would exist in the case of a stationary coal bin in no way connected with a railroad. In the Holtz Case the plaintiff, with three other employees of the railroad company, was engaged in repairing a car in the repair shed. While under the car, engaged in putting plates and nuts on the bolts as they were driven through by another employee, one of the bolts, being longer than the others, came in contact with plaintiff's head, and severely injured him. It was held not a railroad hazard. In the O'Niel Case the plaintiff, a section hand, was injured by coming in contact with a projecting bolt while engaged in removing a part of a railway bridge. The risk was not peculiar to railroading, but was incidental to the repair of a bridge.

The same construction has been placed upon the Iowa statute, which is like that of Minnesota. In Reddington v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 108 Iowa, 96, 78 N. W. 800, Reversing 75 N. W. 679, on rehearing, the plaintiff was employed to aid in coaling the defendant's engine. The engine and train were standing still alongside the coal shed. While so employed in hoisting coal for the purpose of filling a car, a coemployee so negligently moved a crane they were using in the work that it struck the plaintiff's arm and broke it. The danger arising from the use of the crane does not appear to have been greater or less by reason of the fact that it was used in loading a railroad car; nor does it appear that the plaintiff, while engaged in his duties, was exposed to any dangers from the operation of the road. The case comes within Malone v. Burlington, C. R. & N. R. Co. 61 Iowa, 326, 47 Am. Rep. 813, 16 N. W. 203, 65 Iowa, 417, 54 Am. Rep. 11, 21 N. W. 756, and Foley v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 64 Iowa, 644, 21 N. W. 124. In our opinion the evidence shows no liability. See also Nelson v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 73 Iowa, 576, 35 N. W. 611. In Smith v. St. Paul & D. R. Co. 44 Minn. 17, 46 N. W. 149, it was held not a necessary condition to the applicability of the statute that the employment of the servant injured and of the servant whose negligence caused the injury should be of the same kind. Both the servants whose conduct was in question were engaged in actual railroad operations.

There is another line of cases which illustrates the application of the statute. In Nichols v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 60 Minn. 319, 62 N. W. 386, the plaintiff was employed as a wiper in a roundhouse, and was called by the foreman to aid in straightening a wire cable used to pull a plow in unloading gravel from flat cars in repairing the road. One end of the cable was attached to a switch stand, and the other to a locomotive, which pulled until the wire became taut. One of the employees pushed the cable off the end of the switch stand, and it swung around, and broke the plaintiff's leg. The hazard was held peculiar to the railroad business; the court saying: "The test is not whether the conditions are in any respect parallel to those to be found in some other kind of business, or whether the appliances are in, any respect similar to those used in some other kind of business. If there is any element of hazard or condition of danger which contributed to the injury, and which is peculiar to the railroad business, the statute applies. There certainly are such elements and conditions in 1 L.R.A. (N.S.) this case." In Mikkelson v. Truesdale, 63 Minn. 137, 65 N. W. 260, it appeared that the plaintiff was a "wiper," whose duty it was to assist in taking engines in and out of the roundhouse, and to the coal shed for coal. He was injured while assisting in coaling an engine by it being negligently moved by his coservant, and it was held that the hazard was one peculiar to the operation of railroads. In Leier v. Minnesota Belt-Line R. & Transfer Co. 63 Minn. 203, 65 N. W. 269, the plaintiff was injured while attempting to step from a platform to the top of a passing car, under the orders of a conductor. Very naturally it was held that he was injured by reason of exposure to a railroad hazard. In Blomquist v. Great Northern R. Co. 65 Minn. 69, 67 N. W. 804, the plaintiff, a section man, was employed in repairing the defendant's main track. The work had to be done with great and extraordinary haste, in order to avoid danger to trains that were or might be approaching. While engaged with other section men in carrying a heavy iron rail, the plaintiff was injured by a fellow workman negligently releasing his hold on the rail and letting it fall. It was admitted that this was a close or "border" case, but it could be fairly said that the plaintiff's employment involved an element of danger peculiar to the railroad business, and intimately connected with, and growing out of, the operation of the road, to wit, "that he was engaged in repairing the track upon which trains were operated, and that, in view of that fact, the work had to be done with great and unusual haste, in order to avoid danger to trains that were or might be approaching." The Blomquist Case was followed in Anderson v. Great Northern R. Co. 74 Minn. 432, 77 N. W. 240. The plaintiff was engaged with others in repairing a portion of defendant's roadbed, and was injured by the negligence of a fellow servant in releasing a jack which held up a portion of the track, which then fell upon the plaintiff's foot. For the purpose of bringing the case within the principle of the Blomquist Case, it was alleged in the complaint that the work was being executed in great haste, so as to complete the work and replace the track before the arrival of any trains. This allegation was put in issue by the answer, and as the issues were presented, it was, under the evidence, a question for the jury whether or not the work in which the plaintiff was engaged at the time of his injury was being executed under such conditions and circumstances as to expose the plaintiff to the peculiar hazards incident to the use and operation of railroads, and whether he was injured as the result of such dangers. The same principle was applied in Kreuzer v.

Great Northern R. Co. 83 Minn. 385, 86 N. W. 413, where the plaintiff was injured, while at work clearing a wrecked train from the defendant's tracks, by the falling of the roof of a disabled car, caused by the negligence of a fellow servant. The wreck was an extensive one, and the tracks were covered with the disabled cars. The crew was called out in the middle of the night, and from all the circumstances it was apparent that the work was urgent, and that great haste was necessary in order to clear the track for the passage of expected trains. As in the Anderson Case, it was clearly a question for the jury to say whether the work was being done under such circumstances as to expose the plaintiff to the hazards peculiar to operating a railroad. In Lindgren v. Minneapolis & St. L. R. Co. 86 Minn. 152, 90 N. W. 381, the plaintiff, a section man, was injured through the negligence of a fellow servant while engaged in removing a hand car from the railroad tracks to make way for an approaching freight train; and it was held, following Steffenson v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 45 Minn. 355, 11 L. R. A. 271, 47 N. W. 1068, that the case was within the statute, as removing the car from the track was a part of the operation of the car. See also Benson v. Chicago, St. P. M. & O. R. Co. 75 Minn. 163, 74 Am. St. Rep. 444, 77 N. W. 798.

(b) The appellant also contends that the crew which was operating the steam shovel was operating a railroad, within the meaning of the statute as construed by the decisions of this court. We do not think that the steam shovel with its tender and sections of movable track can be thus dignified. In Schneider v. Chicago, B. & N. R. Co. 42 Minn. 68, 43 N. W. 783, the plaintiff was injured by being thrown from the pilot of an engine which was being operated upon a temporary construction track. It was not questioned but that the defendant was operating a railroad, but it was claimed that the proviso of § 2701 applied, as the road was not open to public use. See also Moran v. Eastern R. Co. 48 Minn. 46, 50 N. W. 930, and Roe v. Winston, 86 Minn. 77, 90 N. W. 122. The road under construction in Schus v. Powers-Simpson Co. 85 Minn. 447, 69 L. R. A. 887, 89 N. W. 68, was an extensive logging railroad, and it was contended unsuccessfully that the statute did not apply to it, because it was not organized as a railroad corporation, and was not engaged as a common carrier of passengers and freight, but confined its railroad business exclusively to its own affairs. The Schus Case was followed in Kline v. Minnesota Iron Co. 93 Minn. 63, 100 N. W. 681, where it appeared 1 L.R.A. (N.S.) that the defendant was operating a narrow gauge railroad, about 2 or 3 miles long, with a full equipment of cars and engines. The only question involved was whether the statute applied to a private railway.

Under the construction thus given, the statute, and as applied in the cases to which attention has been called, it is very clear that the danger to which the plaintiff in this case was subjected was not one of the hazards peculiar to the operation of a railway. It was such as is incidental to the management of all machinery, and the accident would have been as liable to occur had the steam shovel been operated by parties not in the employ of a railway company, in excavating for a canal, or for the foundation of a building. It was a hazard connected with the operation of a steam shovel, and the mere fact that the shovel belonged to a railway company, and was being operated by its employees, did not change its nature.

3. As the case does not come within the purview of § 2701, Gen. Stat. 1894, it is necessary to ascertain whether the plaintiff and the engineer, through whose negligence plaintiff was injured, were fellow servants. The claim that the engineer was a vice principal cannot be sustained. It is true that he was in charge of the crane, had power to hire and discharge men, and was in a position of authority over the men. But it can no longer be contended in this jurisdiction that mere superiority of rank creates the relation of vice principal. It is the established law of this state that it is not the rank of the employee nor his authority over other employees, but the nature of the duty or service that he performs, which determines whether he is a vice principal or a fellow servant. Labatt, Mast. & S. §§ 514 et seq.; Cooley, Torts, 2d ed. 640; 2 Jaggard, Torts, p. 1037; Dillon's article in 24 Am. L. Rev. 190. The law imposes upon the master certain absolute duties, and imperatively requires that he either perform them personally, or through some representative. If he chooses to delegate such duties to one of his employees, the delegate thus becomes his personal representative, and the master is responsible for the manner in which the duties are performed. As to this absolute duty, the obligation of the representative, whatever his rank as compared with other employees, stands in the place of the master; as to all other matters, he is a fellow servant of the other employees. He thus occupies a dual relation. To the extent to which the master's absolute duties are delegated to him he is a vice principal; where engaged with others in the common employment of the master he is a fellow servant. Lindvall v. Woods, 41 Minn. 212, 4 L. R. A. 793, 42 N. W. 1020; Perras v. A. Booth & Co. 82 Minn. 191, 84 N. W. 739, 85 N. W. 179; Brown v. Minneapolis & St. L. R. Co. 31 Minn. 553, 18 N. W. 834; Ell v. Northern P. R. Co. 1 N. D. 336, 12 L. R. A. 97, 26 Am. St. Rep. 621, 48 N. W. 222; Wood v. New Bedford Coal Co. 121 Mass. 252.

In this case it was the absolute duty of the railway company to use proper care to furnish its employees with a reasonably safe place to do the work of the master, and proper machinery and appliances with which to work; and, if the company had delegated the performance of this duty to the engineer, he would have been a vice principal in relation to such duties. But it is not charged that there was any failure in the discharge of such duties, as the negligence alleged is merely the improper handling of a part of the machinery in a particular instance. The swinging of a crane through the same course every time it is operated is the mere act of a workman, and not one of the absolute duties which the law imposes upon the master. It was the individual duty of the man who was placed in the position of engineer to do his work so as to avoid injury to his fellow workmen. If he failed to do this, and injury resulted thereby to another coemployee, it was the unfortunate result of the casual negligence of the fellow servant, and there can be no recovery of damages from the master.

For the purpose of this case, it must be presumed that the machinery was proper, and was being operated in a proper place. The negligence, therefore, was in the improper use by one servant of a proper instrumentality, for which the master is not liable to the servant. It was the duty of the engineer to control the operation and movements of the crane. It was the duty of the plaintiff to aid in moving and placing the track. One was as much an individual duty as the other. No orders were given, as far as the record shows, by the engineer to the plaintiff. Each was employed to do his differential share of the labor of the common employment for the accomplishment of the ultimate object of such employment.

The facts bring this case squarely within the rule as stated in Borgerson v. Cook Stone Co. 91 Minn. 91, 97 N. W. 734; "As to those who are engaged with others in a common employment or in the details of the work, the performance of such duties, though different in kind, requires them to be regarded as fellow servants."

The court, therefore, properly directed a verdict, and the order denying the motion for new trial is affirmed.

MORTIMER FALK et al., Respts.,
v.

AMERICAN WEST INDIES TRADING COMPANY, Appt.

(180 N. Y. 445.)

1. Trademark—assignment.

A trademark adopted to designate a brand of cigars of a particular manufacturer is not assignable separate from the good will of the business to which it was attached.

2. Same—infringement—suit by assignee.

A judgment for infringement in favor of a transferee of a trademark is not sustained by the evidence where there is nothing to show the transfer to him of anything but the naked trademark.

3. Appeal—presumption as to findings.

The court of appeals will not presume that any fact was found not embraced within the scope of the pleadings, the findings, as they appear in the record, and the proofs upon which the decision was made, for the purpose of upholding a judgment, although it was a short decision, unanimously affirmed.

4. Same—conclusion as to judgment—exception.

A general exception to a conclusion of law that plaintiff is entitled to judgment raises a question of law with respect to the right to maintain the action.

VII. Proof of sale, 727.

I. Introduction.

A large part of the trademark cases reported were brought into court, not by the original owners of the mark, but by purchasers, seeking relief against piracy. In many of these the right to sell the trademark is recognized, no question whatever being made of it; but it is only intended to take into this note cases in which the question of sale was actually up, in some form, or in which rights directly relating to or affected by the change of ownership were decided. A few others are included for illustrative purposes merely.

The distinction between trademarks and names, as defined in the cases, is not always easy to make out. This note, of course, does not cover sales of trade names, but a number of cases are referred to involving sales of names used like trademarks on goods or articles sent out to the trade. Indeed, many of such names are spoken of indifferently by the courts as trade names or trademarks. Hotel names are also treated of as quasi trademarks by the courts. Where cases dealing with the sale of names have been introduced, therefore, it is because they are actually called trademarks in the reports, or are so like trademarks that they might as well be considered as such.

II. Ownership.

It was once thought that a trademark could not be owned, and that one trader might copy the mark of another, if he liked, without fear of being stopped by an injunction. But as it is now so well settled that a trademark is property, which, with some exceptions, may pass from hand to hand, like the thing it signifies, it will only be necessary to refer to a few of the authorities on the nature of the rights to these business symbols, although bearing on the question whether they may be sold.

Lord Hardwicke, in 1742, said that every trader had some particular mark or stamp: that he did not know of any instance of granting an injunction to restrain one trader from using a mark of another, and that he thought it would be of mischievous consequence to do it. Blanchard v. Hill, 2 Atk. 484.

Courts of equity, however, were soon ready to help dealers save their marks from piracy, but extended their aid solely on the ground of the fraud, and not for the protection of a property right. In Perry v. Truefitt, 6 Beav. 66, it was held that the ground for relief against infringement of a trademark was fraud, and not property in the mark. The master of the rolls said it did not seem to him that a man could acquire a property merely in a name or mark.

In Croft v. Day, 7 Beav. 84, it was also held that the right to the protection of a trademark rested upon fraud, and did not depend upon the exclusive right which one might be supposed to have in a particular name.

In another early case it was said that there was no property in a trademark, but that a person might acquire such a right in respect to it as to say that nobody else should use it. Collins Co. v. Brown, 3 Jur. N. S. 929, 3 Kay & J. 423. To the same effect is Collins Co. v. Cowen, 3 Kay & J. 428; M'Andrew v. Bassett, 10 Jur. N. S. 492.

So, in an early American case it was held that an assignee of a trademark could prevent rivals from imitating it, not because he had any property in it, but for the reason that the mark was a sign or representation importing, and so understood and acted upon by the public, that the article to which it was attached was the manufacture or production which was generally known in the market under that designation. Walton v. Crowley, 3 Blatchf. 440, Fed. Cas. No. 17,133.

In Leather Cloth Co. v. American Leather Cloth Co. 1 Hem. & M. 271, Vice Chancellor Wood took the position that there was no property in a trademark, approving Perry v. Truefitt, 6 Beav. 66. The judgment was reversed in 10 Jur. N. S. 81. In regard to the nature of a trademark as property, the Lord Chancellor observed that it was correct to say there was no exclusive ownership of the symbols which constituted a trademark, apart from the use or application of them. But the word "trademark" was the designation of those marks or symbols when applied to a vendible commodity, and that the exclusive right to make such use or application was rightfully called property. The true principle, therefore, he said, would seem to be that the jurisdiction of the court in the protection given to trademarks rested upon property, and that the court interfered by injunction because that was the only mode by which property of this description could be effectually protected. The earlier English cases on the point were overruled by this decision.

In Millington v. Fox, 3 Myl. & C. 338, it was held that an injunction would lie for the infringement of a trademark, although no fraud was shown.

And it was said in Singer Mach. Mfg. Co. v. Wilson, L. R. 3 App. Cas. 376, that it had been settled since the decision in the case of Millington v. Fox, supra, that the right to the protection of a trademark did not rest upon the ground of fraud.

It is now settled that the jurisdiction of the court as to trademarks is not confined to cases of fraud, but extends to property. Wheeler v. Johnston, Ir. L. R. 3 Eq. 284.

And in Hall v. Barrows, 9 Jur. N. S. 483, it was held that the jurisdiction of equity in the protection of trademarks rested upon property, and not fraud.

In Skinner v. Oakes, 10 Mo. App. 45, the court, in discussing this subject, said: "The early English cases . . . in protecting trademarks proceed on the idea of fraud, and not on the idea of property. . . . But upon whatever idea the courts proceeded, as soon as their decisions established in a particular individual a right, exclusive as against the world, to use a particular label . . . whereby trade was attracted to him, that right at once became a thing of value, and hence property in a sense more strict than that in which many other incorporeal rights, such as the elective franchise or the right of presentation to a vacant benefice, have been regarded as property."

The law of trademarks is of recent origin, and may be comprehended in the proposition that a dealer has a property in his trademark. The ownership is allowed to him, that he may have the exclusive benefit of the reputation which his skill has given to articles made by him, and that no other person may be able to sell to the public, as his, that which is not his. Clark v. Clark, 25 Barb. 76.

The right to a trademark is derived from its appropriation and continual user, and becomes the property of those who first employ it and give it a name and reputation. Caswell v. Hazard, 121 N. Y. 484, 18 Am. St. Rep. 833, 24 N. E. 707, Affirming 50 Hun. 230, 2 N. Y. Supp. 783.

There is no doubt that property in trademarks has been recognized for a long time by the profession and by the courts; but it has only been within a comparatively short time that its importance has come to be fully understood. Dixon Crucible Co. v. Guggenheim, 7 Phila. 408.

The ownership of a trademark has, in general, been considered as a right of property, and equity will protect that right from infringement; proof of fraud is not required. Laughman's Appeal, 128 Pa. 1, 5 L. R. A. 599, 18 Atl. 415.

it was based upon and controlled by the same principles to which all property was subject, and had no laws special to itself; that it was personal property, and had all the incidents thereof; that it was acquired by certain exclusive appropriation, continued use, descent, or purchase, and might be relinquished by gift, sale, or abandonment.

III. Transferability.

a. Generally.

A trademark now being considered a species of property, it may be bought and sold like other property, within limits which are defined and treated of in following subdivisions of this note.

The right to a trademark may, in general, treating it as property or as an accessory of property, be sold and transferred on the sale and transfer of the manufactory of the goods to which the mark has been affixed, and may be lawfully used by the purchaser, Leather Cloth Co. v. American Leather Cloth Co. 35 L. J. Ch. N. S. 53, 11 H. L. Cas. 523, 13 Week. Rep. 873, 4 De G. J. & S. 137.

Upon the dissolution of a partnership, the good will and the trademark belonging to the business, and not personal in character, should form a part of the valuation, where it was provided that the surviving partner might purchase the business. Hall v. Barrows, 9 Jur. N. S. 483.

A trademark may be bought and sold in connection with the article produced, like other property. Morgan v. Rogers, 19 Fed. 596.

In Warren v. Warren Thread Co. 134 Mass. 247, it is said that whatever may be the law as to a trademark which is strictly personal, it is the settled law that the right to use a trademark in connection with the business in which it has been employed is property, which will be protected by the courts, and which may be sold and transferred.

So Skinner v. Oakes, 10 Mo. App. 45, held that it is settled law that the right to use 1 L.R.A. (N.S.) a trademark is not a mere personal privilege, but that, within certain limits, it is capable of being bought and sold as other property.

In Sohl v. Geisendorf, Wilson Super. Ct. (Ind.) 60, it was held that part of a trademark might be purchased, so that a party buying part of the mark, and adopting the balance, would be protected against infringement. The court stated that the authorities establish the proposition that a trademark may be devised and adopted by a party himself, or that he may acquire it by purchase from his predecessor; and that the courts would go as far to protect such a trademark as if the party devised and adopted it.

In Lockwood v. Bostwick, 2 Daly, 521, it was held that the title which a company had to the trademark "Boviline" passed to an assignee. The court said there was right of property in a trademark, which was capable of being transferred to another.

A trademark is a species of property which may be sold with the business in which it has been used. Huwer v. Dannenhoffer, 82 N. Y. 499.

Hazard v. Caswell, 93 N. Y. 259, 45 Am. Rep. 198, states that it seems to be clearly settled that a partnership trademark is an asset of the firm, salable on dissolution like any other asset.

A trademark can be owned, transferred, and sold like other species of property. Caswell v. Hazard, 121 N. Y. 484, 18 Am. St. Rep. 833, 24 N. E. 707, Affirming 50 Hun, 230, 2 N. Y. Supp. 783.

Upon the dissolution of a partnership which has acquired proprietorship of a trademark, the mark must be sold and its proceeds distributed like other firm assets; and if not so disposed of, it remains the property of the individual members of the dissolved firm. Ibid.

A partner does not lose the right to sell his own trademark because he has permitted the partnership to use it. Kidd v. Johnson, 100 U. S. 617, 25 L. ed. 769.

trademarks in common by two companies, operating under a pool arrangement, and the subsequent use of the marks under a second pool agreement with others, did not prevent the companies, on selling out their business, from passing to the purchaser the exclusive right to use the trademarks.

In Johnson v. Schenck, 1 Ohio L. J. 374, Fed. Cas. No. 7,412, it appeared that the owner of a distillery sold his plant, and at the same time "extended the right to the use" of certain trademarks to the purchaser. For some time prior to the sale the vendor had permitted a firm of which he was a member to use them. It was held that the contention that the trademark had become the property of the firm, and that the former owner was without power to transfer it individually, was not available, it appearing that the partnership had consented to the transfer.

But a mortgagor cannot sell the right to his trademarks and to make and sell his medicinal compounds after a mortgagee has taken possession under a mortgage covering the entire stock, assets, and effects of the mortgagor's business, although the trademarks are not mentioned. Morgan v. Rogers, 19 Fed. 596.

b. Sales in gross.

The decision in FALK v. AMERICAN WEST INDIES TRADING CO., that a trademark cannot be sold by itself, is in harmony with all of the authorities. Apart from the thing the mark stands for, it is of no value. As it has been well put,—the shadow cannot be separated from the substance. This the courts have always held whenever the question has been up.

In Hall v. Barrows, 10 Jur. N. S. 55, the Lord Chancellor, in deciding that a trademark belonging to a partnership could be sold with the partnership business, stated that he did not want it understood, by what he had said, that the business might be sold in one lot, and that the right to use the trademark might be sold as a separate lot, and that one lot might be sold and 1 L.R.A. (N.S.) transferred to one person and the other lot sold and transferred to another.

In Corwin v. Daly, 7 Bosw. 222, it was said by Robertson, J., that it was doubtful if the right of using a mere trademark by itself could be transferred like a copyright.

In Cotton v. Gillard, 44 L. J. Ch. N. S. 90, it was held that a trademark which had been employed in connection with the sale of a certain sauce could not be bought from an assignee not having the receipt for making the sauce, so as to give the purchaser the right to use it on another sauce.

A trademark cannot be sold as an abstract thing, apart from the business in which it is used. McVeagh v. Valencia Cigar Factory, 32 Pat. Off. Gaz. 1124. The court said that the question seemed to be free from all doubt; that no case could be found which supported the proposition that a bare trademark, aside from the property with which it was used, could be assigned and sold and a good title given to it; that the philosophy underlying the history of the law in connection with trademarks, and the final absolute recognition of trademark property, forbade the conclusion that anything of that kind could obtain.

In Royal Baking Powder Co. v. Raymond, 70 Fed. 376, Affirmed in 29 C. C. A. 245, 55 U. S. App. 575, 85 Fed. 231, the court even went so far as to say that a trademark could not exist apart from the good will, so that the original owner might himself cease to have the right to use it if the good will of the business had ceased to be of any value.

But where the seller undertakes to transfer the trademark alone, but the purchaser in fact takes the business, and develops it, and does no wrong to his vendor, he has a right to use the mark, sufficient to stop its infringement by a third person. Ibid.

The right to the exclusive use of a word or symbol as a trademark is inseparable from the right to make or sell the commodity which the mark has been appropriated to designate. Atlantic Mill. Co. v. Robinson, 20 Fed. 217.

In R. Heinisch's Sons Co. v. Boker, 86

N. Y. Supp. 1039; Atty. Gen. v. Continental L. Ins. Co. 64 How. Pr. 93; Re Buffalo Ice Co. 37 App. Div. 144, 55 N. Y. Supp. 783.

The courts below committed no error in assuming that plaintiffs had obtained a valid title to the "El Falcon" trademark.

Browne, Trademarks, 2d ed. p. 61; Paul, Trademarks, p. 162; Huwer v. Dannenhoffer, 82 N. Y. 499.

O'Brien, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiffs have recovered a judgment against the defendant, enjoining it from the use of a trademark claimed to be their property, and for damages in the sum of $10,000 for infringement and the wrongful use by the defendant of the trademark in question. It appears from the pleadings

Fed. 765, where the real purpose of a contract appeared to be nothing more than the sale of a person's name as a trademark, and it did not appear that the seller put any money into the business, or undertook any supervision of it, or exercised any skill in the manufacture of the goods with which it was used, it was held that the purchaser could not use the name to the injury of another, who had previously bought the right to use it, together with the business of which it was a part.

There is no such right of property in a trademark alone as to enable its owner to sell it, and clothe the purchaser with the exclusive right to its use at another place and in another business of the same character, but having no connection with the business in which the mark was first employed. Bulte v. Igleheart Bros. 137 Fed. 492.

A trademark cannot be conveyed in gross by independent transfer, without also conveying the business to which it attaches. The Fair v. Jose Morales & Co. 82 Ill. App. 499.

The mere sale of a trademark, apart from the article to which it is affixed, confers no right of ownership, because no one can claim to sell his goods as goods manufactured by another. Witthaus v. Braun, 44 Md. 303, 22 Am. Rep. 44.

In Chadwick v. Covell, 151 Mass. 190, 6 L. R. A. 839, 21 Am. St. Rep. 442, 23 N. E. 1068, the court, in holding that the donee of a trademark in gross could not stop another person from using it, said that the plaintiff could not prevail unless it should be held that a trademark might be erected into a new species of property, capable of lasting as long as the world did and certain goods were manufactured, and of being transferred for value or by gift from person to person, irrespective of good will, special right to make the goods, place of manufacture, or fraud upon the public.

In Covell v. Chadwick, 153 Mass. 263, 25 Am. St. Rep. 625, 26 N. E. 856, it was held that the vendee of patent medicine formulas and trademarks could not prevent the sale of the medicines and use of the marks by 1 L.R.A. (N.S.) and findings of the trial court that about the year 1871 a partnership firm known as Lichtenstein Bros. & Co. engaged in the manufacture and sale of cigars, adopted and made use of the words "El Falcon" as a trademark to designate a particular brand of cigars. This firm afterwards, and about the year 1886, was merged in a corporation of the same name, which took over the assets of the firm and succeeded to the good will of the business. The corporation continued in the business of manufacturing and selling cigars, and in the use of the trademark, until the 31st of October, 1898, when it went out of business. On that day it executed and delivered to the plaintiffs an instrument in writing which purported to assign and set over to them the trademark in question, with the labels and devices that had been the donee of the same. So far as it appeared, the court said, the business in which the trademarks were used by the owner of them had been wound up several years before the plaintiff acquired his title, and the plaintiff did not buy a business or anything else which carried with it property in a trademark.

Williams v. Farrand, 88 Mich. 473, 14 L. R. A. 161, 50 N. W. 446, states that courts have uniformly held that a trademark has no separate existence; that there is no property in words, as detached from the thing to which they are applied.

In order that a trademark may be obtained from him who first has it, the right either to make or sell the merchandise to which the mark has been attached must also pass. Congress & E. Spring Co. v. High Rock Congress Spring Co. 45 N. Y. 291, 6 Am. Rep. 82, Reversing 57 Barb. 526.

There is no such thing as a trademark in "gross," to use that term by analogy. It must be "appendant" to some particular business, in which it is actually used upon or in regard to specific articles. Weston v. Ketcham, 51 How. Pr. 455.

In Baldwin v. Von Micheroux, 5 Misc. 386, 25 N. Y. Supp. 857, it was held that trademarks which went with certain secret compounds could not be sold in gross. The court said that they would not only be useless to a purchaser, but could not constitute property in themselves, or separated from the manufactured articles with which they were connected. To sell the secret process would be to destroy the business at once; and to permit the trademarks to be used in connection with any other substance would be to perpetrate a fraud upon the public. They were only valuable to the owners as affixed to goods manufactured by such process, and the exclusive right to them existed for that reason alone; therefore they could not be sold as mere names or devices or symbols. The decision was affirmed in 83 Hun, 43, 31 N. Y. Supp. 696.

A trademark cannot be assigned in gross, nor can it be used, except in connection with the manufacture or sale of the article it used with the same. The plaintiffs thereupon, assuming to have succeeded to all the rights of their assignor, continued the use of the trademark at their manufactory at Key West, in Florida. The defendant is a New Jersey corporation, but engaged in the manufacture and sale of cigars at Caguas, Porto Rico, with an office in New York. It appears that the manager of the corporation at that place, whose name is Gregorio Lopez y Falco, adopted his own name as a trademark for a brand of cigars that are now known in the trade as "El Falco." There is no similarity at all between the labels on the two trademarks, but there is a similarity in the names. No fraud, however, is alleged or claimed, and no fraud or intent to deceive the public was found by the learned trial court. The judgment in this case is to the effect that the trademark so adopted by the defendant is an infringement upon the rights of the plaintiffs, and hence the injunction and award of damages.

The controlling question in this case is with respect to the plaintiffs' title, or exclusive right to the use of the trademark, for an infringement of which they procured the injunction and recovered the damages. It does not appear, and it is not claimed, that anything was assigned to the plaintiffs except the naked right to use the trademarks and labels. No business or good will was transferred to the plaintiffs by the instrument, and they did not succeed, by operation of law or otherwise, to the business has served to identify. Prince Mfg. Co. v. Prince's Metallic Paint Co. 20 N. Y. Supp. 462. "It may be stated as a general principle," said the court, "that the trademark cannot be severed from the good will. . . . While the property right may pass by assignment or operation of law, it must be to one who takes, at the same time, the right to manufacture or sell the particular merchandise to which the trademark has been attached."

In Wiltberger v. Walker, 8 Ohio Dec. Reprint, 588, it was said by Force, J., in reference to how far a name used as a trademark might be transferred, that one thing was clear: That a manufacturer could not transfer to another the right to use his name as a trademark without transferring the business too; that Thomas Brown, if engaged in the business of making blankets called Thomas Brown blankets, could not continue the making of the Thomas Brown blanket in his own place, and at the same time sell to somebody else, in some other place, the right to apply that term to blankets which he might be manufacturing there; but that if he transferred his entire business and good will to a successor, especially to a successor who continued the business in the same place, the exclusive right to use the trademark passed with the business to such successor.

Property in a trademark as a mere abstract right, having no reference to any particular person or thing, cannot exist, and so cannot pass by assignment. Dixon Crucible Co. v. Guggenheim, 2 Brewst. (Pa.) 321, 7 Phila. 408.

Property in a trademark cannot be acquired or retained independently of the article which it symbolizes. Gear v. Kenyon, 10 Haw. 162.

A trademark is assignable only in connection with the good will of the business, generally or specifically, in which it has been used. Gegg v. Bassett, 3 Ont. L. Rep. 263.

But the good will of a business and trademarks, which are incidents of the business, and not of the place of business or plant, with the right to use the latter in the manufacture or sale, as the case may be, of the merchandise to which they have been attached, may be sold separately from the plant or property, and also from the book debts. Tennant v. Dunlop, 97 Va. 235, 33 S. E. 620.

c. Of marks denoting place or product of manufacture.

In what follows in this note, it may be assumed, if a sale of a trademark alone is mentioned, that a sale in gross is not meant.

If a trademark simply stands for the product of a particular business, or indicates that the article to which it is attached is made in or comes from a certain locality, it may be bought and sold. It is only where the use of the mark by the purchaser would amount to a fraud or deception upon the public, as in the case of sales in gross, that it is not allowed to pass from hand to hand, when sold with the business or thing with which it goes.

Trademarks are commonly of one or the other of two descriptions: Either they denote the spot where certain articles are manufactured, or they denote the person by whom they are manufactured. There is a distinction with reference to the right to sell and transfer trademarks, between the marks which denote the place where the goods are manufactured, and nothing more, and those which denote the person who manufactured them, and nothing more. The mark or brand which denotes goods manufactured at a particular place may be sold with the works themselves, and the mark would be, as it were, attached to the spot, to denote where it was first adopted, and which might possess peculiar local advantages for the manufacture of the article. Hall v. Barrows, 9 Jur. N. S. 483.

The owner of a trademark used with the products of a distillery located in a certain place may lawfully transfer the right to use the mark, upon the sale of the distillery and business. Kidd v. Johnson, 100 U. S. 617, 25 L. ed. 769.

In Petrolia Mfg. Co. v. Bell & B. Soap Co. 97 Fed. 781, it was held that the inven-

in which the trademark had been used and to which it was attached. They were simply authorized to use the trademark in their own business, established at another place. The use of the trademark by the plaintiffs denoted to the public that they were making and selling the Lichtenstien cigar, and that it was not applied to a cigar manufactured by other parties at any other place. The question is whether, under these circumstances, the plaintiffs had any right to maintain this action. A trademark is not a piece of property that passes from hand to hand by assignment, separate from the business of the owner of the trademark, or of the article which it may serve to distinguish. Generally, it passes only with the business and good will of which it is an inseparable part. The rule in this respect is well stated in a recent work of great merit on that branch of the law with which we are now concerned: "As a mere abstract right, having no reference to any particular person or property, a trademark cannot pass by assignment or descend to a man's legal representatives. The reason for this is that, as an abstract right, apart from the business in which it is used, a trademark has no existence. To permit a trademark to be transferred apart from the business in which it is used would be productive of fraud upon the public. . . . The mere sale of a trademark apart from the article to which it is affixed confers no right of ownership, because no one can claim the right to sell his goods as goods manufactured of the trademark "Coal Oil Johnny Soap" could sell it to a corporation formed for the purpose of manufacturing and dealing in the soap.

And in Glen & H. Mfg. Co. v. Hall, 61 N. Y. 226, 19 Am. Rep. 278, it was held that the right to use the words "No. 10" in connection with a business passed to the purchaser from the executors of the former owner. Reversing 6 Lans. 158.

A trademark affixed to articles manufactured at a particular place may be lawfully sold and transferred with the establishment. Dant v. Head, 90 Ky. 255, 29 Am. St. Rep. 369, 13 S. W. 1073.

J. G. Mattingly Co. v. Mattingly, 96 Ky. 430, 27 S. W. 985, states that the fact that a trademark or trade name affixed to an article manufactured at a particular place may be lawfully sold and transferred with the establishment is no longer an open question in Kentucky. Its subsequent use by the person to whom the establishment is transferred is considered as only indicating that the goods to which it is affixed are manufactured at the same place, and are of the same character, as those to which the mark was attached by the original designer.

When a trademark designates the place where and the person by whom the goods are made, the right to such mark passes to the purchaser upon the sale and transfer of the business and manufactory at which the goods are made. Witthaus v. Braun, 44 Md. 303, 22 Am. Rep. 44.

The trademarks used to distinguish and specially denote the product or manufacture of an established business are property, subject to sale. Wilmer v. Thomas, 74 Md. 485, 13 L. R. A. 380, 22 Atl. 403.

The owner of a trademark not personal in character cannot restrain his assignee in insolvency from selling it. Warren v. Warren Thead Co. 134 Mass. 247.

d. Of marks denoting personal skill.

But if a trademark stands for the honesty, reputation, or skill of its owner, it cannot be sold. All the cases so hold. 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

If a trademark is a personal one, designating a particular person and his reputation or skill, it cannot truthfully be used by any other person, and consequently cannot be assigned. Mayer v. Flanagan, 12 Tex. Civ. App. 405, 34 S. W. 785.

Where the reputation of the goods and of the name has grown out of the excellence of manufacture, depending on the honesty and skill of the maker, it is more difficult to hold that a trademark can be sold to a stranger, or that it is generally assignable. Carmichel v. Latimer, 11 R. I. 395, 23 Am. Rep. 481; Coddington, Trademarks, 51.

In Messer v. The Fadettes, 168 Mass., 140, 37 L. R. A. 721, 60 Am. St. Rep. 371, 46 N. E. 407, it was held that the trademark of an orchestra, depending for its value upon the personal skill of the organizer and leader of the organization, could not be sold and assigned.

e. Of names as trademarks.

A trademark bearing the name of a person may be sold if it has become a mere sign of quality, and has ceased to mean that any particular person is the maker of the article with which it goes. In other words, it is the same old question as to whether its use by the purchaser would deceive consumers. It is harder to answer in the case of the employment of personal names as trademarks, because of the difficulty in determining when they have ceased to be personal. Other names used as trademarks go by the same rule.

How far a trademark is capable of sale if it bears the name of a person is hard to say. "We think that the answer to this question," says the court in Skinner v. Oakes, 10 Mo. App. 45, "depends upon the effect which the use of the name in each particular instance is shown to have upon the minds of the public. If it leads the public to believe that the particular goods are, in fact, made by the person whose name is thus stamped upon them, or in whose name they are advertised, whereas they are, in fact, made by another person, then such a use of the name will not be protected by tured by another." Paul, Trademarks, §§ 116, 117, 144. The learned author, in the notes to the three sections referred to, has collected the leading cases on the subject, and it will be seen, upon an examination of those authorities, that they amply support the propositions contained in the text. Some of the cases thus referred to, and in which the principle was discussed, are the following: Kidd v. Johnson, 100 U. S. 617, 25 L. ed. 769; Macmahon Pharmacal Co. v. Denver Chemical Mfg. Co. 51 C. C. A. 302, 113 Fed. 468; Leather Cloth Co. v. American Leather Cloth Co. 11 H. L. Cas. 523, 534, 544; Williams v. Farrand, 88 Mich. 473, 480, 14 L. R. A. 161, 50 N. W. 446; Dixon Crucible Co. v. Guggenheim, 2 Brewst. (Pa.) 321, 339; Witthaus v. Braun, 44 Md.

303, 22 Am. Rep. 44; Skipper v. Oakes, 10 Mo. App. 45, 59; Weener v. Brayton, 152 Mass. 101, 103, 8 L. R. A. 640, 25 N. E. 46; The Fair v. Jose Morales, & Co. 82 Ill. App. 499; Messer v. The Fadettes, 168 Mass. 140, 37 L. R. A. 721, 60 Am. St. Rep. 371, 46 N. E. 407; Weston v. Ketcham, 51 How. Pr. 455; Cotton v. Gillard, 44 L. J. Ch. N. S. 90; Wood v. Lambert, L. R. 32 Ch. Div. 247.

There is no allegation, proof, or finding in this case that the plaintiffs, upon the execution of the writing referred to, or at any other time, succeeded in any way to the business of the assignor or any part of it, or to the good will to which, up to that time, the trademark had been attached. It was, as already suggested, simply a written transfer of the naked trade-the courts; for to do so would be to protect the perpetration of a fraud upon the public. Thus, if an author were to assign to another the privilege of publishing books with his name upon their title-page, or if a painter were to sell to another the privilege of placing the former's signature on pictures painted by the latter, it cannot for a moment be supposed that any court would protect such a supposed right, even as against the original assignor. This point is absolutely clear, both upon principle and authority."

In Hall v. Barrows, 9 Jur. N. S. 483, it was held that a trademark, although originally bearing the name of the first maker of the goods to which it was attached, might, in time, become a mere trademark or sign of quality, and cease to denote or to be current as indicating that any particular person was the maker. In such a case the trademark might be sold with the business in which it was used.

In Bury v. Bedford, 10 Jur. N. S. 503, it was held that a trademark bearing the initials of a former owner had, by being used by a partnership of which he was a member, become so impersonal in character as to be capable of assignment. The court said that whether a trademark was transferable depended much upon the nature of the mark and the mode in which it had been used; that it was evident that a mark, although it might in some respects indicate the person by whom the goods had been manufactured, might refer more closely to the place of manufacture than to the person of the manufacturer; and that it was not less evident that a mark, although personal in its inception, might, from the mode in which it had been used, become appropriated to goods manufactured at a particular works.

The exclusive right to use a name as the distinctive part of a trademark may be sold, together with the right to manufacture and sell the article to which it is attached, and which is made according to the original formula. Filkins v. Blackman, 13 Blatchf. 440, Fed. Cas. No. 4786.

In Oakes v. Tonsmierre, 4 Woods, 547, 49 Fed. 447, it was held that a trademark bearing the name of one partner in a candy business might be sold, where the name was used merely because easy to pronounce and remember, and not to indicate that candies were made under the supervision of that member of the firm.

A man may so sell the right to use his name as a trademark as to take from himself the right to use it on articles of his own manufacture. Probasco v. Bouyon, 1 Mo. App. 241.

A manufacturer who has sold an article of his make in such a way as to identify it with a trademark bearing his name may sell such mark, and conclude himself from its future use. Frazer v. Frazer Lubricator Co. 15 Ill. App. 450, Affirmed in 121 Ill. 147, 2 Am. St. Rep. 73, 13 N. E. 639.

In Mattingly v. Stone, 12 Ky. L. Rep. 72, 12 S. W. 467, 14 S. W. 47, in an action to recover a balance on the contract, it was assumed that a vendor could sell the use of his name as a brand for whisky to a corporation for a certain amount of stock and a royalty, or in consideration of the transfer of certain distilleries, one of which he was to manage at a stated compensation.

A trademark bearing the name and initials of its owner may be sold by him so as to prevent him from using them to the harm of the purchaser, whatever may be the rights of the purchaser as against third parties not affected by the contract. Symonds v. Jones, 82 Me. 302, 8 L. R. A. 570, 17 Am. St. Rep. 485, 19 Atl. 820.

It was said in Sohier v. Johnson, 111 Mass. 238, that a trademark consisting of a firm name was a valuable property, which could be disposed of in connection with the business.

A trademark made up of the initials of the owner, and used with cigars manufactured for him by another, is subject to sale. Frank v. Sleeper, 150 Mass. 583, 23 N. E. 213.

One who has carried on a business under a trade name, and sold a particular article in such a manner, by the use of his name as a trademark or trade name, as to cause the business or article to become known or established in form under such name, may mark and labels, detached from the business in which it had been theretofore used, and, when used by the plaintiffs, no longer denoted or distinguished the article or business to which it had been attached. We do not say that the principle above suggested would apply to an assignment of all trademarks made in a similar way. There are doubtless some trademarks that consist of words that identify an article produced by some secret process, and without the use of which the article could not be described. In other words, the name used may be inherent in the article itself, and is not used, as in this case, to distinguish one cigar from another. The celebrated cordial, which is in use the world over, known as "Chartreuse," is a sample of a trademark, sell or assign such trade name or trademark when he sells the business or manufacture, and, by such sale or assignment, conclude himself from the further use of it in a similar way. Russia Cement Co. v. Le Page, 147 Mass. 206, 9 Am. St. Rep. 685, 17 N. E. 304.

It is in accordance with the principles of law, and with justice to the community, that any trademark including a surname may be sold with the business or the establishment to which it is incident; because, while it may be that individual efforts give it its value at the outset, yet, afterwards, this is ordinarily made permanent as a part of the entire organization, or as appurtenant to the locality in which the business is established, and thenceforth depends less on the individual efforts of the originator than on the combined result of all which he created. Le Page Co. v. Russia Cement Co. 17 L. R. A. 354, 2 C. C. A. 555, 5 U. S. App. 112, 51 Fed. 941.

In Noera v. H. A. Williams Mfg Co. 158 Mass. 110, 32 N. E. 1037, it was held that a trademark consisting of the surname of one of the members of a partnership could be sold, and that the buyer could have a bill in equity to stop its infringement.

Chas. S. Higgins Co. v. Higgins Soap Co. 144 N. Y. 402, 27 L. R. A. 42, 43 Am. St. Rep. 769, 39 N. E. 490, states that it is well settled that the exclusive right in a name in which a business has been carried on, which is in the nature of a right to a trademark, may be sold or assigned.

In Burkhardt v. A. E. Burkhardt Fur & Hat Co. 4 Ohio N. P. 358, it was held that a trademark bearing the name of its originator passed to the purchaser of a hat and fur business, at both private and judicial sale.

The name of a person is, for certain purposes, of commercial value. If he estimates that value by dollars, and sells it to be used as a trademark, to the extent and for the purposes for which he sells it, he has no right to use it. Aver v. Hall, 3 Brewst. (Pa.) 509, 8 Phila. 231.

In Pittsburgh Brass Co. v. Adler, 2 Monaghan (Pa.) 235, it was held that the pur-the bare assignment of which might confer upon the assignee the right to manufacture and sell that article. Other examples might be cited that would not come within the rule above suggested, but in the case at bar the trademark was originally adopted by the Lichensteins to distinguish a cigar manufactured by themselves. The trademark in their hands represented their own article, their own skill and business experience. When used by the plaintiffs in their business it does not truly denote anything of the kind, and the plaintiffs' claim really is that they have acquired the right to sell their own goods as the goods of someone else.

We do not, upon this appeal, assume to deal with any of the proceedings, which ap-chaser of all of the interest of an inventor in his patents for a metal fender obtained, as against him, the sole right to use the seller's name as a trademark in connection with metal fenders.

But an assignee in bankruptcy cannot sell a trademark bearing the name of the bankrupt as its distinguishing feature, as the right of a man to use his own knowledge and name cannot be taken from him in any judicial proceeding whatever. Helmhold v. Helmhold Mfg. Co. 53 How. Pr. 453. It was said, however, in the same case, that a man might, by voluntary sale, transfer the right to such a use of his name.

The fact that a registered trademark bears the name and portrait of its original owner does not make it unassignable to a corporation which buys the right to make and sell a medicine in connection with which the mark is used. Dr. S. A. Richmond Nervine Co. v. Richmond, 159 U. S. 293, 40 L. ed. 155, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 30.

A trademark made up of the words "Samaritan Nervine" and "New Style," and bearing the name of the inventor of a medicine, may be sold by him. Ibid.

A retiring partner may sell out his interest in a trademark made up of the words "Twin Brothers Yeast," and bearing the portraits of the original owners of the business and mark. Burton v. Stratton, 12 Fed. 696.

In Julian v. Hoosier Drill Co. 78 Ind. 408, it was held that the trademark "Hoosier" could be sold in connection with certain patented rights and the right to make and sell certain drills.

And in Wiltberger v. Walker, 8 Ohio Dec. Reprint, 588, it was held that the trademark "Barlow's Indigo Blue" was assignable.

And in Fulton v. Sellers, 4 Brewst. (Pa.) 42, it was held that upon the sale of all the vendor's interest in an article known as "J. M. Lindsay's Improved Blood Searcher," together with the right to use his name and all his interests so far as necessary to the successful and perfect preparation of the article for the market, whatever property the vendor had in the name which pear at great length in the record, and resulted in the ascertainment of damages as upon an accounting. The proofs on that branch of the case were taken before a referee, upon whose report the court finally acted. The only question with which we are concerned upon this appeal is the question which was raised upon the trial of the issues made by the pleadings before the court. That trial resulted in a decision which contains findings of fact and conclusions of law in the short form. The conclusion of law, which was to the effect that the plaintiffs were entitled to judgment, was excepted to by the defendant's counsel. This exception raises the question in this court whether the conclusion of law upon which the judgment is based is sustained by the findings of fact, and, since it does not appear from the findings that there was a transfer to the plaintiffs of anything but the naked trademark, these facts do not sustain the judgment. The complaint does not state that anything was transferred to the plaintiffs except the naked trademark. The findings are no broader than the complaint, and the proofs in the case, including the written assignment, are entirely silent on that point. Hence, although this was a short decision, unanimously affirmed, we cannot presume that any fact was found not embraced within the scope of the pleadings, the findings as they appear in the record, and the proofs upon which the decision was made. So the general exception raises the question of law with respect to the plaintiffs' right to maintain the action.

The judgment should be reversed and a new trial granted, with costs to abide the event.

was used as a trademark passed to the vendee.

And the right to sell the name "Rogers Bros." as part of a trademark is recognized in International Silver Co. v. Simeon L. & George H. Rogers Co. 110 Fed. 956.

And in McLean v. Fleming, 96 U. S. 250, 24 L. ed. 830, the right to sell a trademark containing the words "Dr. McLean's Universal Pills" was impliedly recognized. The plaintiff, who had become possessed of the trademark through various purchases, was held entitled to an injunction against an infringer. The question whether the mark was transferable, however, was not directly raised.

In an unreported case it appeared that the proprietor of a hotel known as "Woods Hotel" sold it and the right to use the name. While in the hands of the purchaser, the hotel burned down, and the original owner bought back the right to use the name, and set up the hotel in another place. It was held that the trademark was assignable, or, at least, that it could be assigned for the purpose of being used on the premises where it had previously been employed; that whatever value there was in the trademark was the plaintiff's property. Woods v. Sands, Coddington. Trademarks, 51.

f. Under special statutes.

What statutes there are upon the transferability of a trademark provide that a registered mark may be assigned. Some of the statutes limit the assignability somewhat, as will appear in what follows on this point. Registration of the assignment is also provided for, but does not seem to be vital to change of ownership.

In England a trademark, when registered, may be assigned and transmitted only in connection with the good will of the business. L.R.A. (N.S.)

ness concerned in the particular goods or classes of goods for which it has been registered, and is determinable with that good will. § 70. of the patents, designs, and trademark act of 1883.

Under this act, it would seem that the seller of the good will and the business of manufacturing antifriction metal could not pass to the purchaser the right to use a trademark registered in connection with the manufacture and sale of antifriction metal bearings; but it was held that where the seller of the metal had been engaged, indirectly, through an agent, in the business of marketing the metal bearings, the right to use the trademark could be transferred. Re Magnolia Metal Co. [1897] 2 Ch. 371.

Where a trademark was registered under § 70 of the trademark act of 1883 in the name of an agent instead of the owner, it was held that it might be assigned to the owner, as this would be an assignment in connection with the good will, within the meaning of the act. It was said by the court that it would be too narrow a construction of the section to read it as if the assignment of the trademarks must be contemporaneous with the assignment of the good will. It was held that an assignment could be made without the good will, because the good will of the business had always been vested in the person applying for relief. Re Wellcome, L. R. 32 Ch. Div. 213.

In Re Farina, 44 L. T. N. S. 99, where a trademark was registered, by mistake, in the name of the senior member of a firm as sole proprietor, it was suggested by the master of the rolls that, after the death of the senior member, the good will belonging to the firm, an administrator should be appointed in order that an assignment of the trademark might be made to the firm.

Under the trademark act of 1875, which contained a similar provision in relation to the assignment of a trademark, it was held that where the manager of a firm had wrongfully registered a trademark in his own name, the entry would be expunged from the register, leaving the firm to make a new application in the usual way, to register their trademark. The master of the rolls said that he could not direct the assignment of the mark without the assignment of the good will of the business. Ex parte Lawrence, 44 L. T. N. S. 98.

By § 66 of the English trademark act of 1883, a series of trademarks is assignable and transferable only as a whole.

In California any person may secure the exclusive right to the use of a trademark or name by filing with the secretary of state his claim to the same, and otherwise complying with § 3197 of the Political Code; and when the claimant has thus secured a trademark or name, he may transfer the same and the right to the exclusive use thereof to another, and the property right so transferred will be protected from infringement by injunction. Pol. Code, § 3199. Spieker v. Lash, 102 Cal. 38, 36 Pac. 362.

Section 655 of the Civil Code of California, § 3267 of the Code of North Dakota, and § 183 of the Civil Code of South Dakota, all provide that there may be property in a trademark.

Section 4902 of the General Statutes of Connecticut provides that the exclusive right to a registered trademark shall be assignable, but that all assignments shall be good only against the assignor and his personal representatives, until lodged for record in the office of the secretary of state. Maine has a similar provision. Gen. Laws, chap. 40, § 24.

In Smith v. Fair, 14 Ont. Rep. 729, where an assignee of a trademark of an American firm had it registered in Canada, it was urged that the assignment was of no effect, as there could not be a trademark in gross, and that it could not be assigned independently of the good will. The court pointed out that there was no provision in the Canadian act of 1879, 42 Vict. chap. 22 (D) like that of § 70 of the English act of 1883, providing that a registered trademark could only be assigned and transmitted in connection with the good will of the business concerned in the particular case for which it had been registered; and that the Canadian statute provided, generally, that every registered trademark should be assignable in law, and that an assignment might be registered, but that there was no mention of the good will. "It may readily be granted," said the court, "that it cannot exist in gross, not attached to specific articles, and that by a sale of the good will of a business a trademark would pass."

It was held that as the trademark had been used extensively by the former owners, it was no longer in gross, but was attached to their manufactures, which they might at any moment import into Canada, and that the assignment of the right to use the mark in Canada was, in truth, assignment of the good will of the Canadian trade.

In White v. Schlect, 14 Phila. 88, a special injunction was dissolved on the ground that the only claim to title made by the complainant was an assignment of a registered trademark under an unconstitutional law.

IV. Method of transfer.

a. By sale of business or article with which mark is used.

As a usual thing the title to an assignable trademark will pass without express mention to the purchaser of the business in which it is used, or with the right to make and market the thing to which it is affixed. This is especially so if the good will of the business is included in the bill of sale, or if it is the plain intention to transfer title to the mark. So one partner buying out another will get the firm trademarks by operation of law. If a trademark denotes that an article is produced at a particular place, it may pass upon the sale of real estate, without mention of the business or good will. It has been held, however, that the mere sale of a business and its assets will not pass the exclusive right to a trademark bearing a personal name. The other cases mentioned under this head, in which it was held that the trademarks did not pass by operation of law, do not in any way shake the authority of the general rule.

It was held in Dixon Crucible Co. v. Guggenheim, 7 Phila. 408, that the true rule to be deduced from the cases would appear to be this: That the property or right to a trademark may pass, upon an assignment or by operation of law, to anyone who takes at the same time the right to manufacture or sell the particular merchandise to which the mark has been attached.

In Thompson v. Mackinnon, 21 Lower Can. Jur. 335, it was held that on the sale of the business of a biscuit maker, with the good will and all advantages pertaining to the name and business, the exclusive title to the business trademark passed to the buyer, although not expressly mentioned. The court said that all of the authorities—French, English, and American—agreed that, where a business was sold, the entire good will and right to use a trademark passed to the purchaser, without any express mention being made of them in the deed of assignment.

In Shipwright v. Clements, 19 Week. Rep. 599, it was held that, one partner buying out another's interest in a perfumery business obtained title to the trademark "Zingari Bouquet" as against the seller, although there was no mention of the good will or trademark. The court said that, in the sale of a business, a trademark passed, whether specifically mentioned or not.

The sale by one partner to another of all the former's interest in the business includes the right to the exclusive use of a firm trademark. Blackwell v. Dibrell, 3 Hughes, 151, Fed. Cas. No. 1,475.

The right to use a trademark consisting merely of the name of a famous distillery, and indicating that a favorite brand of whisky was made there, will pass to the purchaser of the distillery upon a sale in bankruptcy, so that the name may be used in connection with whisky produced at the same place. Pepper v. Labrot, 8 Fed. 29.

In Martha Washington Creamery Buttered Flour Co. v. Martien, 37 Fed. 797, it was held that the purchaser of machinery from its inventor for the purpose of making a certain brand of flour had the right to sell the flour under the trademark adopted by such inventor. It was held that the privilege extended to everyone who acquired the right to make and sell the flour covered by the invention.

In Atlantic Mill. Co. v. Robinson, 20 Fed. 217, it was held that the right to use the trademark "Champion," designating the flour of a certain mill, passed to successive purchasers of the mill property and business as an accessory thereof, without any agreement respecting the trademark.

In Batcheller v. Thomson, 86 Fed. 630, it appeared that a trademark bearing the name of an English manufacturer had been used for a number of years in the United States, where it had come to signify the goods of a New York firm of which the English manufacturer was a member. The same trademark was used in England by the owners in the sale of his goods there, but it was not clear in which country it had first been used. It was held that, upon the sale of the New York business, the right to use the trademark in the United States passed with it, even as against the English manufacturer. The case was reversed in 35 C. C. A. 532, 93 Fed. 660, but on the ground that the evidence showed the trademark to have originated abroad, and that the New York firm never had anything more than a license to use it.

Where it is the plain intention in the sale of a business to a corporation, to pass title to the trademark, equitable relief against infringement by a third party will not be refused because no formal transfer was made of the right. Solis Cigar Co. v. Pozo, 16 Colo. 388, 25 Am. St. Rep. 279, 26 Pac. 556.

The transfer of the property and effects of a business carries with it the exclusive right to use such trademarks or trade names as have been used in the business. A corporation organized to carry on the business of a partnership, and composed of the same persons, acquires, with the transfer of the business, the right to the use of a trade name or mark used in the business, although not formally transferred. Allegretti v. Allegretti Chocolate Cream Co. 177 Ill. 129, 52 N. E. 487, 76 Ill. App. 581.

In Wilmer v. Thomas, 74 Md. 485, 13 L. R. A. 380, 22 Atl. 403, it was held that an insolvent manufacturing company's trademark, consisting of the words "Druid Mills," would pass to the purchaser at an assignee's sale of the plant, under assignment transferring all of the company's property, and 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

under an advertisement describing the property as the old established mills known as "Druid Mills."

A sale by one partner to another of all of his interest in the entire assets of the firm includes trademarks bearing the names and initials of the seller, although not mentioned. Hoxie v. Chaney, 143 Mass. 522, 58 Am. Rep. 149, 10 N. E. 713.

An assignment of all of the stock, property, and effects of a business, or the exclusive right to manufacture a given article, carries with it the sole right to such trademarks as have been used in the business. These incidents attach to the business or right of manufacture, and pass with it. Williams v. Farrand, 88 Mich. 473, 14 L. R. A. 161, 50 N. W. 446.

In Mattingly v. Stone, 12 Ky. L. Rep. 72, 12 S. W. 467, 14 S. W. 47, it was held that the right to use the name of the seller of a distillery as a brand for whisky did not pass with the transfer of the distillery. The deed did not mention the whisky brand, and as the testimony as to whether it was included in the purchase was conflicting, the appellate court refused to disturb the finding of the chancellor that the mark did not pass.

The right to the exclusive use of a trademark employed in connection with the sale of the waters of a certain spring passes to the purchaser upon the sale of the spring, although the business, good will, and marks are not mentioned. Congress & E. Spring Co. v. High Rock Congress Spring Co. 45 N. Y. 291, 6 Am. Rep. 82, Reversing 57 Barb. 526.

But a trademark which does not signify that the goods upon which it is placed are manufactured or produced in any particular locality does not pass as incident to the sale of the real estate or personal property of a partnership. Huwer v. Dannenhoffer, 82 N. Y. 499.

In Hazard v. Caswell, 57 How. Pr. 1 (Special Term) it was held that the right to use a trademark "established A. D. 1780," which belonged to a partnership business, passed to the successors of the old firm upon the sale, by a retiring partner, of his interest in the business.

Upon the dissolution of a partnership, the sale by one partner of a stock in trade and property of every kind of a copartnership in one of three places run by the firm does not include the trademark used generally by it, and not mentioned. Hazard v. Caswell, 93 N. Y. 259, 45 Am. Rep. 198.

And a partner buying out may get the exclusive right to use the trademarks of the firm, although not expressly mentioned in the deed of assignment. Merry v. Hoopes, 111 N. Y. 415, 18 N. E. 714.

The proprietary right which a man has acquired in a trademark will pass with the sale of the business to which the mark is attached. Hegeman v. Hegeman, 8 Daly, 1.

Trademarks are proper subjects of assignment, to the extent, at least, that, unless reserved, they pass with the assignment of the business. Laughman's Appeal, 128 Pa. 1, 5 L. R. A. 599, 18 Atl. 415.

By buying the assets and good will of a drug firm, a purchaser who gets the sole right to a formula for a patent medicine made and sold by the firm will, by operation of law, acquire the firm trademarks used in placing such medicine upon the market. Robinson v. Storm, 103 Tenn. 40, 52 S. W. 880.

In Listman Mill Co. v. William Listman Mill Co. 88 Wis. 334, 43 Am. St. Rep. 907, 60 N. W. 261, it was held that upon the sale of a flour mill the right to the mark, "Marvel," passed, without express mention, to the purchaser.

In Fish Bros. Wagon Co. v. La Belle Wagon Works (Fish Bros. Wagon Co. v. Fish) 82 Wis. 546, 16 L. R. A. 453, 33 Am. St. Rep. 77, 52 N. W. 595, it was held that the right to use the words "Fish Bros. & Co.," with the picture of a fish, as a trademark in connection with the sale of wagons, passed to the purchaser at a receiver's sale of a business formerly owned by persons of that name, although not specifically mentioned, but that the right was not exclusive. See infra.

In Mossop v. Mason, 18 Grant, Ch. (U. C.) 453, it was held that upon the sale of the good will of the business of an innkeeper, the right to the name of the hotel passed to the purchaser.

But in an Illinois case it was held that the mere sale of a business and its "assets," without any mention of good will or trademarks, was not sufficient to give the right to the exclusive use of a trademark bearing the personal name of a former vendor, so as to prevent the latter from afterwards using his own name in the same business. The court said that the right of a man to use his own name in connection with his own business was so fundamental that an intention entirely to divest himself of such right, and transfer it to another, would not readily be presumed, but must be shown. Where it was so shown, the transaction would be upheld; but it would not be sustained on doubtful or uncertain proof. Hazelton Boiler Co. v. Hazelton Tripod Boiler Co. 142 Ill. 494, 30 N. E. 339, Affirming 40 Ill. App. 430, Distinguishing Frazer v. Frazer Lubricator Co. 121 Ill. 147, 2 Am. St. Rep. 73, 13 N. E. 639, supra, in which the seller expressly authorized the use of his name as a trademark.

A trademark is not an asset of a firm so as to pass in a sale of all right, title, interest, property, claim, and demand in or to the assets of the firm. Young v. Jones Bros. 3 Hughes, 274, Fed. Cas. No. 18,150.

The purchaser at foreclosure sale of real estate upon which is a mine producing ore from which paint is made, does not obtain title to the trademark used by the mortgagor in connection with the sale of the paint. Prince Mfg. Co. v. Prince's Metallic Paint Co. 20 N. Y. Supp. 462. The decision in this point was reversed in the general term (39 N. Y. S. R. 488, 15 N. Y. Supp. 249), on the ground that it was the evident intention of the parties that the exclusive right to the trademark should pass with the property. The general term decision was reversed in the court of appeals (135 N. Y. 32, 17 L. R. A. 129, 31 N. E. 990), but this point was not passed upon.

In Lewis v. Smith, 8 Pa. Co. Ct. 327, it was held that a sale by a surviving partner of the firm lease and good will of the place of business did not pass the partnership trademark. It was true, said the court, that if he had sold the business out and out, with the good will which accompanied it, it might have included the trademarks used in the business, because they must be considered as part of the business.

The right to use a facsimile of the signature of the vendor in connection with trademarks, as formerly employed, is not included in the sale of the trademarks, where its use was merely fanciful, and it was not the essential part of the marks; and the vendor may therefore restrain the use of such signature. Geo. T. Stagg Co. v. Taylor, 95 Ky. 651, 27 S. W. 247.

And the sale of a drug store with the right to sell certain medicine bearing a trademark does not transfer the right to use the mark on other medicines. Hege-man v. O'Bryne, 10 N. Y. Week. Dig. 296.

And the mere sale of wood cuts from which a trademark is printed does not pass title to the trademark itself. Lockwood v. Bostwick, 2 Daly, 621.

For other cases on transfer of title by operation of law, see the next subdivision.

b. Judicial sales.

An assignable trademark may be disposed of with other assets of a bankrupt, but it would seem that it cannot be sold to satisfy a judgment, in absence of statutory authority. The cases are too few, however, to venture any general rule.

In Burkhardt v. A. E. Burkhardt Fur & Hat Co. 4 Ohio N. P. 358, it was held that a judicial sale under an order directing a receiver to sell as an entirety the property of a corporation as a going concern, including the good will, passed title to the business trademark. The court said that a bill of sale with that language would unquestionably have carried the trademark, and saw no reason why the fact that the sale was a judicial one should make any difference.

In this case it was also held that the sale of a business, including the stock, furniture and fixtures, cash, accounts receivable, and good will, included the business trademark which bore the name of the seller.

The trustees of an insolvent corporation may sell its trademarks bearing the name and initials of a former owner so as to entitle the purchaser to use the marks, upon giving due notice of change of ownership. Symonds v. Jones, 82 Me. 302, 8 L. R. A. 570, 17 Am. St. Rep. 485, 19 Atl. 820.

Hudson v. Osborne, 39 L. J. Ch. N. S. 79, 21 L. T. N. S. 386, states that there is no distinction between a sale by a man himself of his business and the good will of it, and the sale by the assignees in bankruptcy of all a bankrupt's assets of every kind.

A trademark, or a designation of one's trade, may be sold by order of the court, whether it be attached to a new business or to one long existing. In such case "good will" and trademarks are governed by similar rules. Glen & H. Mfg. Co. v. Hall, 61 N. Y. 226, 19 Am. Rep. 278.

Upon a general assignment for the benefit of creditors, the trademark of the assignor is among his assets, and may be disposed of the same as other assets, and no order of the court is necessary. Special Term Dec. 1879; Re Knox, 1 Month. L. Bull. 47.

But in Lewis v. Smith, 8 Pa. Co. Ct. 327, it was held that upon a bill filed by a surviving partner against the representative of a deceased partner, to stop infringement of a trademark, the court could not, in such action, order the sale of the mark as an asset of the firm.

In Re Adams, 24 Misc. 203, 53 N. Y. Supp. 666, it was held that a general assignee should not be permitted to sell a common-law trademark, particularly where he had already sold half a million labels bearing the trademark.

The question whether title to a corporation trademark could be acquired by purchase at an execution sale of the franchises and rights of the corporation, granted by the state, was raised in Prince Mfg. Co. v. Prince's Metallic Paint Co. 20 N. Y. Supp. 462, 39 N. Y. S. R. 488, 15 N. Y. Supp. 249, 135 N. Y. 32, 17 L. R. A. 129, 31 N. E. 990, and Prince's Metallic Paint Co. v. Prince Mfg. Co. 6 C. C. A. 647, 17 U. S. App. 145, 57 Fed. 938, but not decided.

Prince Mfg. Co. v. Prince's Metallic Paint Co. 20 N. Y. Supp. 462, stated that a trademark is not a thing that can be levied on and sold under an execution as a species of tangible property, unless under a local statute authorizing it. The general term, however (39 N. Y. S. R. 488, 15 N. Y. Supp. 249), held that the trademark could be thus sold under a statute of Pennsylvania authorizing a levy and sale of any of the property, franchises, and rights of a corporation. The trademark, the court said, was a species of property which the statute made vendible and purchasable under the execution, and afterwards transferable by the purchaser. The general term decision was reversed by the court of appeals (135 N. Y. 32, 17 L. R. A. 129, 31 N. E. 990), but this point was not passed upon.

It was held in Gegg v. Bassett, 3 Ont. L. Rep. 263, that a registered trademark could not be sold on execution.

And in Taylor v. Bemis, 4 Biss. 406. Fed. Cas. No. 13,779, it was held that a court of equity could not order a partner's interest in a firm trademark sold to satisfy a judgment against him.
1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

V. Rights resulting from or affected by transfer.

a. Of vendor.

The mere sale of a trademark, although it bears the name of a vendor, and passes exclusive title to the mark itself, does not take away the seller's right to use his own name in a similar business, if done in such a manner as not to violate his contract of sale, or infringe his former trademark. It is not intended, under this head, to deal with any rights of the vendor after the sale, except those relating to the use of trademarks.

In Hazelton Boiler Co. v. Hazelton Tripod Boiler Co. 40 Ill. App. 430, it was held that a vendor who had sold out his interest in a trademark bearing his name, together with the business of boiler making, could still use his name in a similar business, if done in such a way as not to amount to deception and fraud.

In Burch v. Toledo Plow Co. 15 Ohio C. C. 482, it was held that a manufacturer of a plow which he called "The Burch," and who sold out his business and afterwards engaged in the making and selling of a new plow, which he called "The New Burch," could prevent the purchaser of the old business from using this new name, although the seller carried on the business of manufacturing plows in violation of his contract.

In Charles S. Higgins Co. v. Higgins Soap Co. 71 Hun. 101, 24 N. Y. Supp. 801, it was held that where a business, together with its trademarks, was sold to a corporation, the seller would not be enjoined from using his name in a similar enterprise, on the ground that he was infringing the purchaser's right to the use of the name which was in the nature of a trademark.

And if a manufacturer of silk does not transfer to the purchaser of his business his formula or his method for making certain silks, to the exclusion of that right in himself, there can be no question as to his right afterwards to use his own name as a trademark in the same business. Cutter v. Gudebrod Bros. Co. 36 App. Div. 371, 55 N. Y. Supp. 298.

But in Russia Cement Co. v. Le Page, 147 Mass. 206, 9 Am. St. Rep. 685, 17 N. E. 304, it was held that Le Page, the inventor of a glue, who sold the right to manufacture it to a corporation, together with the trademark "Le Page's Liquid Glue," could not afterwards sell a similar article under the name "Le Page's Improved Liquid Glue."

To the same effect is Le Page Co. v. Russia Cement Co. 17 L. R. A. 354, 2 C. C. A. 555, 5 U. S. App. 112, 51 Fed. 941.

And in Brewer v. Lamar, 69 Ga. 656, 47 Am. Rep. 766, it was held that the owner of a medicine called "Brewer's Lung Restorer," having sold his right to manufacture and sell it, together with his trademark, and agreed not to use his name on any preparation which could be recommended and sold for the same purpose, could not afterwards offer to sell a preparation advertised to cure all diseases of the lungs and throat, under the name of "Brewer's Sarsaparilla Syrup."

If a trademark has never lost its primary signification, and has never acquired any secondary meaning, as the words "Old Oscar Pepper Distillery," merely characterizing certain whisky as entitled to public favor by reason of the reputation of a particular distillery, a former owner of the distillery, after its sale in bankruptcy, cannot use the same words to denote a whisky manufactured elsewhere. Pepper v. Labrot, 8 Fed 29.

In the case of Compere v. Bajou, decided by the tribunal of commerce, Paris, 1854, and subsequently by the court of appeals, and reported in Upton, Trademarks, 73, it appeared that there was an assignment by a glovemaker of his business, including the good will and the stamp used by him as a manufacturer's mark for his gloves, which was a facsimile of his signature. He afterwards began making gloves again in violation of his contract, but the court stopped him from using his former mark.

And in Mossop v. Mason, 18 Grant, Ch. (U. C.) 453, it was held that an innkeeper selling the good will of his business passed title to the name of the place, and that he could not afterwards set up in the same business, under the same name, in the same town.

It was held in Bury v. Bedford, 9 Jur. N. S. 956, that even assuming a trademark not to be assignable, an assignor of such a mark could not dispute his own assignment of it.

A person who, on a mere percentage of the profits of a business, sells the right to use his name in connection with that of another, as a trademark, has no right to the mark that will support an action for infringement. Hallett v. Cumston, 110 Mass. 29.

b. Of vendee.

1. Exclusive.

There is no doubt but that the purchaser of a trademark may acquire the exclusive right to its use. Where the title comes to him through a judicial sale or by operation of law, the right is not always held to be exclusive, but the cases are too few on this point to draw from them a general rule on the question.

In Hudson v. Osborne, 39 L. J. Ch. N. S. 79, 21 L. T. N. S. 386, it was held that the purchaser from an assignee in bankruptcy of a business run under the name of the "Osborne House" acquired the exclusive right to the use of the name as against the former owner, who gave his own name to the place.

Where one partner assigns to the partnership his trademark under the agreement that, upon the dissolution of the partnership, each partner is to have the right to use it, and the firm goes into bankruptcy, and the assignee sells the partnership trademark, the purchaser acquires the exclusive right to use it, although it bears the name of its original owner. Bury v. Bedford, 10 Jur. N. S. 503, Reversing 9 Jur. N. S. 956, in which it was held that the original owner of the mark might continue to use it himself, but that he would be enjoined from assigning that right to another.

Upon the sale of a business the extension of the right to use trademarks transfers the exclusive right to their use. Johnson v. Schenck, 1 Ohio L. J. 374, Fed. Cas. No. 7,412; Kidd v. Johnson, 100 U. S. 617, 25 L. ed. 769.

In Peck Bros. & Co. v. Peck Bros. Co. 62 L. R. A. 81, 51 C. C. A. 251, 113 Fed. 301, it was held that the exclusive right to use the name "Peck Bros. & Co." on certain goods was acquired by the purchaser from the receiver of an insolvent corporation, at a reorganization sale of all of the property of the old corporation, "together with the franchises, name, and good will, and all trade names, trademarks, and patents, and all the assets of every kind," etc.

And the failure to employ the seller for the length of time agreed upon in the contract of sale of the business, good will, and trademarks will not forfeit the buyer's sole right to the use of the marks. Symonds v. Jones, 82 Me. 302, 8 L. R. A. 570, 17 Am. St. Rep. 485, 19 Atl. 820.

The right to the exclusive use of certain brands in connection with whiskies, by the purchaser of a distillery and its brands, was recognized in Kentucky Distilleries & Warehouse Co. v. Wathen, 110 Fed. 643, on a motion for an injunction to restrain infringement by former owners.

In Chattanooga Medicine Co. v. Thedford, 49 Fed. 949, Affirmed in 58 Fed. 347, it was held that the sale of the right to use the name "M. A. Thedford & Co." as a trademark in connection with the sale of "Dr. Simmons Liver Medicine" did not, upon the forced abandonment of the name "Simmons," permit the sale of the medicine as "M. A. Thedford & Co's Original and Only Genuine Liver Medicine of Black Draught." The ruling was reversed in 14 C. C. A. 101, 30 U. S. App. 35, 66 Fed. 544, and an injunction directed to issue against the vendor's selling a compound under the name "M. A. Thedford's Liver Invigorator."

In Miller v. Billington, 6 Pa. Dist. R. 335, an action to enforce the payment of a royalty, the consideration for the sale of an article and its trademark, it was said by the court that, by buying the business of making and selling the article, the purchaser might reap the advantages of the trademark in equity, independently of statutory regulations.

In Pittsburgh Brass Co. v. Adler, 2 Monaghan (Pa.) 235, it was held that the purchaser of certain patent rights and of a trademark bearing the name of the inventor of a metal fender was entitled, under the agreement, to its exclusive use as against the seller.

In Russia Cement Co. v. Le Page, 147 Mass. 206, 9 Am. St. Rep. 685, 17 N. E. 304, it was said that the sale of the right to use a trademark in connection with the business in which it was employed, necessarily passed the exclusive right to its use.

But one who buys a trademark bearing the name of a former owner from the assignee of a corporation cannot prevent the former owner from using his own name in connection with the same business. Cutter v. Gudebrod Bros. Co. 36 App. Div. 371, 55 N. Y. Supp. 298.

On a second appeal in the last-mentioned case (44 App. Div. 605, 61 N. Y. Supp. 225), it was held that if the original owner of a trademark, upon the sale of a business to a corporation, would be under binding obligation to permit the use of the mark by the corporation, the purchaser from the general assignee of such corporation would not acquire such a right. The court said that, upon the assignment by the corporation, both it and the stockholders ceased to have any personal interest in the trademark which was the subject of protection, and that an assignee's sale passed no title to the use of the former owner's name as a trademark.

And in Fish Bros. Wagon Co. v. La Belle Wagon Works (Fish Bros. Wagon Co. v. Fish) 82 Wis. 546, 16 L. R. A. 453, 33 Am. St. Rep. 72, 52 N. W. 595, it was held that the right of the purchaser of the assets of an insolvent wagon company to use a trademark bearing the name of the former owners, and which passed over with the business, was not exclusive, and that the former owners could not be prevented from making similar wagons at another place, and selling them under their name, so long as they did not represent them as coming from the old factory. On this proposition, Winslow, J., dissented. The right of the purchaser to use the trademark, he said, was, in its very nature, exclusive, and that if the purchaser owned it the seller manifestly did not own it.

In the later case of Fish Bros. Wagon Co. v. Fish Bros. Mfg. Co. 87 Fed. 203, it was held that the right to the use of the trademark possessed by the original owners under the decision in the Wisconsin case, above mentioned, could be sold to a third party, but that neither the first nor second purchaser could advertise as selling the only genuine wagon. This case was affirmed in 37 C. C. A. 146, 95 Fed. 457.

But if one who buys the personal effects of an insolvent corporation at sheriff's sale does not acquire good title to its trademark, acquiescence by the corporation for eight years in the use of the mark by the purchaser under color of title will prevent another purchaser of the same trademark, at a later sale of the franchises of the corporation, from getting the sole right to use it. Prince's Metallic Paint Co. v. Prince Mfg. Co. 6 C. C. A. 647, 17 U. S. App. 145, 57 Fed. 938.

of the assets of a bankrupt partnership, from the trustees, acquired the right to the use of the firm trademarks as against a former partner, who had sold out his interest in the business before the failure, specifying that his vendees might use the old firm trademarks.

In H. B. Chaffee Mfg. Co. v. Selchow, 131 Fed. 543, Affirmed in 68 C. C. A. 668, 135 Fed. 1021, it was held that one buying at sheriff's sale the assets and trademarks of an insolvent firm having the right to sell a certain game under the trademark "Flinch" did not acquire the right to the mark as against the purchaser of the game itself from the executrix of its inventor, who had continued to sell it until his death. In this case the court did not decide whether the second purchaser owned the trademark, but simply that the complainant, the purchaser at the sheriff's sale, did not.

Where the question as to the exclusive right to the use of a name as a trademark by the purchaser is clouded with doubt, it is no abuse of discretion to dissolve a temporary injunction in an action brought by the vendee to restrain infringement of the mark. American Cereal Co. v. Eli Pettijohn Cereal Co. 22 C. C. A. 236, 46 U. S. App. 188, 76 Fed. 372, Affirming 72 Fed. 903.

A wife does not, by her marriage, acquire the right to use the name of her husband as a trademark, so as to interfere with the enjoyment of the use of the mark by one to whom he has sold it. Skinner v. Oakes, 10 Mo. App. 45.

And a son cannot get from his father the right to use the latter's name as a trademark, as against one who has acquired the right by contract. Ibid.

One who buys a trademark from a former purchaser will not be hurt by a secret agreement between the original parties, of which he has no notice. Oakes v. Tonsmierre, 4 Woods, 547, 49 Fed. 447; Skinner v. Oakes, 10 Mo. App. 45.

2. Injunction.

The purchaser of an assignable trademark may restrain infringers upon the same grounds that apply in the case of the original owner.

One who buys an assignable trademark may enjoin infringers. Filkins v. Blackman, 13 Blatchf. 440, Fed. Cas. No. 4786; Walton v. Crowley, 3 Blatchf. 440, Fed. Cas. No. 17,133.

The purchaser of a trademark containing the words "Twin Brothers," and bearing the portraits of the twins, the original owners of the business and mark, may enjoin such owners from using the mark in the same line of business. Burton v. Stratton, 12 Fed. 696.

And in Moxie Nerve Food Co. v. Baumbach, 32 Fed. 212, it was held that a corporation buying the trademark "Moxie," in connection with a beverage known as "Moxie Nerve Food," could prevent the trademark from being copied.

In Hill v. Lockwood, 32 Fed. 389, it appeared that the lessee of a spring gave it the name of "Clysmic," and sold its waters as "Clysmic Water." He afterwards entered into another contract for the sale of the water with a subsequent purchaser of the spring. It was held that the vendee of the spring took the right to the use of the name so as to stop the lessee from selling, under the same name, the water of another spring,—at least, during the life of the contract.

And in Congress & E. Spring Co. v. High Rock Congress Spring Co. 45 N. Y. 291, 6 Am. Rep. 82, Reversing 57 Barb. 526, it was held that the purchaser of a spring the waters of which were sold under the trademark "Congress" might stop the owners of another spring from making use of the same word as a trademark in the sale of similar water.

In Kyle v. Perfection Mattress Co. 127 Ala. 39, 50 L. R. A. 628, 85 Am. St. Rep. 78, 28 So. 545, it was held that a corporation purchasing the trademark "Perfection Mattress" with the good will of the business, in which it was used, could prevent the original owner from selling similar mattresses under the name "Kyle's Perfection Mattress," where the trademark indicated a particular quality of mattress.

One who gets the sole right to produce a play for five years may stop a third party from copying its trademark. Hopkins Amusement Co. v. Frohman, 103 Ill. App. 613.

A corporation formed to take the place of a partnership, and made up of the same persons, may stop the use of a trade name or mark of the business, although there was no formal transfer of it to the corporation. Allegretti v. Allegretti Chocolate Cream Co. 177 Ill. 129, 52 N. E. 487, 76 Ill. App. 581.

In Julian v. Hoosier Drill Co. 78 Ind. 408, it was held that the transferee of the trademark "Hoosier," together with the right to manufacture and sell certain drills, could enjoin the wrongful use of the name by a company selling similar drills.

And in Metcalf v. Brand, 86 Ky. 331, 9 Am. St. Rep. 282, 5 S. W. 773, the purchaser of a trademark consisting of the words "Lexington Mustard," long used by prior vendors, was held entitled to stop infringement.

It was held in J. G. Mattingly Co. v. Mattingly, 96 Ky. 430, 27 S. W. 985, that where the members of a firm, as partners and individuals, sold all their interest in a distillery formerly operated by them, together with the good will, firm name, and trademarks, they would be stopped from afterwards copying any of the trademarks.

In Frank v. Sleeper, 150 Mass. 583, 23 N. E. 213, it was held that where the owner of a trademark consisting of his initials, and used with cigars made for him, sold the business and assigned the trademark, and the buyer continued to have the cigars made by the same manufacturers, at the same place, and gave notice that the trademark had been assigned to him, he could have an injunction against an infringer.

In Kinney Tobacco Co. v. Maller, 53 Hun. 340, 6 N. Y. Supp. 389, it was held that the 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

fact that one had derived his title to the use of a trademark from successors of its original owners was sufficient to entitle him to protection from infringement.

In Cook v. Starkweather, 13 Abb. Pr. N. S. 392, a complainant who had derived his title to a trademark bearing the words "Old Valley Whisky" through successive sales was granted a perpetual injunction against its infringement.

In Dixon Crucible Co. v. Guggenheim, 7 Phila. 408, it was held that a trademark bearing the name of its originator could be used after his death by a purchaser of the business in which it was employed, and that an infringement of it would be stopped.

In Van Stan's Stratena Co. v. Van Stan, 209 Pa. 564, 103 Am. St. Rep. 1018, 58 Atl. 1064, it was held that on the sale by a father of the right to use his name as a trademark in connection with the transfer of a business, in effect joined in by the son, the purchaser could prevent the son from afterwards using his own proper name in such a manner as to injure the vendee.

In Robinson v. Storm, 103 Tenn. 40, 52 S. W. 880, it was held that the purchaser of a patent medicine and its trademark, "Storm's Liver Regulator," could stop the infringement of the trademark by a son of the man whose name the mark bore. In this case the infringer was using the trademark in connection with the sale of a medicine made from a different formula.

And one buying the sole right to use a trade name or mark in connection with the business purchased, but who does not use the name, may prevent the seller from employing it in a similar business, if he has agreed not to do so. Grow v. Seligman, 47 Mich. 607, 41 Am. Rep. 737, 11 N. W. 404.

And the purchaser of a trademark apart from the business in which it is used, although not acquiring ownership, may invoke the aid of a court of equity to stop an infringement, on the ground of unfair and fraudulent competition. The Fair v. Jose Morales & Co. 82 Ill. App. 499.

Where the owner of a newspaper, "The Commercial Travelers' Journal," was registered under the Canadian trademark and design act of 1879, and the paper and good will were afterwards sold, it was held that the purchaser could prevent the publication of a new paper under the name of "The Traveler," and that registration of the assignment was not necessary to give it effect. Carey v. Goss, 11 Ont. Rep. 619.

But before an assignee of a trademark obtains the right to restrain infringers, he must show that it has actually been used and applied upon an article so that the public has come to understand that the article to which it is attached is known under the mark. Filkins v. Blackman, 13 Blatchf. 440, Fed. Cas. No. 4,786.

3. Purchase of stock containing trademark.

Where a stock of goods is sold, the various articles having trademarks upon them, the purchaser merely gets the right to the use of the marks in the resale of such stock. He acquires no right to use the marks generally, but he cannot be prevented from employing them so far as the sale of the purchased stock is concerned.

Where the name or trademark of a firm is impressed upon a stock of goods sold, the purchaser at least has the right to use the marks in the sale of such goods. Caswell v. Hazard, 121 N. Y. 484, 18 Am. St. Rep. 833, 24 N. E. 707, Affirming 50 Hun, 230, 2 N. Y. Supp. 783.

The purchaser of the stock of an insolvent corporation has the right to sell it, although containing the trademark bearing the surname of a former owner of the business. This would not be a deception of the public. Cutter v. Gudebrod Bros. Co. 36 App. Div. 371, 55 N. Y. Supp. 298, 44 App. Div. 605, 61 N. Y. Supp. 225.

The mere fact that, upon the sale of a business to a corporation, the inventory included cabinets bearing the seller's name or trademark, does not convey the exclusive right to the mark, when the seller still owns some of the machinery used in the business, and no special mention of the trade names or marks is made. Ibid.

And the sale by one partner, of his interest in a quantity of bottles and labels bearing the firm trademark, and the molds and stamps with which they were made, does not include the exclusive right to use a trademark not specifically mentioned. Hazard v. Caswell, 93 N. Y. 259, 45 Am. Rep. 198.

A new corporation buying the stock of goods located at the branch office of an insolvent corporation, but not purchasing the good will, does not get the right to use the name of the insolvent corporation on its goods, to the injury of the purchaser at a later sale of the main business with its good will and trademarks, it appearing that there were no persons of the same name in the corporation seeking to appropriate the name. Peck Bros. & Co. v. Peck Bros. Co. 62 L. R. A. 81, 51 C. C. A. 251, 113 Fed. 301.

And in Godillot v. American Grocery Co. 71 Fed. 873, it was held that one buying from a receiver the stock of goods of an insolvent concern did not thereby acquire the right to use the trademark of the business generally.

c. Of partners.

The right of a partner who has bought out the other members of the firm, to the exclusive use of the partnership trademarks and to protection against infringement, in no wise differs from that of ordinary purchasers.

An assignment by one partner of all his interest in the firm to his copartners will carry with it the exclusive use of the trademark of the firm. Laughman's Appeal, 128 Pa. 1, 5 L. R. A. 599, 18 Atl. 415.

In Burekharut v. Burekhardt, 42 Ohio St. 474, 51 Am. Rep. 842, it was held that upon the sale of a business, including the good will, by one partner to another, the exclusive right to the use of the name "Burckhardt & Co." as a trademark passed to the buyer.

In Piper v. Laughman, 6 Pa. Co. Ct. 233, it was held that the assignment and transfer by one partner of all his interest in the personal property of the firm passed the right to the use of the trademark. "Sonman Coal." The case was reversed in 128 Pa. 1, 5 L. R. A. 599, 18 Atl. 415, but on the ground that the trademark was a geographical name, and not capable of appropriation.

Where a partner sells out all of his interest in the partnership property and assets, the grant is not limited by a provision that the purchasers may use the old firm trademarks and stamps, but the sole right to the trademarks will pass over to the buyer. Lippincott v. Hubbard, 28 Pittsb. L. J. N. S. 303.

One partner buying the other's interest in the business and property of the firm, including its good will, may continue to use the partnership trademark. Adams v. Adams, 7 Abb. N. C. 292.

But in Hazard v. Caswell, 93 N. Y. 259, 45 Am. Rep. 198, it was held that if, upon the dissolution of a partnership, the members of the firm buying out the retiring partner were the sole successors of that firm and its business, with the right to trade in the firm name, this did not, in the absence of agreement, confer exclusive right to the use of the trademarks.

In Ilhee v. Henshaw, L. R. 31 Ch. Div. 323, 55 L. J. Ch. N. S. 273, 53 L. T. N. S. 949, 34 Week. Rep. 269, it was held that where one partner had assigned all his interest in the business and good will of a partnership, including a registered trademark, the purchaser could maintain an action against an infringer before registering the assignment of the mark.

A third person cannot question the right of an outgoing partner to authorize the firm to use a trademark bearing his name, upon selling out his interest in the article to which it is affixed. Brown Chemical Co. v. Mever, 139 U. S. 540, 35 L. ed. 247, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 625.

A partner succeeding to the rights of the firm in a trademark may restrain its infringement, although he was not the original designer or owner of the mark. Cuervo v. Landauer, 63 Fed. 1003.

In Spieker v. Lash, 102 Cal. 38, 36 Pac. 362, it was held that where a partner whose name appeared in the firm style "T. M. Lash & Co." sold out his interest in the business and good will to the other partner, and afterwards transferred to the purchaser the trademark "Lash's Kidney and Liver Bitters," together with the right to use the same, the seller would be stopped from imitating the trademark in connection with the sale of similar goods.

A partnership buying the sole right to the use of the name of a retiring partner as a trademark may stop the latter from afterwards using his name in connection with similar business in such a manner as to deceive the public. Frazer v. Frazer Lubricator Co. 121 Ill. 147, 2 Am. St. Rep. 73, 13 N. E. 639, Affirming 18 Ill. App. 450.

In Chaney v. Hoxie, 143 Mass. 592, 58 Am. Rep. 149, 10 N. E. 713, it was held that one Hoxie, who parted with his interest in the trademark "A. N. Hoxie's Mineral Soap," upon selling out to his partner, would be restrained from holding himself out as having the right to use the trademark.

And in Probasco v. Bouyon, 1 Mo. App. 241, where a partner named Oakes sold out his interest in the stock, equipments, and good will of the partnership, together with the firm name and the exclusive right to make "Oakes' Candies," and to use the name, it was held that he would be restrained from afterwards selling candy under the name of "Oakes' Candies."

Upon the dissolution of a partnership, one of the partners buying the trademark of the firm at a receiver's sale acquires the right to use it, and a retiring partner, receiving a benefit from the sale, is estopped from making any claim to use the mark adversely or in competition with the purchaser. Rorke v. Société des Huiles d'Olive, 14 App. Div. 173, 43 N. Y. Supp. 548.

d. As affected by fraud.

1. Generally.

The purchaser of a trademark who would not have a rival trader cheat the public by the use of false symbols must himself be without sin. If he comes into a court of equity with a prayer for the protection of a mark that speaks a falsehood to the world, he will be turned out as a suitor with unclean hands. He must deal fairly himself or he will not be heard. This rule applies to owners of trademarks generally, as well as to purchasers; but in this note only such cases have been taken as bear upon the application of the rule to purchasers; or, in other words, only such fraud as relates to a sale and change of ownership,—the fraud of the buyer himself.

In Leather Cloth Co. v. Hirschfeld, 1 New Reports, 551, it appeared that after the sale of a trademark which contained the words "tanned leather cloth," the purchaser had discontinued the tanning of the cloth without changing the mark. It was held that this omission was not such a fraud as to prevent the plaintiff from having an injunction against an infringer.

And in Edleston v. Vick, 23 Eng. L. & Eq. 51, 18 Jur. 7, it was held that the mere fact that a trademark bore the word "patented," the patent having run out after the sale of the mark, was not sufficient to prevent the purchaser from having the help of the court to stop an infringement.

In Leather Cloth Co. v. American Leather Cloth Co. 1 Hem. & M. 271, 32 L. J. Ch. N. S. 721, 11 Week. Rep. 931, 8 L. T. N. S. 820, it was held that, upon the sale of the good will and the business of manufacturing a particular kind of cloth, the place of business continuing the same, and the secret, if any, being handed over, it would be impossible to say that the purchaser was not entitled to describe his articles by the name by 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

which they had always been known. It was urged that relief against an infringer should be refused the purchaser because the mark indicated that a patent had been issued for the goods it stood for on Jan. 24 instead of Jan. 14; that it represented that all of the goods were patented, when in fact only a small portion were; that it stated that the goods were manufactured by an American firm in America, whereas they were made by an English firm in England. It was held that these objections were not well taken. The case was reversed in 33 L. J. Ch. N. S. 199, 12 Week. Rep. 289, 10 Jur. N. S. 81, 9 L. T. N. S. 558, on the general ground that each of these statements was false, the most material statement being that the goods to which the mark was attached were patented. It was said that the purchaser, while seeking to restrain a rival dealer from selling his goods as those of another, was himself doing the same thing in representing the goods to be of American manufacture, and that he was not entitled, therefore, to equitable relief. This decision was affirmed in the House of Lords (35 L. J. Ch. N. S. 53, 11 H. L. Cas. 523, 11 Jur. N. S. 513, 13 Week. Rep. 873, 4 De G. J. & S. 137), mainly on the ground that there was no infringement; but Lord Kingsdown said that where a trademark indicated that the goods to which it was attached were manufactured by a particular individual, which fact gave an increased value to the goods, a purchaser of the good will and business could not obtain the help of the court to stop an infringement, on the ground that his own use of the mark would, in that case, amount to a deception of the public.

In Thorneloe v. Hill [1894] 1 Ch. 569, in deciding that the mere right to stamp the name of a watchmaker upon watches not made by him was not assignable, the court said that, speaking generally, the purchaser of a business, if he continued it, had the right to use the trade name and trademarks of the business in any way he pleased, which was not calculated to deceive, and that in particular, as a rule, the purchaser of a business might mark goods made by him in the course of that business with the name of the vendor, although the vendor or his old workmen did not assist in making such goods; and by so marking the goods the purchaser would not be considered as doing that which was calculated to deceive his customers or the public, for the reason that the purchaser, continuing the business, the mark might fairly be held to be only a representation that the goods were manufactured in the course of the business, without any representation as to the persons by whom that business was being carried on; and that there would be no substantial risk of deception. But in cases where deception would result, the rule was different.

In Hall v. Barrows, 9 Jur. N. S. 483, it was stated that the right of successive partners or owners of a partnership business to use the firm name or trademark depended upon the continuity of the partnership. And if there had been no break in it, the same name or marks might be used, although the original members of the firm had long been dead. The name in such cases denoted that the original firm continued without interruption by successive additions of partners down to the present.

An assignee of a trademark cannot have leave to put it on goods not the same in character or species as the original article with which it went; but it is not necessary that the genuine thing should always be produced at the same place where first made. Filkins v. Blackburn, 13 Blatchf. 440, Fed. Cas. No. 4,786.

And one who buys a trademark bearing the surname "Oakes" cannot use the name "Peter Oakes" with it. Oakes v. Tonsmierre, 4 Woods, 547, 49 Fed. 447.

A trademark, after abandonment, cannot be sold if, in the meantime, another has taken it up and clothed it with a new meaning, so that its use by a purchaser would deceive and defraud consumers. Blackwell v. Dibrell, 3 Hughes, 151, Fed. Cas. No. 1,475.

Purchasers of trademarks will be restrained from using them so as to lead the public to suppose the goods upon which they appear were packed by their vendors. Symonds v. Jones, 82 Me. 302, 8 L. R. A. 570, 17 Am. St. Rep. 485, 19 Atl. 820.

So in Alaska Packers' Assn. v. Alaska Improv. Co. 60 Fed. 103, the court turned out an assignee of a trademark which indicated that canned salmon with which it went were still packed by the assignor, because of the false representation; and held that a correction after the commencement of an action was too late.

The purchaser of a mere trademark, in order to have its use by another stopped, must show that it was employed to designate goods of a certain quality or description, and that he is in fact using it to designate goods of substantially the same quality or description. Skinner v. Oakes, 10 Mo. App. 45.

A valid sale may be made of a trademark to the manufacturer of the article to which it is affixed, by one for whom the article was made. Witthaus v. Braun, 44 Md. 303, 22 Am. Rep. 44.

The sale of the orders, correspondence, and good will of an insolvent manufacturers' partnership passes to the vendee the right to use the firm name as a trademark on articles bought and sold, but not on those manufactured by the vendee. Rogers v. Taintor, 97 Mass. 291.

One who buys from the organizer and employer of a band of musicians known under a certain name all his right, title, and interest to the organization, its trade name and mark, cannot, upon the retirement of the seller and other members of the orchestra, enjoin the use of the trademark by another organization, made up in part of members of the original company. Messer v. The Fadettes, 168 Mass. 140, 37 L. R. A. 721, 60 Am. St. Rep. 371, 46 N. E. 407.

It is when an assigned trademark not only contains the name of the original manufacturer, but also asserts that the articles to which it is affixed continue to be made by him, though sold by the assignee, that the use of the trademark by the latter is a deception, and will not be protected by an injunction. Wiltberger v. Walker, 8 Ohio Dec. Reprint, 588.

In Carmichel v. Latimer, 11 R. I. 395, 23 Am. Rep. 48, it was held that the successors of an old firm would be refused an injunction for the infringement of its trademark, where it appeared that no one in the new firm was a member of the old partnership, and where the goods were described as made by the old firm as if it still existed. Durfee, Ch. J., in dissenting on this point, did not think the continuance of the old firm name on the labels of the purchaser was intrinsically a fraud upon the public, who, he said, were interested in getting the same or a better manufacture, but who, so long as they did get it, could have little care whether it came from the original manufacturers or their successors.

In Fetridge v. Wells, 4 Abb. Pr. 144, it was even held that the purchaser of a secret preparation and trademark, by deceiving the public as to the price paid, might be refused an injunction against an infringer. The court would not say that the title thus acquired was not valid in law, but could not believe that it deserved to be aided by an injunction from a court of equity.

The successors of a partnership, upon its dissolution, cannot be protected in the use of a trademark which would wrongfully represent that they were the sole makers of the article to which it was attached. Hazard v. Caswell, 93 N. Y. 259, 45 Am. Rep. 198.

In Prince Mfg. Co. v. Prince's Metallic Paint Co. 135 N. Y. 32, 17 L. R. A. 129, 31 N. E. 990, it was held that the purchaser of a trademark which had come to signify that certain paints were made from ore taken from a particular tract of land, producing an especially high quality of ore, could not, after enlarging the plant, and using the trademark on paints made of other ore, enjoin its infringement by a rival concern.

Although the trademark itself may not bear false witness, if it has come to mean to the trade and the public that the article it represents is made in a particular locality, which gives it its value, while in fact the articles come from another place, the owner of the mark will not be protected from infringement. Ibid.

The court held, in the same case, that it was no answer that the bogus article was as good as the genuine. A party, said the court, could not secure the confidence of the public in an article on the ground that it was made of one material, of which the trademark was a guaranty, and then, without advising the public, substitute another material, and sell that upon the credit of the true article, and justify the false use of a trademark or label on the ground of similar quality. If this was permitted it would offer a temptation to fraud, and an inferior article might be palmed off on unsuspecting purchasers.

A court will not stop the sale of watches bearing the maker's name for one who has bought the right to stamp his own watches with that name. This would be protecting the bogus article at the expense of the genuine. Samuel v. Berger, 24 Barb. 163, 4 Abb. Pr. 88, 13 How. Pr. 342.

A court of equity will not help a purchaser stop the infringement of a trademark which misrepresents the name of the manufacturer and the place of manufacture. Manhattan Medicine Co. v. Wood, 108 U. S. 218, 27 L. ed. 706, 2 Sup. Ct. Rep. 436, Affirming 4 Cliff. 461, 14 Pat. Off. Gaz. 519, Fed. Cas. No. 9,026.

So in Siebert v. Abbott, 61 Md. 276, 48 Am. Rep. 101, an injunction was refused because the trademark said the article was made by the original manufacturer, who was dead, and because it misrepresented the place of manufacture.

In Partridge v. Menck, 1 How. App. Cas. 558, it was held that the purchaser of a match-manufacturing business and its trademarks would not be heard in a court of equity if the marks, as used by him, made it appear that the matches were still made by his vendor. Gardiner, J., said that it was no sufficient answer that the complainant obtained from the seller the secret of preparing the matches, or that he made an article in all respects equal to that offered by the former proprietor. Nor did it alter the case that the complainant purchased the right to use the vendor's name. The privilege of deceiving the public was not a legitimate subject of commerce; that if the maxim that he who asks equity must come with pure hands were not altogether obsolete, the complainant had no right to invoke the extraordinary jurisdiction of the court of chancery in favor of such a monopoly.

It was held in Cutter v. Gudebrod Bros. Co. 36 App. 362, 55 N. Y. Supp. 298, that a corporation buying at an assignee's sale the right to the use of a trademark could not enjoin the originator of the trademark from the use of his name in the transaction of the same business, where it would permit the corporation to put its goods upon the market as the product of another, which the latter had no part in producing, and for the quality of which he was in no wise responsible. This, said the court, was a fraud upon the public, and the case was not altered by the alleged fact that the goods were better than those formerly offered under the same name.

And the vendee will not be heard where the trademark bearing the name of the vendor falsely represents that the article to which it is attached is still made under the superintendence of the vendor, and that the latter certifies its genuineness by his own signature. Helmhold v. Helmhold Mfg. Co. 53 How. Pr. 453.

Territorial rights in a trademark cannot be sold to different persons so as to enable each to make and sell his goods as those of the original owner of the mark, in fraud of the public. Snodgrass v. Welle, 11 Mo. App. 590.

held that the mere fact that the seller of the art and mystery of compounding a certain medicine had authorized the use of his name as a trademark did not necessarily imply a fraud upon the public.

2. Notice of change of ownership.

It would always be the safe way in doubtful cases for the buyer of a trademark to give notice of change of ownership; but this is not necessary in every instance. If the personal meaning has gone from the mark, and its new use will not deceive the public, it would be idle, perhaps, to make mention of the transfer.

"The object of the trademark being to indicate, by its meaning or association, the origin or ownership of the article," said the court, in Manhattan Medicine Co. v. Wood, 108 U. S. 218, 27 L. ed. 706, 2 Sup. Ct. Rep. 436 "it would seem that when a right to its use is transferred to others, either by act of the original manufacturer or by operation of law, the fact of transfer should be stated in connection with its use; otherwise a deception would be practised upon the public, and the very fraud accomplished to prevent which courts of equity interfere to protect the exclusive right of the original manufacturer."

In Stachelberg v. Ponce, 23 Fed. 430, the court would not hear one who had bought the right to use the trademark "La Normanda," because of failure to give notice that he was a purchaser from the original owner. The case was affirmed in 128 U. S. 686, 32 L. ed. 569, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 200, but on the ground that the original owner had no exclusive right to the mark.

If the sale of a trademark apart from the business in which it was used would give valid title, equitable relief against an infringer would be refused if the purchaser failed to give notice of the transfer in using the mark. Bultte v. Igleheart Bros. 137 Fed. 492.

The purchaser's use of a trademark bearing the names and initials of its former owner, without indicating change of ownership, would so mislead the public as not to entitle the buyer to protection against infringement. Symonds v. Jones, 82 Me. 302, 8 L. R. A. 570, 17 Am. St. Rep. 485, 19 Atl. 820.

But where the purchaser gives notice of change of ownership before bringing an action against an infringer, he will be heard. Ibid.

The successors of a partnership failing to give notice, in the use of the old firm trademark, that they were such, should, on that ground, be denied relief against a retiring partner claiming the right to use the mark. Hazard v. Caswell, 93 N. Y. 259, 45 Am. Rep. 198; but this language was said to be obiter in Caswell v. Hazard, 50 Hun. 230, 2 N. Y. Supp. 783, and on the appeal of the same case in 121 N. Y. 484, 18 Am. St. Rep. 833, 24 N. E. 707.

A corporation getting title to the good will and trademark of an insolvent partnership through a purchaser at the assignee's sale cannot have an injunction against an infringer, if it represents itself as the former firm, and not as successor of the old partnership. Hegeman v. Hegeman, 8 Daly. 1.

But where a corporation obtains the right to use the trademark "Coal Oil Johnny Soap," the placing of its name upon the wrappers is sufficient notice of change of ownership. Petrolia Mfg. Co. v. Bell & B. Soap Co. 97 Fed. 781.

And where the use of an old trademark by the purchaser is not a fraud or imposition upon the public, he need not give notice of the fact that it has been assigned. Royal Baking Powder Co. v. Raymond, 70 Fed. 376, Affirmed in 29 C. C. A. 245, 55 U. S. App. 575, 85 Fed. 231.

And in Pillsbury v. Pillsbury-Washburn Flour Mills Co. 12 C. C. A. 432, 24 U. S. App. 395, 64 Fed. 841, it was held that it was unnecessary for a corporation taking over the business of a flouring mill to give notice of the transfer of the brand "Pillsbury," which was the name of one of the former owners of the mill, who managed and controlled the business of the corporation, to entitle it to stop a rival from copying the name and brand, distinguishing Partridge v. Menck, 1 How. App. Cas. 558; Manhattan Medicine Co. v. Wood, 108 U. S. 218, 27 L. ed. 706, 2 Sup. Ct. Rep. 436; Siebert v. Abbott, 61 Md. 276, 48 Am. Rep. 101, on the ground that here the transaction was really nothing more than the incorporation of the parties who had built up the business, and that the brand spoke the truth in spirit and essence.

In Benedictine Distillerie v. Micalovitch, 36 Alb. L. J. 364, it was said that where a trademark contained no distinct assertion as to who the maker or seller was, and had come to represent, not the seller or manufacturer, but the place or process or quality of manufacture, the assignee so long as the place, process, or quality of manufacture remained the same, might continue to use the trademark without any words denoting succession or change of ownership. In this case a trademark "Benedictine," together with the secret for making a liqueur invented before the French Revolution by the Benedictine monks, was transferred to a corporation, and an injunction against the infringement of the mark was issued, as its use was said to impose no deception upon the public.

But in Fulton v. Sellers, 4 Brewst. (Pa.) 42, it was held that the purchasers of a trademark bearing the name of the original owner, and used in connection with the sale of a patent medicine, would not be refused relief because they were only assignees of the trademark, and used it without designating themselves as such. The court did not see how, by using the mark after they had bought it, without giving notice that they were not the original owners, it could be a fraud upon the public of which the defendant could avail himself.

3. Immaterial inaccuracies.

The courts are not overnice about false statements in trademarks. Trifling inaccuracies they will not take notice of. Where the misrepresentations do not amount to a fraud upon the public, the purchaser may still have the ear of equity, which will not allow the piracy of the mark by a rival dealer.

While courts of equity will not protect a trademark which deceives the public, and while that deception need not be of such a character as to work a positive injury to purchasers, on the other hand, every erroneous impression which the public may get will not be sufficient to destroy the validity of a trademark. Meriden Britannia Co. v. Parker, 39 Conn. 450, 12 Am. Rep. 406.

The use of a trademark bearing the name "Rogers Brothers" as a distinguishing part, by the company securing the right to manufacture and market the goods with which it was used, was held not to be such a misrepresentation as to manufacture as to deny the mark protection against infringement, where it appeared that the original owners superintended and devoted their time and skill to the business. Ibid.

It was urged in Dixon Crucible Co. v. Guggenheim, 7 Phila. 408, that the purchaser of a trademark that went with a stove blacking should not be heard in a court of equity, because the mark represented that the blacking, which was native plumbago, was prepared from pure carburet of iron. The judge said that at best this was but a question of science; and that whether or not plumbago was to be added to the list of pure forms of carbon was altogether too nice a question to be decided upon a motion for a special injunction.

In Edleston v. Vick, 23 Eng. L. & Eq. 51, it was held that a purchaser's use of a trademark bearing the name "Taylor & Co.," its original owner, would not be such a fraud on the public as to take from him the right to be heard in a court of equity.

In Jennings v. Johnson, 37 Fed. 364, it was held that the purchaser of a remedy known as "Johnson's Anodyne Liniment" acquired such a proprietary right in the business and to the use of the bottles, labels, and wrappers with which the medicine was associated and identified as to entitle him to maintain an action for an injunction against one copying the name and label. In this case the sale was made after the death of the inventor of the medicine, a facsimile of whose signature appeared on the label.

In Feder v. Benkert, 18 C. C. A. 549, 44 U. S. App. 99, 70 Fed. 613, it was held that one of the original members of a partnership who bought out the business together with the right to the use of the firm name as a trademark could continue to use the mark unaltered, for the reason that the public could not thereby be misled. To the same effect is the interlocutory decree in the case, 34 Fed. 534.

Where a merchant sells out his business and the sole right to use the style "Little Jake" as a trademark, he cannot resist an injunction on the ground that the use of the words by the purchaser would amount to a deception upon the public, where it appears that the latter has, for some time, been carrying on the business in his own name. Grow v. Seligman, 47 Mich. 607, 41 Am. Rep. 737, 11 N. W. 404.

It is not a fraud upon the public for the buyer to use a trademark consisting of the personal name of the seller, where the mark does not signify that the articles to which it is attached were actually made by him. Probasco v. Bouyon, 1 Mo. App. 241.

In the sale of a trademark for a certain tobacco to its manufacturer there is no false representation to the public, because the tobacco is still made at the same place and by the same person, and is in fact the same article. Witthaus v. Braun, 44 Md. 303, 22 Am. Rep. 44.

VI. Fraudulent sales.

The rules applicable to fraudulent sales generally seem to be the same in the case of fraudulent sales of trademarks.

The sale, by an executrix of a deceased partner, of the latter's interest in the good will and trademarks of the firm at a grossly inadequate price, induced by misrepresentations of the surviving partner, amounting to a breach of trust, will not be allowed to stand. Tennant v. Dunlop, 97 Va. 235, 33 S. E. 620.

The law requires a surviving partner, in buying the good will and trademarks of a firm, to put the representative of a deceased partner in as complete a condition of knowledge as himself. It is his duty to impart all information possessed or known by him as to their value, and he will not be allowed to reap any advantage from his failure to do so. Ibid.

Where the surviving partner has bought, at an inadequate price, his deceased partner's interest in the good will and trademarks of the firm, through misrepresentations amounting to a breach of trust, a court of equity will ascertain the value of the interest of the deceased partner at the dissolution of the firm, in the good will, brands, etc., purchased from his representative by the surviving partner, and will decree that the latter pay over its value, subject to a credit for the amount already paid by him. Ibid.

Fraudulent concealment of the fact that the value of a brand or trademark had been impaired by acts of the seller, the latter fraudulently representing it to be of good repute, and the purchaser relying on the representations, is a good defense to an action for the purchase price. Dant v. Head, 90 Ky. 255, 29 Am. St. Rep. 369, 13 S. W. 1073.

One who uses a trademark for four and a half years after he buys it cannot then have the sale rescinded on the ground of fraud and misrepresentation. Nerve Food Co. v. Robertson, 199 Pa. 486, 49 Atl. 234.

VII. Proof of sale.

The sale of a business and its trademarks by a partnership to a corporation being called L.R.A. (N.S.)

pable of direct and positive proof, the fact cannot be established by accidental expressions of witnesses, so as to entitle the corporation to the help of the court to stop an infringement. P. Lorillard Co. v. Peper, 65 Fed. 597. H. C. S.

NEW YORK COURT OF APPEALS.

JOSHUA C. SANDERS, Respt.,

v.

CHARLES T. SAXTON, Lieutenant Governor, et al., Appts.

(182 N. Y. 477.)

Tax sale—suit against state to cancel.

No suit lies to cancel a tax sale to the state as a cloud on title, since the state cannot be sued, and the result cannot be reached indirectly by making the officers of the state parties defendant.

(October 24, 1905.)

A PPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court, Second Department, affirming a judgment of a Special Term for Kings County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to cancel a tax deed as a cloud on title. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Julius M. Mayer, Attorney General, and Horace McGuire, for appellants:

This action is, in effect, an action against the state, and the state cannot be sued without its consent.

People v. Turner, 145 N. Y. 460, 40 N. E. 400.

The plaintiff must avail himself of his legal remedy by ejectment.

Moore v. Townshend, 102 N. Y. 387, 7 N. E. 401; Churchill v. Onderdonk, 59 N. Y. 134; Miller v. Long Island R. Co. 71 N. Y. 380; People ex rel. Millard v. Roberts, 151 N. Y. 543, 45 N. E. 941.

Case Note.—The closeness of the line of distinction between suits against state officers which are to be deemed actions against the state and those which are not is indicated by the fact that, in the above case of SANDERS v. SAXTON, the New York court of appeals reversed a decision in which two lower courts had agreed. The judges of the appellate division unanimously affirmed the decision of the supreme court at special term, holding that the suit could be maintained, while the court of appeals decides to the contrary, on the ground that it is a suit against the state.

In addition to the cases considered in the opinion, attention is called to the decision of the United States Supreme Court in Tindal v. Wesley, 167 U. S. 204, 42 L. ed. 137, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 770, in which a very Lloyd*, 167 N. Y. 431, 60 N. E. 741.

Cullen, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The action was brought by the plaintiff, as the owner in fee and possessor of certain lands in the late town of New Utrecht, in the county of Kings (now part of the borough of Brooklyn, in the city of New York), against the defendants, except the defendant Roberts, as commissioners of the land office of the state of New York, and against the defendant Roberts, as comptroller of said state, to have certain deeds executed by the comptroller to the people of the state on sales of said lands for unpaid taxes adjudged illegal and void and the record of the same in the registrar's office to be so marked, and to require the comptroller to cancel and vacate the record thereof in his office. Judgment was granted substantially as prayed for in the complaint, and that judgment affirmed by the appellate division, from which affirmance an appeal has been taken to this court.

At the threshold of the examination of this appeal there is presented to us the question of the right of the plaintiff to maintain an action of the character specified against the defendants as officers of the state. This question was raised in the trial court by a motion made at the opening of the case to dismiss the complaint on the ground that it stated no cause of action against the defendants and that the court had no jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the suit. To the denial of that motion the appellants properly excepted. The motion being made on the pleadings, no consideration of the sufficiency of the evidence is involved, and the exception survives the unanimous affirmance by the appellate division. We think the question has been erroneously decided by the courts below. That the action was not maintainable, and that the complaint should have been dismissed on the defendants' motion. It is elementary law that the state, being a sovereign, cannot be sued, except with its own consent (Cohen v. Virginia, 6 Wheat.

elaborate discussion of the decisions on this question can be found. That case held that an action against individuals to recover land of which they had actual possession and control was not to be deemed an action against the state simply because the individuals claimed to be in rightful possession as officers or agents of the state, and asserted title and right of possession in the state. But it held that the state would not be concluded by the judgment in that case, because the state was not a party to the suit. But the case of SANDERS v. SAXTON is distinguishable from this in the fact that the suit is brought to cancel deeds which are held by the state; that is, they have been executed to the state and belong to the state. Unless a deed can be canceled without making the grantee a party, the state is the real defendant in the suit.

A case that seems close to the line, but is nevertheless distinguishable, is that of Scottish Union & Nat. Ins. Co. v. Herriott, 109 Iowa, 606, 77 Am. St. Rep. 548, 80 N. W. 665, where it was held that an action by a foreign insurance company to recover from a state treasurer moneys, which he had collected from the company as taxes under an unconstitutional statute could be maintained, although the moneys had been paid over into the state treasury. But this was not maintainable on the theory that the state must pay back the money, but on the theory that, if the statute were unconstitutional, it could not constitute any protection to the treasurer for collecting the money, or in paying it over to anybody except the real owner.

So, a suit against the state auditor to prevent him from acting under an unconstitutional statute in making valuations of property for local officers, on the ground that, by doing so, he would create a cloud upon the complainant's title, was held in Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Henderson, 68 Fed. 588, not to be an action against the state; but in this case the court said that, in doing such act, the officer would not be acting for and in behalf of the state, because no valid statute gave him any authority to do it.

The case most similar to that of SANDERS v. SAXTON is Lowry v. Thompson, 25 S. C. 416, 1 S. E. 141, where an action was brought against the commissioners of the sinking fund of the state to recover the possession of deeds made by the plaintiff to a land commissioner of the state, on the ground that they had been delivered to an agent of the commissioner only for the purpose of examination and approval, precedent to the payment of the balance of the purchase money, but that they were surreptitiously put on record. The court held that the action was really against the state, and therefore could not really be maintained. A subsequent statute had abolished the office of land commissioner, and turned over the papers and affairs of his office to the secretary of state. This case, like the New York case, was therefore one in which the title of the state was in reality the subject of attack.

264, 5 L. ed. 257; Re Hoople, 179 N. Y. 308, 72 N. E. 229), subject, of course, to the one qualification, found in the Federal Constitution, that an action may be maintained by one state against another state. But, though the state cannot be subjected to hostile litigation at the instance of the individual, that immunity is not possessed by its officers, who can be held responsible for illegal trespasses or torts on the rights of an individual, even though they act, or assume to act, under the authority and pursuant to the directions of the state. This principle was established at quite an early period in our history by the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in Osborn v. Bank of United States, 9 Wheat. 738, 6 L. ed. 204. There the taxing officers of the state of Ohio threatened to collect a tax imposed by the state on a bank chartered by the United States, and had already seized part of the specie held by the bank. It being determined that the state could not constitutionally impose the tax on the bank, it was further held that the officers of the state were properly restrained from collecting the tax, and compelled to restore the funds they had already taken. In Davis v. Gray, 16 Wall. 203, 21 L. ed. 447, it was held that a state officer might be enjoined from executing a state law in conflict with the Federal Constitution, and from encumbering, by patents to others, lands which had been contracted to a railroad company. In United States v. Lee, 106 U. S. 196, 27 L. ed. 171, 1 Sup. Ct. Rep. 240, it was held that, while the United States could not be sued without their consent, still an action might be brought in ejectment to recover lands in the possession of the officers and agents of the United States. These cases and others fully support the doctrine that the officers and agents of the United States and of the states may be sued for their illegal acts or to recover property illegally possessed by them, despite the immunity of their principal.

That doctrine, however, does not cover the case now before us. The defendants are not in possession of the plaintiff's property, nor have they been. They have not committed, nor do they threaten to commit, any trespass thereon, or any other illegal act by which the rights of the plaintiff may be jeopardized or impaired. The action is both in effect and in form to cancel and remove the deeds to the people of the state of New York as clouds upon the plaintiff's title. The grantee in such a deed is plainly a necessary party to such an action, as it is the title of that grantee that is to be passed upon, and it cannot be adjudged void unless he is brought in court. No one would ordinarily think of disputing this proposition. 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

The only reason for omitting to make the state a party in this case is that it cannot be made a party, and for that reason it is sought to avoid the immunity that the state possesses by making its officers parties in its stead. But it is also settled by the decisions of the Supreme Court that "the United States are not bound by a judgment to which they are not parties, and that no officer of the government can, by defending a suit against private persons, conclude the United States by the judgment." Carr v. United States, 98 U. S. 433, 25 L. ed. 209; United States v. Lee, supra. Now, as the only object and purpose of a suit in equity to remove a cloud on the title to property is to have any adverse title that may be asserted under such cloud passed on and adjudged void, so that the plaintiff in possession may be forever afterwards free from any danger of the hostile claim, it would seem plain that, where the judgment in an action cannot conclude or bind a party claiming under the adverse title, the action must fail. It is true that in one of the earlier cases (Davis v. Gray, supra) it is said: "Where the state is concerned, the state should be made a party, if it could be done. That it cannot be done is a sufficient reason for the omission to do it, and the court may proceed to decree against the officers of the state in all respects as if the state were a party to the record." If these remarks are to be construed apart from the context of the opinion in which they are found, the proposition stated therein is far too broad, as it would entirely abrogate the immunity from suit which all the authorities concede the state possesses. But that the court intended to lay down no such rule is apparent from its subsequent decision in Louisiana v. Jumel, 107 U. S. 711, 27 L. ed. 448, 2 Sup. Ct. Rep. 128. In that case the state passed a statute compromising the claims of its bondholders by the issue of a new consolidated bond in substitution of its former debt, and declaring that the statute should be deemed a contract between the state and its bondholders. Subsequently, by an amendment to the state Constitution, the amount authorized to be raised by taxation of property within the state was limited and the interest on the consolidated bonds reduced. The holders of the consolidated bonds presented their coupons for payment, which was refused, and thereupon brought an action in equity to restrain the state officers from applying the proceeds of the state taxes to other purposes than the payment of said coupons. The court held that the statute under which the bonds were issued constituted a contract between the state and the holders of the bonds within the protection of the Federal Constitution.

But it further held that in reality the suit was a suit against the state itself, and therefore could not be maintained. In the prevailing opinion there is an exhaustive review of all the earlier decisions of the subject. It is shown that in the Osborn, the Davis, and the Lee Cases the actions were to restrain the commission of unlawful acts by the state or government officers for which the command of their principal afforded no justification, or to recover possession of property held equally without warrant of right. The distinction between those cases and the one then before the court is clearly pointed out, in that in the latter case the moneys sought to be reached were the moneys of the state, in the state treasury, impressed with no trusts, and the relation existing between the state and the bondholder was merely that of debtor and creditor. Accordingly it was held that such an action was essentially one against the state itself and therefore could not be maintained.

The same principle governs the case now before us. The title now sought to be adjudged void is the title of the people of the state, the defense of which has not been committed to any officer by whose appearance the state could be concluded. Nor is the decision in Louisiana v. Jumel limited or qualified by the subsequent decision in Rolston v. Missouri Fund Comrs. (Rolston v. Crittenden) 120 U. S. 390, 30 L. ed. 721, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 599. The distinction between the two cases is stated in a few sentences in the opinion in the later case: "But this case is entirely different from that [Jumel Case]. There the effort was to compel a state officer to do what a state prohibited him from doing. Here the suit is to get a state officer to do what a statute requires of him." The property rights of the plaintiff are not infringed by this decision. He is in possession of the land. If anyone should assume to enter upon it by ousting him from possession, he might defend that possession not only physically, but by actions in the courts, and, if the title of the state is invalid, successfully in the courts. Even in the case of a deed to an individual purchaser on a tax sale, we have held that the legislature may restrict or abolish the right of the owner of the land to relief in equity against the deed as a cloud on his title, since such owner, if in possession, may maintain his possession, and, if out of possession, may recover it by ejectment. Loomis v. Little Falls, 176 N. Y. 31, 68 N. E. 105. As we have not been referred to any statute authorizing a suit against the state for the matter set forth in the complaint, we are of opinion that the action cannot be maintained.

and that of the Special Term should be reversed, and the complaint dismissed, with costs, in all the courts.

NEW YORK COURT OF APPEALS.

PEOPLE OF THE STATE OF NEW YORK, Respt.,
v.

JAMES N. ABEEL, Appt.

(182 N. Y. 415.)

Forgery—commendatory letter.

Uttering a letter with a forged signature for the purpose of falsely representing the bearer to be a certain well-known person, friend of the writer, and giving him standing with persons to whom it may be presented, is forgery, under a statute declaring guilty of that offense any person who shall utter a letter purporting to have been signed by another in which the sentiments, opinions, conduct, character, prospects, interests, or rights of such other person shall be misrepresented or otherwise injuriously affected; the latter phrase referring to character, interests, etc., and not to sentiments and opinions.

(October 3, 1905.)

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court, First Department, affirming a judgment of the court of General Sessions of the Peace for the City and County of New York, convicting him of forgery. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinions.

Messrs. Jesse Stearns and Martin S. Lynch, for appellant:

The letter alleged to have been uttered is

Case Note.—The provisions of the New York Penal Code as to forgery of a letter or other instrument by which the sentiments, opinion, conduct, character, prospects, interests, or rights of the person whose name is signed thereto "shall be misrepresented or otherwise injuriously affected" make a distinct addition to the law of forgery. The question on which the courts divide is whether the misrepresentations referred to, which constitute forgery, must be injurious to the person whose name is forged. In addition to the opinions of the court of appeals, that of Recorder Goff is given herewith in a footnote, because of the analysis it makes of the different sections of the Code on the subject of forgery. If, to make the misrepresentations constitute forgery, they must be injurious to the person whose name is forged, and not simply to some other person who may be deceived by the false instrument, the provision in question would be narrower than the doctrine which has generally obtained in respect to forgery in other cases, as it has often been held that forgery of an instrument may be committed by signing a fictitious name to it. King v. Taft, 2 East, P. C. 959, 1 Leach, C. L. 172; State v. Hahn, 38 La. Ann. 169; State v. Givens, 5 Ala. 747; Wharton, Crim. Law, § 660.

The word "otherwise" is used in the section, not to qualify the verb "misrepresent,"

Likewise, a will fraudulently made in the name of a person who does not exist has been held a forgery. Reg. v. Avery, 8 Car. & P. 596.

So, the signing of a fictitious name to a promissory note has been held a forgery. State v. Wheeler, 20 Or. 192, 10 L. R. A. 779, 23 Am. St. Rep. 119, 25 Pac. 394.

And the same has been held in respect to the forgery of documents of other kinds.

The English cases cited in the opinion of Recorder Goff show that letters of recommendation have been held in England to be subjects of forgery, and this does not seem to have been held on the theory that such letters would create any legal liability on the part of the signers if they had been genuine. That opinion contains the most of the cases that are pertinent on this subject of letters of recommendation or introduction.

People v. Greenwall, 115 N. Y. 520, 22 N. E. 180; People v. Miles, 143 N. Y. 383, 38 N. E. 456.

Werner, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In the month of October, 1903, a young woman named Eleanor Anderson was employed as a telegraph operator by the Western Union Telegraph Company at one of its branch offices in the Grand Hotel in the city of New York. The defendant saw her there, was attracted by her, and sought an introduction. For the purpose of creating a favorable impression, he falsely represented himself to be J. Ogden Goelet, the son of a wealthy resident of New York, and his first step in that direction was to send a telegram to James N. Abeel (himself), signed J. Ogden Goelet, making an appointment at the University Club, and asking for an answer at the Grand Hotel. This telegram was delivered to Miss Anderson and transmitted by her. This was followed on the same day by a note from the defendant, asking Miss Anderson for the honor of an introduction, and apologizing for the method employed to obtain it. Without waiting for a written reply to his note, the defendant went to the Grand Hotel and verbally repeated to Miss Anderson his desire to be-

Though, on the other side, another case holding that a letter of introduction is not the subject of forgery is Foulkes v. Com. 2 Rob. (Va.) 836. In this case the letter states that the bearer will perform whatever he undertakes to do, and that he will probably want a stated sum of money, to which he will undoubtedly be accommodated.

To the same effect a certificate of character given to a colored person, stating that he was freeborn and of good behavior, was held not to be a subject of forgery in State v. Smith, 8 Yerg. 150.

Also in Com. v. Chandler, Thacher, Crim. Cas. 187, the court held that a fabrication of a certificate of character, to wit: "This is to certify that Vinson Chandler is a good young man, attentive to his duties, and a good disposition young man as I wish to have in my family," which was used to obtain a lucrative position, did not constitute forgery. But the court said that if the indictment had alleged that the defendant had fabricated the false certificate with the evil intent to be retained in service, and that, being so retained, he might fraudulently convert his employer's goods to his own use, he would have been guilty of a misdemeanor and punishable for such an offense; but the indictment did not contain such allegation, and there was nothing to show that the defendant did not possess the qualities described in the writing.

come acquainted with her. In this conversation the defendant suggested that he would try to find someone to give him a letter of introduction. Several days later the defendant again called on Miss Anderson, stating that he had been so fortunate as to attend a dinner at which he had met Mr. Van Every, one of the vice presidents of the telegraph company, from whom he had obtained a letter of introduction, which was somewhat general and informal, because the defendant had desired not to compromise or embarrass Miss Anderson. The defendant then presented the letter, which reads as follows:

New York, October 31, 1903.

To Any Employee Western Union Telegraph Company:

This will introduce Mr. J. O. Goelet, a personal friend of the management of this company. Any favors shown him will be duly appreciated by the corporation and myself.

Yours truly,

J. B. Van Every,

. 2d Vice President.

The presentation of this letter was followed by a series of visits and attentions on the part of the defendant, in the course of which he artfully strengthened the deception that he was a member of the prominent Goelet family, with the result that he proposed marriage to Miss Anderson on the Monday following their first meeting, was accepted on Tuesday, and the wedding day set for the ensuing Thursday. Meanwhile arrangements were made for the consummation of the marriage. The defendant gave Miss Anderson a check for $100,000, drawn on the Astor National Bank, signed "George B. De Witt, Cotrustee," and indorsed "J. Ogden Goelet." On the wedding day the defendant appeared at the home of Miss Anderson, gave her a marriage ring, and then, upon the pretext of going down stairs to attend an interview with newspaper reporters, he surreptitiously departed from the house, never to return. This is a bare outline of the events that led to the arrest, indictment, and conviction of the defendant upon the charge of forgery in the third degree.

The statute under which the defendant was indicted and convicted is subd. 3 of § 514 of the Penal Code, which, so far as pertinent to the case at bar, provides that "a person who . . . shall alter, or who shall cause, aid, abet, or otherwise connive at, or be a party to, the uttering of any letter, telegram, report, or other written communication, paper, or instrument purporting to have been written or signed by another person, . . . which said letter, telegram, report, or other written communication, paper, or instrument . . . as aforesaid, the person uttering the same shall know to be false, forged, or counterfeited, and by the uttering of which the sentiments, opinions, conduct, character, prospects, interests, or rights of such other person shall be misrepresented or otherwise injuriously affected, . . . is guilty of forgery in the third degree." The case rests entirely upon the facts established by the prosecution, as the defendant introduced no evidence. Thus the broad question presented by this appeal is whether these uncontroverted facts constitute the crime of forgery as defined in the statute above quoted. The most obvious feature of this statute is that it adds to the list of forgeries several that were not known to the common law or to our statutes as they existed prior to 1884. And since it is beyond dispute that the act charged against the defendant is not one that would have constituted the crime of forgery under the common law or the earlier statutes, it is evident that it will not be profitable to discuss the cases decided under the law as it then stood.

The power of the legislature to designate as statutory offenses acts that were lawful and innocent at common law is not challenged by the defense, and, indeed, is too well established to permit of doubt or discussion at this late day. We proceed, therefore, directly to the discussion of the statute and its bearing upon the act charged against the defendant. And here we are confronted with the difficulty that always exists when the technicalities of legal reasoning are brought to bear upon simple English. The able and ingenious arguments of counsel admirably illustrate the possibilities in this direction; but when we get away from the briefs, and look at the letter of the statute, it seems so plainly designed to cover just such a case as the one before us that it is like carrying coals to Newcastle to demonstrate it. The act committed by the defendant, and charged in the indictment, was the uttering of a letter containing the false representation that the defendant was Mr. J. O. Goelet, a friend of the management of the Western Union Telegraph Company, and bespeaking for him the favors of its employees. This letter purported to have been signed by J. B. Van Every, one of the vice presidents of that company. It was used to deceive a young woman, one of the employees of the company, into believing that the defendant was a young man whose financial and social position made him a most desirable acquaintance, and the result of that belief was that he was permitted to become a most welcome suitor. The record does not clearly disclose by what providential interference this insidious and dastardly attempt upon the honor and happiness of a young woman was intercepted just at the point of culmination; nor is it necessary that we should know, because the criminality of the defendant's act in uttering the letter in question depends wholly upon other considerations. That the letter was a falsehood from beginning to end, and that the use of Van Every's name thereon was unauthorized, is beyond dispute. That it thoroughly misrepresented any opinion or sentiment harbored by Van Every, or conduct indulged in by him towards the defendant, is clear; for it imputed to the supposed writer an acquaintance with the defendant as Mr. J. O. Goelet and a desire to introduce him in that capacity to the employees of the telegraph company, when in fact Van Every did not know him at all.

The statute declares a person guilty of forgery who knowingly utters a false or counterfeited letter, etc., by which the sentiments, opinions, conduct, character, prospects, interests, or rights of the person whose utterance the writing purports to be are misrepresented or otherwise injuriously affected. The coincidence between the act of the defendant and the declaration of the statute seems to be so complete that there would scarce be room for construction, if it were not for the technical suggestion that the word "misrepresented" is coupled with and qualified by the succeeding words "or otherwise injuriously affected." In our language there are frequently two or more possible constructions of sentences when their meaning may depend upon punctuation or upon the juxtaposition of certain words with others. The sentence under consideration is capable of a construction that will limit the forgeries punishable under subd. 3 of § 514 of the Penal Code to cases where the misrepresentation is literally injurious in its effect upon the person whose name is used. But that, we think, would be a strained and unnatural construction. The context of the subdivision in which it is placed seems to indicate that it was the purpose of the legislature to cover cases in which the mere misrepresentation is the gist of the offense, as well as other cases in which the act injuriously affects the person whose name is improperly used. When the sentence is thus construed, the word "otherwise" has a proper and natural meaning in connection with what precedes and follows it. It is perceivable that sentiments, opinions, conduct, and character may be misrepresented; but just how they may be injuriously affected is not so apparent. Prospects, interests, or rights, however, may be of such a material character as to be injuriously affected by misrepresentation of sentiments, opinions, conduct, and character. Thus, we think, the phrase "or otherwise injuriously affected" may properly be referred to prospects, interests, and rights, as distinguished from sentiments, opinions, etc., and in that view of the statute the crime of forgery in the third degree is committed whenever a person wilfully—that is, knowingly—misrepresents the sentiments, opinions, conduct, or character of another by means of a false, forged, or counterfeit writing, just as it may be committed in other cases through the injurious effect of such writing upon the prospects, interests, or rights of the person misrepresented.

In construing this statute several things are to be remembered. We are living in an age when the wisdom of legislatures and the learning of courts are put to the severest tests by the cunning and skill of the unscrupulous adventurer and the professional criminal. Statutes are rarely the precursors of crime. They usually follow in their wake. Our centers of population are infested with persons whose highest aim in life seems to be the circumvention of the criminal law by the invention of new crimes. The grosser crimes, such as murder, arson, and larceny, are easily defined and classified. The same is true of the more common forms of forgery and of many purely statutory crimes. Experience has shown, however, that no generic definition of forgery can be comprehensive enough to include all the crimes that may be committed by the simple use of pen and ink. And that is why the legislature has found it necessary to frame statutes so broad as to include in the category of forgeries many acts which are criminal in their tendency and effect, but do not fall within the earlier definitions of that crime. One needs only to glance over the chapter on forgeries in the Penal Code to appreciate how manifold are the methods by which the crime of forgery may be committed. In one class of cases the intent to defraud is of the essence of the crime. In another class the commission of the act presupposes criminal intent. In still another class the mere commission of the act constitutes the crime, without reference to criminal intent. The section under discussion (514) is fairly illustrative of this condition. Its first subdivision deals with the corrupt falsification, alteration, erasure, obliteration, and destruction of corporate, co-partnership, and individual books of account. Subdivision 2 relates to the forging, alteration, or counterfeiting of letters, telegrams, etc., with intent to injure or defraud, when the act injures any other person in his good name, standing, position, or general reputation. The third subdivision is the one relied upon by the prosecution, and the fourth deals with the forgery of tickets of admission and the like, in which the element of fraud is also an essential ingredient. As is clearly shown in the very lucid and exhaustive opinion of the learned recorder, written upon the motion in arrest of judgment, that portion of the Penal Code which includes § 514 deals with acts which an enlightened public policy finds it necessary to place in the category of crimes, but which, on account of the difficulty inherent in the subject, it is impossible to classify or define with precise accuracy; for they spring from a great variety of motives and purposes and are multifarious in their effect upon those against whom or in whose name they are committed. The legislature, in the exercise of its undoubted power, has chosen to classify as a forgery the act charged against the defendant. It is true that this act would not have been a forgery as that term was understood under the common law. It may be equally true that the same act might be punished with even greater effectiveness under a different name; but it is not the province of courts to legislate or to nullify statutes by overstrict construction. That is particularly true when the legislature has ordained a rule of construction. Section 11 of the Penal Code provides that "the rule that a penal statute is to be strictly construed does not apply to this Code or any of the provisions thereof, but all such provisions must be construed according to the fair import of their terms, to promote justice and effect the objects of the law." Tested by that simple rule, we think the indictment herein charges a crime which was established by ample evidence.

Some of the exceptions taken at the trial are covered by the general discussion upon the merits; and as to the others it is enough to say that we think no error was committed that requires a reversal of the judgment.

The judgment of the Appellate Division should therefore be affirmed.

Gray, Bartlett, and Haight, JJ., concur.

Cullen, Ch. J., dissenting:

I dissent from the affirmance of the conviction of the appellant in the courts below because, first, in my judgment, the statute under which he has been indicted does not include the offense proved against him, and, second, under any construction of the statute, the greater part of the evidence against the appellant was incompetent and immaterial; in other words, he has been indicted for one offense, and tried, convicted, and punished for a totally different offense. The section of the Penal Code (§ 514, subd. 3) 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

was enacted in 1884 as a new and original provision of the criminal law. It has no predecessor in either the statute or the common law, and I know of no similar legislation; but the meaning of the very words of the statute seems to me reasonably plain. The vital point of difference between the majority of the court and myself is the question whether, to constitute the offense, the misrepresentation of the sentiments, opinions, or conduct of the person whose name is unauthorizedly used must be injurious to such person, or whether mere misrepresentation, whether injurious or harmless, falls within the statute. I agree with the prevailing opinion that intent is not a necessary ingredient of the offense, except the intent to commit the prohibited act. I also agree with the proposition that the statute is not in any respect limited to obligations for the payment of money or affecting rights of property, which alone would be the subject of forgery at common law. In fact, I doubt whether the statute was primarily directed against offenses of that character. But I insist that the misrepresentation which this statute constitutes a felony must be injurious to the person whose name is forged. To this the majority of my brethren say, "No." In the learned prevailing opinion it is said, referring to the statute: "The sentence under consideration is capable of a construction that will limit the forgeries punishable under subd. 3 of § 514 of the Penal Code to cases where the misrepresentation is literally injurious in effect upon the person whose name is used. But that, we think, would be a strained and unnatural construction. The context of the subdivision in which it is placed seems to indicate that it was the purpose of the legislature to cover cases in which the mere misrepresentation is the gist of the offense." The best test I know of to determine whether a particular construction is natural and reasonable is to consider the results that follow from the particular construction. If those results are unreasonable, it is strong proof that the construction which leads to them is unnatural and unreasonable.

The doctrine about to be declared is that the fabrication of a letter misrepresenting the sentiments of another, regardless of the intent (which I concede), and regardless of the character or effect of the misrepresentation (which I deny), constitutes the perpetrator of the act a felon and a forger. I am entirely willing to admit that probably in all cases the fabrication of a letter is reprehensible; but one must be dead to all sense of proportion who does not appreciate that there are infinite differences in the moral culpability of such acts, from the comparatively harmless, though intensely silly, fabrication of an invitation to dinner, as a practical joke, to the utterance of a declaration which, if credited, might destroy a man's reputation or be injurious to his property and pecuniary interest. Assuming, in the case of a practical joker (always detestable), that the offender should be punished; should he be declared a felon? Our provisions for criminal punishment are far different from the old English Penal Code, which inflicted the same penalty on practically all offenses, from the theft of a handkerchief in a shop to the most atrocious of murders, to wit, death. If the character or effect of the misrepresentation is no element of the offense, then it is just as felonious to impute, by a fabricated letter, to the keeper of a brothel a belief in the moral obligation of chastity as to impute to an eminent divine or statesman the most degrading and infamous sentiments. The effect of this doctrine, which I combat, goes much further. The statute is general. It includes all misrepresentations of a person's sentiments, opinions, or conduct. It no way limits the subject as to which the sentiments or opinions relate, but, on the contrary, includes the infinite number of subjects on which it is possible for human beings to have sentiments or opinions,—religion, politics, law, ethics, esthetics, and so on indefinitely. If it be true that mere misrepresentation is sufficient to constitute the crime, and that injury, at least to someone, is not a necessary element of it, then it is a felony to misrepresent by a fabricated letter the sentiments or opinions of another upon the most academic question,—on the identity of the Man in the Iron Mask, on the authorship of the Junius Letters, on the relative merits of Austen and of the "Sweet Singer of Michigan," on the relative prowess of the two combatants at the last national prize fight, and on the superiority of the various entries for the next great horse race. In the case before us the only charge in the indictment is that the defendant uttered a false letter, purporting to bear Mr. Van Every's signature, stating, "Any favors shown him [the defendant] will be duly appreciated by the corporation and myself," thus representing that the writer desired the extension of favors to the defendant, when in fact he did not. Not a word is to be found in the indictment relating to the conduct of the defendant towards Miss Anderson (the real offense for which he was tried and convicted); indeed, her name is not mentioned in it, nor is there any charge in the indictment that the letter tended to injure, or was used to injure, Mr. Van Every or any other person.

The learned district attorney in his brief

suggests that the object of the statute was to prevent fraud or imposition on third parties by the production of forged letters. In reply to this it may be stated that such frauds upon third parties are very thoroughly covered by other provisions of the Penal Code, which punish obtaining money or property under false pretenses and procuring employment under forged letters of recommendation. But the conclusive evidence that the statute had no such object is that only misrepresentations of the sentiments, opinions, or conduct of the purported writer fall within the statute, which in no way includes false statements of facts, except facts constituting part of the conduct of the writer, nor misrepresentation of the sentiments or opinions of others than such writer. Such statements, to say the least, would be as apt to injure third parties as any statement of opinion. Thus the uttering of a fabricated letter asserting that A. was the president of some great financial institution and the owner of some specific piece of property of great value would constitute no offense, unless the utterer obtained, or sought to obtain, money or property on the strength of such letter, in which case, under another statute, the gist of the offense would be the obtaining of the money or property, or the attempt so to do; not the utterance of the letter; while if the letter were cast in the following form, "I regard A. as a very rich man," the offense would be complete at the time of its utterance, even though the sole object of A. was to pose as a man of great wealth and excite the admiration of the vulgar. If a boy over twelve (under twelve he would be presumed incapable of crime), desirous of attending a ball game, should present to his teacher a fabricated excuse purporting to be signed by his mother, "Please excuse Johnny from school to-morrow, as I wish to have his services at home," he would certainly fall within the provision of this statute as it is about to be construed, for the excuse would misrepresent the sentiments and opinions of his mother. That the boy should be soundly flogged I am entirely willing to concede, but I deny that he would be a felon, or that the legislature intended to declare him such. But a more incongruous result from the doctrine asserted remains. If the boy, having taken legal advice, should present as his excuse, "Johnny's aunt died yesterday, the funeral has been fixed for to-morrow," while in truth he had no aunt, or, if one, she was still living, these being merely statements of fact, Johnny, though a very bad boy, would not break any penal law of the state, but he would, or certainly should, be subjected to the flogging to which I have alluded. Equally true would this be of an excuse, purporting to be signed by the mother, which stated, "Johnny's father wishes you to excuse him from attendance at school to-morrow," because, under the statute, to constitute the offense the misrepresentation must be of the sentiments of the ostensible writer, not those of other persons.

The learned district attorney has appreciated the remarkable results that would follow from the doctrine that under this statute neither the subject-matter nor the effect of the misrepresentations is an element of the offense, and says that in the cases suggested no jury would convict. I think that ordinarily this would be so, but I had supposed that our Penal Code was not such as to require jurors to violate their oaths to avoid the perpetration of a great wrong,—not like the old English criminal law, where a jury at times found five guineas to be less in value than five shillings, to avoid the infliction of death for a petty crime.

The learned district attorney seems somewhat perplexed in ascertaining what was the real evil which this statute was intended to prevent or punish, at one time suggesting, as already stated, that it was to prevent fraud on third parties, and at another to punish libels that imputed to the ostensible writer of the letter degrading or infamous sentiments. The inquiry is important; for it is settled law that in the construction of a statute there must be considered the mischief intended to be remedied and the object to be attained by its enactment. Pierson v. People, 79 N. Y. 433, 35 Am. Rep. 524. So, also: "The circumstances existing at the time of the passage of the act, and which led to its passage, may be regarded for the purpose of furnishing something in the nature of a guide to its proper construction and interpretation." O'Brien v. New York, 139 N. Y. 548, 588, 35 N. E. 323, 337. In the case before us, though the statute has no predecessor, there is no mystery as to the mischief it was intended to prevent, nor as to the occurrence which led to its enactment. In the presidential campaign of 1880 there was attributed to one of the candidates a letter, asserted to be a forgery, which imputed to him the utterance of sentiments in no respect morally or intellectually discreditable, but which were deemed to be most injurious to his prospects of election. It was believed by a large number of our citizens that through this letter the candidate lost the votes of the Pacific states. The utterance of this letter, if forged, was a grievous offense, both against the individual and the public, and justly the subject of severe punishment. In 1884, to prevent a repetition of the offense at the presidential election then approaching, this statute was passed. It enacts that the utterance of a fabricated letter shall be a felony when by such letter the sentiments, opinions, or conduct of the supposititious author are misrepresented or otherwise injuriously affected. The use of the word "otherwise" in connection with "injuriously affected," clearly imports that the misrepresentation must be injurious, or the word "otherwise" has no meaning or application whatever. It is true the statute is carelessly drawn. Nevertheless, its meaning is to me perfectly clear. The misrepresentation must be injurious to the supposed writer. The statute was also properly drawn, so as not to limit the subject-matter on which the sentiments of the writer might be misrepresented. For a subject concerning which the misrepresentation of his opinions or sentiments might be of absolutely no importance to one man might be of vital consequence to another. Surely he must be an extreme partisan who would assert that the declaration of a belief in the doctrine of free trade or in that of protection reflects any discredit upon the person professing such belief. To the writer of this opinion it would be of no moment that his views on the tariff were misrepresented; but it would probably be fatal to the success of a candidate for Congress in the Pittsburg district to attribute to him the advocacy of free trade. The statute, of course, is not confined to misrepresentation of political opinions. There are many subjects as to which the misrepresentation of one's opinions might cause him great injury. To misrepresent one's sentiments towards his employers, or towards those from whom he was seeking employment, might lead to his discharge or prevent employment. To the great mass of people a misrepresentation of their sympathies in the present war between Russia and Japan would be of no possible consequence; but in the case of a party dealing with either belligerent such misrepresentation would be disastrous. It seems to me unreasonable that a man should be declared a felon for attributing to another a letter in which was expressed the opinion that Julia was more beautiful in person and more attractive in character than Alice, when the supposed writer had no acquaintance with either, and the only relation existing between them was the admiration of an occupant of a stall in a theater for the artist on the stage. But if the circumstances were different, and the writer were engaged to Alice, and the forged letter were used to break the engagement, then the perpetrator of the act would be properly convicted under the statute before us, and justly punished. If we construe the statute as, in my opinion, it is written,—that is to say, that the misrepresentation, to constitute a crime, must be injurious to the supposed author,—we eliminate all of what seem to me the extravagant and unreasonable results of a contrary doctrine. We are brought down to a simple and clear test of criminality. Was the misrepresentation injurious, or did it tend to injure the apparent writer? If it was, or did, the crime was committed, no matter to what subject the sentiments misrepresented related, whether politics, religion, or love. If the fabricated letter had no such tendency or effect, then it was not within the statute.

I may here add another consideration which I think should attract the attention of anyone seeking to elucidate the statute. By it not only is the utterance of a forged letter made a crime, but the utterance of anything that purports to be a copy of such letter, when no letter exists. No similar provision is found elsewhere in the law, either common or statute. This clearly shows that, as I have stated, it was the so-called Morey letter that led to the enactment of the law. In that case the publication of what was asserted to be a copy of the letter written by the candidate was just as injurious to the candidate as the production of the forged letter itself. In fact, not one in a thousand, and probably not a single one, of those whose votes are supposed to have been influenced by it, ever saw or could have seen the original letter.

But, even if the doctrine of the prevailing opinion be adopted, there was a fatal error in the admission of evidence on the trial. The so-called letter of introduction, which is the subject of the indictment, was presented to Miss Anderson, and from that time forward no further allusion was made to it. Then the offense was complete. Despite this, the prosecution was allowed to prove, under objection and exception, that after the introduction to Miss Anderson the defendant paid her the attentions of a suitor, and finally, after the lapse of some time, became engaged to be married to her. On the day fixed for the marriage, either through baseness or through fear of exposure, the defendant absconded. The prosecution was allowed to prove that during the period of his attentions to Miss Anderson the defendant gave to her a check for $100,000 purporting to be signed by the executor of a deceased Mr. Goelet. That the conduct of the defendant towards this young lady was base and despicable to the last degree is certain, but, under the doctrine of the prevailing opinion, that the effect of the misrepresentation is no ingredient of the offense, what possible materiality had his subsequent conduct on the trial of this indictment? The defendant, under the guise of a member of a family of wealth and social position, sought by imposture to obtain the hand of the lady. But, under the law about to be declared, he would have been equally criminal had the deception been of an opposite character, and he had really been Prince Charming masquerading as a peasant. This defendant has been indicted simply for uttering the false letter of Mr. Van Every. He has been tried, convicted, and punished for an imposture practised on Miss Anderson, to which no reference of any character is to be found in the indictment. Such a practice is to be deprecated; especially so when, as in this case, it is by no means clear that the real offense of the defendant cannot be punished under other statutes.

The judgment appealed from should be reversed, and the defendant discharged, unless a new indictment is presented against him at the next term of the court in which he was convicted.

O'Brien and Vann, JJ., concur with Cullen, Ch. J.

The opinion of Recorder Goff, mentioned in the prevailing opinion, was as follows:

On the 21st day of April, 1904, the defendant was, by verdict of a jury, convicted of forgery in the third degree, and, on being arraigned for judgment, moved in arrest thereof on various grounds.

A motion in arrest of judgment can be founded only on an objection to the jurisdiction of the court, or on the ground that the facts stated in the indictment do not constitute a crime. Crim. Code, §§ 331, 467; People v. Buddensieck, 103 N. Y. 496, 57 Am. Rep. 766, 9 N. E. 44; People v. Menken, 36 Hun, 99; People v. Kelly, 94 N. Y. 526. There being no question as to the jurisdiction of the court, the motion, therefore, will be considered only as resting upon the ground that the facts stated in the indictment do not constitute a crime.

In substance, the indictment alleges that the defendant did feloniously utter a certain false and forged letter purporting to have been written and signed by one John B. Van Every, the second vice president of the Western Union Telegraph Company, as follows:

New York, October 31, 1903.

To Any Employee, Western Union Telegraph Company.

This will introduce Mr. J. O. Goelet, a personal friend of the management of this company. Any favors shown him will be duly appreciated by the corporation and myself.

Very truly,

J. B. Van Every,

2d Vice President.

Which said letter the defendant knew to be false, and by the uttering of which the sentiments, opinions, conduct, and rights of said John B. Van Every were misrepresented.

On this motion all of the essential allegations contained in the indictment must, by the verdict of the jury, be deemed proven; and, assuming them to be so proven, the question arises whether the acts of the defendant constitute the crime of forgery. If the general rule at common law, that, to be the subject of forgery, a writing must be false and in such form as to be the means of defrauding another, and which, if genuine, would operate as the foundation of another's liability, be applied to the writing set out in the indictment, it must manifestly be held that such writing is not the subject of forgery. Of these three essentials it contains but one,—falsity,—while from its language, either in parts or as a whole, it cannot be construed as a means by which another could be defrauded, or by which a pecuniary liability could be created. There is at common law another essential of forgery, and that is the intent to defraud; but that is an attribute of the person who forges or utters, and is a question of fact, independent of the elements which the writing itself must contain. Therefore, since forgery, as defined at common law, cannot be predicated upon the writing made or uttered by the defendant, the conviction cannot be sustained unless, by recourse to statute law, authority be found which declares such writing to be forgery. If the statute in terms declares such writing to be a forgery, though devoid of some of the elements essential at common law, it is of little avail to either consider or cite authorities based on that system, or authorities from other jurisdictions where the law is not analogous to our own, and my attention has not been called to any case in any jurisdiction which has been decided under a statute similar or substantially so to the statute under which this indictment was drawn.

In order to correctly ascertain the meaning of the statute, it is necessary that it be examined in the light of the following rules: (a) that the legislative intent must be taken as expressed by the words which the legislature has used; (b) that those words must be taken in their natural sense, and to intend what they mean; and (c) that, where such meaning is plain, there is no room for construction. Story, J., in Martin v. Hunter, 1 Wheat. 326, 4 L. ed. 102; Bronson, J., in Waller v. Harris, 20 Wend. 555, 32 Am. Dec. 590; Forrest v. Forrest, 10 Barb. 46; Jones v. Harrison, 6 Exch. 328.

The Penal Code, while consisting of many hundreds of sections, is, so far as its object and purpose are concerned, to be construed as a single statute; and it was enacted for the purpose of embodying in a single statute the system of criminal law applicable to the state. People v. Jaehne, 4 N. Y. Crim. Rep. 478, 103 N. Y. 193, 8 N. E. 374. One of its objects, as expressed in § 7, is to define the nature of the various crimes; and in § 3 it defines a crime to be an act or omission forbidden by law. In § 11 it is declared that: "The rule that a penal statute is to be strictly construed does not apply to this 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Code or any of the provisions thereof, but all such provisions must be construed according to the fair import of their terms, to promote justice and effect the objects of the law."

The old rule of strict construction of a penal statute, therefore, does not apply; and in any event the construction of a penal statute must not be so strict as to defeat its plain intent (State v. Main, 31 Conn. 572), but it must be so construed as fairly to suppress the mischief and advance the remedy (Parkinson v. State, 14 Md. 184, 74 Am. Dec. 522).

It must be borne in mind that the Code does not in general terms define forgery, while it does define other crimes, such as homicide, robbery, larceny, extortion, etc.; and, in order to ascertain what act or acts constitute forgery, the several sections which treat of the subject, and their subdivisions, must be examined; and from such an examination it is clearly apparent that all of the sections, and the subdivisions thereof, are not interdependent or governed by a general definition. Thus §§ 509 and 511 severally declare that certain acts described and enumerated, when done with intent to defraud, shall constitute forgery. Section 510 declares that falsely certifying to an acknowledgment is forgery, but there is no mention of an intent to defraud. Section 514, in the first subdivision, declares that a person who falsifies or unlawfully and corruptly alters or destroys, etc., or (in the second) who, with intent to injure or defraud, shall falsely make any letter by which any person shall be injured in his good name or reputation, or (in the third) who shall utter any letter which he knows to be false, by which the sentiments of another person shall be misrepresented, or (in the fourth) who, with intent to defraud, shall forge a ticket of admission, etc., is guilty of forgery. Section 515 declares that a person who, with intent to defraud, or to conceal any larceny by any person, either alters or destroys an account, or makes a false entry, or wilfully omits to make a true entry, is guilty of forgery. Section 516 declares that a person who, with intent to defraud, forges a railroad ticket, or who sells, or who, with knowledge, receives, is guilty of forgery. Section 517 declares a person who forges or counterfeits a stamp of the government, or who sells it with knowledge, is guilty of forgery. An analysis of those sections and their subdivisions shows that the essential of forgery is, in two sections and one subdivision of another, an intent to defraud; in another section, an intent to defraud or conceal; in another section, an intent to defraud or knowledge of the falsity; in one subdivision of another section, the doing of the act falsely or unlawfully or corruptly; in another subdivision of the same section, an intent to injure or defraud; in another subdivision of the same section, knowledge of the falsity; and in two different sections, the doing of the act without an intent to defraud. If all forgeries were predicated on an intent to defraud, may it not be correctly assumed that the legislature would have grouped all of the things enumerated, and made their criminality depend on an intent to defraud, as in larceny, for instance, where the criminality of all the acts prohibited is predicated on an intent to deprive or defraud? Evidently the legislature did not intend such a general classification, for, while it describes a variety of acts as being subjects of forgery, it carefully discriminates in different sections and subdivisions those acts which depend for their criminality on what Sir James Fitzjames Stephens, in Reg. v. Tolson, L. R. 23 Q. B. Div. 168, calls the "mental element" of crime, from those acts which ipso facto constitute the crime. In other words, if a crime be fully defined, whatever satisfies that definition amounts to a crime. Can the power of the legislature be questioned to declare an act, otherwise indifferent, criminal either with or without a particular intent? Thus, the sale of liquor within prohibited hours is made a crime, without regard to any particular intent; so the false certification of an acknowledgment, or the counterfeiting of a postage stamp, is declared to be forgery, irrespective of any particular intent; and "intent" here is used in the sense of a necessary ingredient of the crime, which must be alleged and proved.

By chapter 53, p. 75, of the Laws of 1874 (since repealed and its sense incorporated in an amendment to the Penal Code), the legislature declared a person who presented a forged letter of recommendation, and thereupon obtained employment, to be guilty of a misdemeanor, and such crime was not made to depend on an intent to injure or defraud.

In no act of the legislature is the intent made more plain to differentiate acts which are declared forgeries, because of the different mental elements necessary to each, than in § 514 of the Penal Code, defining forgery in the third degree. In the first subdivision it is necessary that the acts described be done corruptly and unlawfully; in the second, that the acts be done with intent to injure or defraud; in the third, that the acts be done with knowledge of their falsity; and in the fourth, that the acts be done with intent to defraud. These subdivisions were inserted in the Code by different enactments. See 3 Laws 1881, chap. 676, p. 130; Laws 1884, chap. 378, p. 462; Laws 1892, chap. 692, p. 1417. Each subdivision contains a complete summation of the acts which constitute the crime, and may therefore be considered as an independent statute. The disjunctive form of phraseology used throughout the section shows that forgery may be committed in any one of the various ways specified in the four subdivisions, each one of which is independent of the others and not in any way correlative. "Provisions in the alternative are common in legislation, and the rule is that whatever is within any one of the dis-junctively connected clauses is within the statute." Bishop, Written Laws, § 244. And from the inclusion of the terms which constitute the gravamen of the crime in one subdivision, and the exclusion of those same terms in defining the gravamen of the crime in another subdivision, it is clear that the legislature intended that the different groups of acts in each subdivision should depend for their criminality upon different mental elements of crime, and not, as in §§ 509 and 511, where all forgeries in the first and second degrees are made to depend upon the one mental element of crime,—the intent to defraud. And it is also clear that the framers of those subdivisions had in mind the difference between the things objective, as applied to property, and the things subjective, as applied to personalty. Thus the acts enumerated in subdivisions 2 and 4 depend for their criminality on an intent to defraud,—that is, to defraud some person of property,—while the acts enumerated in subdivisions 1 and 3 depend for their criminality upon a mental element attributable to the person, and not necessarily affecting property. The distinction between a prohibited act, the commission of which of itself constitutes the crime, and an act which depends for its criminality on an intent to defraud, was pointed out in People v. Wiman, 85 Hun, 320, 32 N. Y. Supp. 1037. Subdivision 3, under which the indictment was drawn, reads: "[A person] who shall utter [utter], . . . or be a party to the uttering of any letter, . . . or other written communication, paper, or instrument, purporting to have been written or signed by another person, . . . which said letter . . . or other written communication, paper, or instrument . . . the person uttering the same shall know to be false, forged, or counterfeited, and by the uttering of which the sentiments, opinions, conduct, character, prospects, interests, or rights of such other person shall be misrepresented, or otherwise injuriously affected,"—is guilty of forgery in the third degree.

There are three component parts of the crime defined in this subdivision: (a) The uttering of a forged or false writing, (b) the knowledge of its falsity, and (c) the misrepresentation by the false writing of the sentiments, opinions, conduct, or rights of another person. The uttering of the false writing is a fact, the knowledge of its falsity is a fact, and the misrepresentation is a fact which may be inferred from the false writing itself. Did the writing in question misrepresent? The first clause of the letter, "This will introduce Mr. Goelet," misrepresented conduct; for conduct consists in behavior, action; and an introduction is an act. "A personal friend of the management of this company," misrepresented sentiment; for friendship is a feeling, an opinion, expressed by a sentiment. "Any favors shown him will be duly appreciated," misrepresented both sentiment and opinion; and "Very truly, J. B. Van Every," as a signature, misrepresented the right of Mr. Van Every to APPEAL by plaintiff from a decree of the Circuit Court for Ford County in favor of defendants in an action brought for the assignment of dower. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Schneider & Schneider and W. N. Carpenter, for appellant:

The records and judicial proceedings, authenticated, shall have such faith and credit given to them in every court within the United States as they have by law or usage in the courts of the states from whence the said records are, or shall be, taken.

U. S. 1, 4, 29 L. ed. 535, 536, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 242; Bradley v. Drone, 187 Ill. 175, 79 Am. St. Rep. 214, 58 N. E. 304; Bermudez Asphalt Paving Co. v. Gibson, 106 Ill. App. 6; 2 Bishop, Mar. Div. & Sep; Dow v. Blake, 148 Ill. 76, 39 Am. St. Rep. 156, 35 N. E. 761; Lawrence v. Nelson, 113 Iowa, 277, 57 L. R. A. 601, 85 N. E. 84.

The question of the jurisdiction of the court to render the decree was necessarily before the court in the latter proceeding, and must have been determined.

Van Matre v. Sankey, 148 Ill. 556, 23 L. R. A. 665, 39 Am. St. Rep. 196, 36 N. E. 628; Knowlton v. Knowlton, 155 Ill. 161, 39 N. E. 595.

The presumption is that the notice was sufficient.

necessary to support the decision in the FORREST CASE; but, since the court, in the latter case, in effect disavows the strict rule of the Galpin Case, the question before it was a very narrow one, being merely whether the fact that the record disclosed a paper purporting to be an affidavit of nonresidence, but not signed or sworn to, upon which the warning order appears to have been issued, was sufficient to displace the presumption which would otherwise have been indulged in support of the jurisdiction. Its decision upon this narrow question finds support in earlier decisions in the same state, and in other states, that are quite closely in point.

Thus, in Tucker v. People, 122 Ill. 583, 13 N. E. 809 (cited in the opinion), a decree of divorce rendered in Utah upon publication was held subject to collateral attack, because the first publication, as shown by the record, was only thirty-five days before the date of the decree, while the law of the territory, given in evidence, required that forty days should intervene. It does not, however, expressly appear that the foreign decree, like that involved in the FORREST CASE, contained a general recital of due service.

In Werner v. Werner, 30 Ill. App. 159, it was held that a decree of divorce rendered in Indiana on publication was void on the face of the record, the decree merely reciting notice and affidavit of publication, and that it appeared to the satisfaction of the court that the defendant had been duly notified; there being nothing in the record to show compliance with the provision of the statute which made it the duty of the clerk of the court to forward to the defendant by mail a paper with a marked notice.

In Clark v. Thompson, 47 Ill. 25, 95 Am. Dec. 457 (cited in the opinion), it was held that a domestic decree for an administrator's sale of real estate was subject to collateral attack; the record merely showing that service for minor heirs was acknowledged by their guardian, and failing to disclose any other attempt to comply with the statute, which provided, in the alternative, for service by publication of notice for the prescribed period, or personal service of a notice with a copy of the petition and account of the administration.

In Mickel v. Hicks, 19 Kan. 578, 27 Am. Rep. 161, it was held that a general finding or recital, in a domestic judgment or order, of "due service," would not avail to support the judgment or order upon collateral attack, where the actual service shown by the record was not in compliance with the statute. (Brewer, J., intimated that he was of a different opinion.)

In Barber v. Morris, 37 Minn. 194, 5 Am. St. Rep. 836, 33 N. W. 559, the court held that a domestic judgment rendered on service by publication was subject to collateral attack, because it appeared from the record that the affidavit of nonresidence prescribed by the statute was filed after, and not before, the service as required by the statute, notwithstanding the recital in the judgment that the summons had been duly served. The court held (overruling Gemmell v. Rice, 13 Minn. 400, Gil. 371) that, where the record sets forth the manner in which the summons was served, and that is ineffectual to confer jurisdiction, it will not be presumed that a valid service was made in some other way.

So, where a journal entry of a finding recites due service "as shown by the return of the sheriff," if such return is insufficient, the finding is not conclusive in a collateral attack upon the judgment entered thereon. Harris v. Sargeant, 37 Or. 41, 60 Pac. 608.

In Palmer v. McMaster, 8 Mont. 186, 19 Pac. 585, domestic judgments purporting to have been rendered upon service by publication were held subject to collateral attack, because the record did not contain an affidavit of nonresidence and an order for publication, which were required by statute as conditions of service by publication. This case on its facts is quite similar to the FORREST CASE, but, unlike the latter case, was decided under the strict rule declared in the Galpin Case already referred to.

Upon the other hand, the decision in the FORREST CASE is opposed by some decisions closely in point. Thus, in Matthews v. Hoff, 113 Ill. 90, where the record of a domestic decree rendered at the August term Hannas v. Hannas, 110 Ill. 62; Millett v. Pease, 31 Ill. 377; Tibbs v. Allen, 27 Ill. 119; Prout v. People, 83 Ill. 154; Miller v. Handy, 40 Ill. 448; Reddick v. State Bank, 27 Ill. 145; Connely v. Rue, 148 Ill. 207, 35 N. E. 824; Burke v. Donovan, 60 Ill. App. 241.

The recitals of the record show the jurisdiction.

Tallman*, 68 Ark. 211, 56 S. W. 1071.

Messrs. Cloud & Thompson and Welty, Sterling, & Whitmore, for appellees:

Where an affidavit is required before a of court disclosed a summons returnable to the July term, but did not show any summons issued after that term, and none could be found upon diligent search, the court, nevertheless, indulged the presumption, in support of the jurisdiction and of the recital of the decree that the "defendant had due legal notice," that another summons had been issued and served.

So, where a domestic decree finds there was due service of process upon a defendant, although the summons issued three terms before showed a defective service, it will be presumed, in favor of the finding, that another summons was issued and served properly. Mulvey v. Gibbons, 87 Ill. 367.

The record of a domestic judgment collaterally attacked in Hardy v. Beaty, 84 Tex. 362, 31 Am. St. Rep. 80, 19 S. W. 778, disclosed a paper purporting to be an affidavit for publication, but it was not sworn to, and, concededly, could not be regarded as an affidavit at all. The court nevertheless indulged the presumption that a proper and sufficient affidavit had been made, the contrary not being otherwise affirmatively shown by the record. So, in Iiams v. Root, 22 Tex. Civ. App. 413, 55 S. W. 411, where the record disclosed an affidavit of publication, not in accordance with the recitals in the petition, it was presumed, upon a collateral attack, that another and sufficient affidavit had been made.

In Newcomb v. Newcomb, 13 Bush, 544, 26 Am. Rep. 222, it was held that the absence of an affidavit for a warning order from the record of a domestic decree of divorce rendered on constructive service did not subject it to collateral attack, as it would be presumed that the warning order was entered by the court as required by the Code. This, however, was merely a case of a failure of the record to show a step essential to jurisdiction, and in that respect is unlike the FORREST CASE where the record disclosed an apparent, but unsuccessful, attempt to comply with the statutory requisites of jurisdiction.

The recital in a judgment that the default of the defendant had been regularly entered is not overcome on collateral attack by the fact that the only affidavit of publication of summons contained in the judgment roll was filed after the expiration of the time required by statute for the service and return of summons. Sacramento Bank v. Montgomery, 146 Cal. 745, 81 Pac. 138. The court said that the recital may have been based upon another affidavit, which had been lost or omitted from the record.

In Hilbish v. Hattle, 145 Ind. 59, 33 L. R. A. 783, 44 N. E. 20, it was held that the recital in a decree of divorce rendered in Missouri, that the defendant was duly summoned as the law directs, in connection with the fact that the summons was served outside the state as required by the Missouri statute in case of nonresidence, was quite sufficient to defeat a collateral attack upon the decree, upon the ground that it did not appear from the record that an affidavit of nonresidence was ever filed, as required by the Missouri statute in case of publication of notice or personal service outside the state.

It was held in Adams v. Cowles, 95 Mo. 501, 6 Am. St. Rep. 74, 8 S. W. 711, that the failure to find an affidavit of nonresidence among the files was not sufficient to overthrow a decree rendered upon service by publication, where the order of publication recited that the action was "commenced by petition and affidavit," and there was nothing in the record specifically contradicting the recital of due service in the decree, and no extrinsic evidence sufficient to overcome the presumption of jurisdiction. The inference from the opinion, however, is that, if the record had, as in the FORREST CASE, contained a defective affidavit, or a paper purporting to be an affidavit which was not in fact such, the judgment would have been held subject to collateral attack.

When, as in the FORREST CASE, the question is simply whether the general presumption in favor of jurisdiction—which obtains when the record contains a general recital on the point, and there is no affirmative disclosure by the record inconsistent with that general recital—is overcome by an affirmative showing on the face of the record, the decision necessarily turns upon the strength of that showing, and may be affected by comparatively very slight variations in the record; so that each case depends very largely upon its own facts, and a decision in one case is of comparatively slight value as a precedent for another, unless there is a very close resemblance between the records involved in the two cases.

warning order, or before making publication, the absence of the affidavit is fatal to jurisdiction.

Barber v. Morris, 37 Minn. 194, 5 Am. St. Rep. 836, 33 N. W. 559; Beckett v. Cuenin, 15 Colo. 281, 22 Am. St. Rep. 399, 25 Pac. 167; Oelberman v. Ide, 93 Wis. 669, 57 Am. St. Rep. 947, 68 N. W. 393; Memphis Land & Timber Co. v. St. Francis Levee District, 70 Ark. 409, 68 S. W. 242.

Judgments entered without jurisdiction are void.

Dickey v. Chicago, 152 Ill. 468, 38 N. E. 932; Miller v. Handy, 40 Ill. 448.

Foreign judgments may be attacked collaterally for want of jurisdiction.

Pennoyer v. Neff, 95 U. S. 714, 24 L. ed. 565; Tucker v. People, 122 Ill. 583, 13 N. E. 809.

Findings of a court as to jurisdiction are not conclusive where the record on its face shows want of jurisdiction.

Goudy v. Hall, 30 Ill. 109; Law v. Grommes, 158 Ill. 492, 41 N. E. 1080; Hemmer v. Wolfer, 124 Ill. 435, 16 N. E. 652; Payson v. People, 175 Ill. 267, 51 N. E. 588.

A record must affirmatively show jurisdiction where it is based upon publication, or it is void collaterally.

Baldwin v. Ferguson, 35 Ill. App. 393.

Cartwright, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Appellant filed in the circuit court of Ford county her petition for the assignment to her of dower in 120 acres of land in said county, alleging that she was the widow of Frederick Fey, to whom she was married in Arkansas, and making the appellees, Anna K. Fey, from whom she alleged that Frederick Fey had been divorced before his marriage to her, and the heirs of Frederick Fey and John A. Montelius, defendants. The answers to the petition raised an issue as to the validity of the divorce obtained by Frederick Fey in the chancery court of Arkansas county, Arkansas, and alleged that it was void for want of jurisdiction in said court. The cause was referred to a special master to take and report the evidence, and upon a hearing of the evidence so taken the petition for dower was dismissed and this appeal was prosecuted.

Frederick Fey was the owner of 200 acres of land in Ford county, in this state, and lived upon it with his wife, Anna K. Fey, and their children. In the spring of 1897 he went to Arkansas, and bought a piece of land and remained there a few weeks. He returned and remained at home with his wife and children until the spring of 1899, when he again went to Arkansas, and came back in the fall of that year. He remained 1 L.R.A. (N.S.) at home with his wife and family for about three weeks, and again left for Arkansas on November 4, 1899. While at home he and his wife, Anna K. Fey, conveyed the farm to John A. Montelius, who gave back the following contracts, one to Frederick Fey, agreeing to convey to him 120 acres upon his obtaining a divorce from his wife and paying her $1,000, and the other agreeing to convey 80 acres to Anna K. Fey when her husband obtained a legal divorce from her:

Piper City, Illinois, Nov. 1, 1899.

Whereas, Fred Fey and wife have this day deeded to me their farm upon this condition, that in order to settle their differences I am to hold the title to said land until Fred Fey procures a legal divorce from his wife and pays to said Anna K. Fey the sum of one thousand dollars as a settlement in full for her dower interest in the east half of the southeast quarter and the southwest quarter of the southeast quarter of section twenty-two (22), town twenty-six (26) north, range nine (9) east of the third principal meridian. When this is done said party of second part agrees to deed this part of the farm to said Fred Fey.

Witness: George D. Montelius.

Piper City, Illinois, Nov. 1, 1899.

Whereas, Fred Fey and Anna K. Fey have deeded to me their farm in settlement of their differences, as soon as Fred Fey procures a legal divorce party of the second part agrees to reconvey the east half of the northeast quarter of section twenty-two (22), town twenty-six (26) north, range nine (9) east of the third principal meridian.

Anna K. Fey.
John A. Montelius.

On April 24, 1900, Frederick Fey filed in the chancery court of Arkansas county, Arkansas, his bill for divorce from his wife, Anna K. Fey, and on August 9, 1900, a decree of divorce was entered, finding that said Anna K. Fey abandoned said Frederick Fey in March, 1898, and annulling their marriage. On August 14, 1900, Frederick Fey was married to appellant, Mrs. Lou Walker. In October, 1900, Frederick Fey died, and appellant was afterwards married to Morgan Forrest.

The only question which will be considered is whether the chancery court of Arkansas county, Arkansas, acquired jurisdiction to hear and determine the suit for divorce of Frederick Fey against Catarina Fey, as Anna K. Fey was styled in that proceeding, and all other questions raised and argued by counsel will be ignored. The defendant Anna K. Fey resided in this state and did not appear in the suit. The service upon her was by publication of a warning order. The statute of Arkansas provides that when it appears by the affidavit of the plaintiff, filed in the clerk's office at or after the commencement of an action, that the defendant is a nonresident of the state, the clerk shall make upon the complaint an order warning such defendant to appear in the action within thirty days from the time of making the order. The affidavit required by the statute before a warning order is made and publication thereof, is jurisdictional, and if the affidavit is not made it is fatal to the jurisdiction. Memphis Land & Timber Co. v. St. Francis Levee District, 70 Ark. 409, 68 S. W. 242. No affidavit was found in the files or of record in the cause, and there was no finding by the court that such an affidavit was ever filed, but there was attached to the bill of complaint a draft of an affidavit, not signed or sworn to, as follows:

Now on this day comes the complainant, Frederick Fey, who on his oath says that the foregoing complaint is true. And he further states that the defendant, Catarina Fey, is a nonresident of the state of Arkansas, and asks that a warning order be issued.

Subscribed and sworn to before me this — day of April, A. D. 1900.

No. 400.—Frederick Fey vs. Catarina Fey.

Indorsed:

Filed in my office and L. C. Smith appointed atty. ad litem, and warning order issued, April 24, 1900.

L. C. Gibson, Clerk.

H. B. Dudley, D. C.

William Carpenter, for Plaintiff.

The warning order so issued, dated April 24, 1900, and signed by the clerk, was published in a newspaper for four successive weeks. In the decree for divorce the court found that the defendant had been properly served by a warning order published in fit and ample time, but found nothing as to the affidavit.

One of the grounds upon which it is contended that the decree of divorce was void is that Frederick Fey had no legal ground for a divorce and that the decree was obtained by fraudulent averments and proof. Whether he had any legal ground for a divorce, or whether the allegations or his bill of complaint, or the proofs to sustain them, 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

were true or false, does not affect the validity of the decree if the court had jurisdiction to enter it. Where a transcript of a decree entered by a court of another state, duly certified, is offered in evidence in this state, no questions are open to inquiry except questions of jurisdiction (McMillan v. Lovejoy, 115 Ill. 498, 4 N. E. 772), including fraud affecting the jurisdiction or the discretion of the court to exercise such jurisdiction (Dunham v. Dunham, 162 Ill. 589, 35 L. R. A. 70, 44 N. E. 841). After a court has acquired jurisdiction its findings are conclusive in all collateral proceedings, and a decree rendered by the chancery court of Arkansas, if it had jurisdiction, has the same effect in every other state as in the state where it was rendered, and is conclusive on the merits of the controversy, no matter what fraud may have intervened. Ambler v. Whipple, 139 Ill. 311, 32 Am. St. Rep. 202, 28 N. E. 841. In the absence of jurisdiction to pronounce a decree it is absolutely void, and may be attacked either directly or collaterally. Where a court of general jurisdiction proceeds to adjudicate a cause there is a presumption of jurisdiction; but this presumption applies only when the record is silent upon the question, and, if there is an affirmative showing in the record that there was no jurisdiction, the judgment or decree will be void. Where the decree is silent as to the jurisdiction of the court over the defendants, if there is no evidence showing that the jurisdiction was not acquired, it will be presumed that the court had jurisdiction. Benefield v. Albert, 132 Ill. 665, 24 N. E. 634. Where a decree is silent as to the service of process, and the summons in the case shows want of or insufficient service, the presumption of jurisdiction is overcome. Swearngen v. Gulick, 67 Ill. 208. If it appears from the whole record in a case that the court did not have jurisdiction, the presumption in favor of jurisdiction is overcome. Osgood v. Blackmore, 59 Ill. 261. When the record itself shows a service which is insufficient, and there is no finding from which it may be presumed that there is another service, the presumption in favor of jurisdiction is rebutted. Clark v. Thompson, 47 Ill. 25, 95 Am. Dec. 457. Where the record itself shows that notice was not given as required by law, the jurisdiction does not attach; and, where it shows that the finding of jurisdiction upon which the court acted was insufficient, the finding of the court as to its jurisdiction is not conclusive, and the recital of proper service on the face of the decree makes no difference. Whitney v. Porter, 23 Ill. 445; Hemmer v. Wolfer, 124 Ill. 435, 16 N. E. 652.

Jurisdiction over the defendant in the di-voice suit could be obtained by publication in accordance with the statute of Arkansas; but, if process was not served or notice given as required by law, the court did not acquire jurisdiction, and its decree was void. Goudy v. Hall, 30 Ill. 109. Where the facts appearing on the face of the record show that the court of another state rendering a decree of divorce had no jurisdiction of the person of the defendant, the decree is void. Tucker v. People, 122 Ill. 583, 13 N. E. 809. In this case it appears on the face of the record that there was no affidavit of non-residence as required by the statute of Arkansas. A paper intended to be sworn to, annexed to the bill of complaint, and upon which the filing and notation of the clerk that a warning order was issued appeared, was neither signed nor sworn to. There was no finding by the court that any affidavit was made or filed, and there is nothing from which any presumption can arise that there was any other paper filed as an affidavit. The complaint with that paper attached was filed and the warning order was issued on April 24, 1900, and it is manifest that the unsworn paper was acted upon by the clerk as a basis for the warning order. It follows that the chancery court in Arkansas had no jurisdiction to enter the decree of divorce, and the decree was void. For that reason, the court did not err in dismissing the petition.

The decree of the Circuit Court is affirmed.

Petition for rehearing denied December 7, 1905.

WASHINGTON SUPREME COURT.

W. H. KNEELAND et al., Appts.,

v.

HARRIET KORTER.

(.... Wash.)

1. Tide land—grant by Congress.

Prior to the admission of a state into the Union Congress has power to grant tide land lying between high and low water mark within its boundaries.

2. Same—disclaimer by state.

Land to which a right to a patent has attached, as well as that actually patented at the time of the admission of a state into the Union, is included in a constitutional provision disclaiming title to tide land which has been patented by the Federal government.

3. Public land—effect of official survey.

The official survey of government land will be presumed to be correct after the lapse of many years, where its disturbance would upset titles and destroy rights of those who have in good faith relied on it.

Case Note.—That the United States government had no authority to grant to private individuals land under navigable water in the territories under its control is a doctrine so strange, when viewed in the light of fundamental principles, that it would seem that no court would have contended for its adoption; and yet such doctrine is advanced in Hinman v. Warren, 6 L.R.A. (N.S.)

Or. 409; and Illinois Steel Co. v. Bilot, 109 Wis. 418, 83 Am. St. Rep. 905, 84 N. W. 855, 85 N. W. 402. The Federal courts, however, notwithstanding some dicta to that effect, did not give their sanction to the doctrine. As shown in KNEELAND v. KORTER, the Supreme Court of the United States has distinctly asserted the power to make such grants; and the lower Federal Messrs. H. J. Snively and Troy & Falknor for respondent.

Root, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Appellants brought this action to recover possession of 11 acres of tide land, constituting a portion of a 51.31-acre tract of land surveyed, platted, and designated by the United States government as lot 3, section 13, township 19 N., range 3, W., Willamette meridian, in Thurston county, Washington. They claim title through various mesne conveyances from the Northern Pacific Railroad Company, which received a patent to said lot 3 in December, 1894, pursuant to an act of Congress, passed in 1864, granting to said railroad company the odd-numbered sections of public land within a certain distance from the line of railway to be constructed by said company. It is conceded that the railroad company completed the construction of that portion of the road affecting this locality in 1884. The filing of the map of definite location was, of course, prior thereto. Respondent having taken possession of said tide lands, this action was commenced, and a complaint setting forth the foregoing facts served and filed. A general demurrer was interposed by respondent and sustained by the trial court. Appellants electing to stand upon their complaint, the action was dismissed. From this judgment of dismissal, appeal is taken to this court.

It is conceded that the only question involved is as to the validity of appellants' title to the said premises, which lie between the lines or ordinary high and ordinary low water marks. Respondent contends that, as the tract in controversy is situated below "high-tide line" on the shores of Puget sound, an arm of the sea, the United States government had no power to dispose of it to the railway company, or at all, but could, and did, hold said tide land in trust for the state of Washington. Appellants assert the right of the United States government to grant such lands prior to the time Washington became a state. Appellants further contend that, if the United States government had no authority to grant these lands, yet, having assumed to do so, its grantees and their successors in interest therein can hold the same by virtue of § 2, art. 17, of the state Constitution, which reads as follows, to wit: "The state of Washington disclaims all title in and claim to all tide, swamp, and overflowed lands patented by the United States: Provided, the same is not impeached for fraud." Respondent answers this contention by the claim that this section of the Constitution does not apply to this character of lands, or, if it does, that it can apply only to lands for which patent had already issued at the time of the adoption of the state Constitution. Appellants urge that the virtue of a patent dates from the time of the inception of the grantee's rights in the land, and not merely from the time of the patent's issuance.

We think the complaint shows appellants to have a good title to the tide lands in question. Congress has power, at least for some purposes, to grant lands below high-water mark, where the same are situated within the geographical limits of a territory, although that power be no longer retained when such territory becomes a state. The Supreme Court of the United States, in an elaborate and carefully considered opinion by Mr. Justice Gray, in Shively v. Bowlby, courts took the same position in Case v. Loftus, 5 L. R. A. 684, 14 Sawy. 213, 39 Fed. 730; Carroll v. Price, 81 Fed. 137, and Heckman v. Sutter, 55 C. C. A. 635, 119 Fed. 83. The matter must, therefore, be considered as at rest. Farnham, Waters, p. 48, says: "While the territorial form of government exists, the United States government, as sovereign and proprietor, may dispose, absolutely, of all the public lands therein, whether above or below high-water mark. As sovereign, it has the jus publicum, or right of jurisdiction and control of the shores for the benefit of the public, as in the case of a public highway over private land; while, as proprietor, it has the jus privatum, or right of private property, which it can grant to private individuals subject to the jus publicum."

But the trust doctrine seems to have worked some confusion, and to have been carried beyond its true limits, in some of the cases. In England the King held title to the tide land simply because it was part of the sea, and the sea was part of his waste and demesne. Hale, De Jure Maris, 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

chap. 4. Until he parted with this waste, and surrendered the dominion over it to Parliament, he had a perfect right to grant it to individuals the same as he had to grant any other property owned by him. This grant, however, was subject to the paramount right of the public to navigate the water and fish in it; so that it came to be regarded as a fact that he held the sea, and could grant it subject to the public right of navigation and fishery, which imposed a trust upon the property. When the United States succeeded to the rights of the English Crown in this country, or acquired other property under the common-law doctrine, it held the absolute sovereignty over the tide land, subject to the same trust; that is, a trust of navigation and fishery in favor of the public, and not a trust to preserve title to the tide land for the benefit of the public, as has sometimes been asserted. This distinction, if kept in mind, will solve the difficulties in all cases, but has frequently been lost sight of. See Farnham, Waters, p. 194.

152 U. S. 1, 47, 48, 58, 38 L. ed. 331, 349, 352, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 548, 565, among other things said: "Notwithstanding the dicta contained in some of the opinions of this court already quoted, to the effect that Congress has no power to grant any land below high water mark of navigable waters in a territory of the United States, it is evident that this is not strictly true. Chief Justice Taney, in delivering an opinion already cited, after the subject had been much considered in the cases from Alabama, said: 'Undoubtedly Congress might have granted this land to the patentee, or confirmed his Spanish grant, before Alabama became a state.' Goodtitle ex dem. Pollard v. Kibbe, 9 How. 471, 478, 13 L. ed. 220, 223. . . . By the Constitution, as is now well settled, the United States, having rightfully acquired the territories, and being the only government which can impose laws upon them, have the entire dominion and sovereignty, national and municipal, Federal and state, over all the territories so long as they remain in a territorial condition. American Ins. Co. v. 356 Bales of Cotton, 1 Pet. 511, 542, 7 L. ed. 243, 255, Fed. Cas. No. 302a; Benner v. Porter, 9 How. 235, 242, 13 L. ed. 119, 123; *Cross v. S. 174, 181, 35 L. ed. 693, 695, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 949. . . . The United States, while they hold the country as a territory, having all the powers both of national and of municipal government, may grant, for appropriate purposes, titles or rights in the soil below high water mark of tide waters." In the case of Prosser v. Northern P. R. Co. 152 U. S. 59, 38 L. ed. 352, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 528, the same court, in passing upon the identical land grant now under consideration, said: "It may be admitted that the Congress of the United States, while the present state of Washington was a territory, had the power, in chartering a corporation to construct and maintain a railroad from Lake Superior to the Pacific coast, to grant to the corporation such title or rights in lands below highwater mark of tide waters of the territory as might be necessary or convenient for the building, maintenance, use, and enjoyment of such structures as might be required for commerce and transportation on the railroad and by sea, and for transferring goods and passengers between the railroad and seagoing vessels. *Shively v. C. & H. R. R. Co. 77 N. Y. 248; Re Staten Island Rapid Transit Co. 103 N. Y. 251, 8 N. E. 548." Under these decisions, we cannot hold the grant of these lands void, and no facts are now shown which render it voidable.

But, as to whether or not the United States government had power to, or as a matter of law did, grant and convey the particular tide land in controversy here, it is not necessary now to decide, as this case can be determined upon another ground. It is admitted that the United States government did issue to the railroad company a patent covering this land. It was not so issued until 1894; but the consideration on account of which it was issued had been furnished many years before Washington became a state, and the railroad company had been entitled to a patent ever since said time. When our state Constitution was adopted, and we became a state, it was known that the United States had in some instances granted, or assumed to grant, certain tide lands lying below high-water mark. In order to prevent any controversy over said lands, and to avoid disturbing rights claimed under such conveyances, § 2, art. 17, of the state Constitution was adopted. While this section is in terms a disclaimer merely, yet it has been held by this court to be in effect a conveyance of the state's interest in these lands and confirmatory of the government's grant thereof. In Scurry v. Jones, 4 Wash. 468, 30 Pac. 726, this court, speaking by Hoyt, J., used the following language: "The language of § 2 of article 17 is that 'the state of Washington disclaims all title in and claim to all tide, swamp, and overflowed lands patented by the United States: Provided, the same is not impeached for fraud,' and, fairly construed, we think it must be held to have in effect confirmed the patents which covered such lands; for, while it is true that the language used is not in form confirmatory, yet, when we take into consideration the situation of affairs, and the object to be accomplished by such disclaimer, we do not see how this object can be given force without construing the language used as substantially a grant to the patentees of the interest of the state in the land so situated. Under the law, as conceded by both parties, the lands had passed absolutely to the state, subject only to such clouds thereon as were caused by the same having been assumed to have been granted to private individuals by the United States. Under such circumstances, if the state disclaims all of its title to such lands, where the patents have been obtained without fraud, it certainly was for the benefit of someone, and it clearly could not have been for the benefit of the United States. . . . In our opinion, the interest of the state passed as fully to the grantees in such patents, or to those holding under them, as it would have done had there been express words of grant used in the Constitution. Any other interpretation of the language used would deprive it of any beneficial force whatever." In Cogswell v. Forrest, 14 Wash. 1, 43 Pac. 1098, this court, speaking by Dunbar, J., said: "This is tide land patented by the United States, and it is not impeached for fraud, and no matter whether the meander line or the body of water along which the meander line runs is the true boundary. The boundaries of this particular tract of land are settled by the grant in the plat and field notes. The land was granted according to the official grant of the survey of such lands, and the plat itself, and its notes, lines, and descriptions, become a part of the grant or deed by which they are conveyed as much as if the description was written out on the face of the deed itself. See Cragin v. Powell, 128 U. S. 691, 32 L. ed. 566, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 203. The constitutional convention of this state, with a commendable sense of honor, thought it but simple justice to disclaim title to all tide lands patented by the United States, without regard to the technical right of the general government to convey the same; and there is nothing in the language of the Constitution that would indicate that the convention intended to make any distinction between lands which had been patented through the medium of the donation act and those which had been patented under the pre-emption or commutation acts, or even of private entry. The principle involved in this case, we think, was identical with the principle involved in Scurry v. Jones, supra, and the judgment will therefore in all respects be affirmed."

To the contention that this section of the Constitution applies only to lands patented at the time of its adoption, it may be answered that such a construction would sacrifice the spirit of the section. Can it be supposed that the Constitution makers intended to discriminate between two persons who had, in good faith and for value, become entitled to all of the government's property rights in certain portions of such lands—one of whom had already received his evidence thereof (the patent), and the other of whom had not, although equally entitled thereto? It seems to us that this would be to give consideration to form rather than substance, and to make a distinction justified neither in law nor in right. It has been the holding of the courts that the virtue of a patent dates from the time the patentee became entitled to it, and not merely from the date of its issuance. In the case of Stark v. Starr, 6 Wall. 402-418, 18 L. ed 925-930, 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

the United States Supreme Court, speaking by Mr. Justice Field, used the following language: "The right to a patent, once vested is treated by the government, when dealing with the public lands, as equivalent to a patent issued. When in fact the patent does issue, it relates back to the inception of the right of the patentee, so far as it may be necessary, to cut off intervening claimants." In the case of Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. Kansas P. R. Co. 97 U. S. 491-497, 24 L. ed. 1095-1097, in discussing a railroad grant, the United States Supreme Court said: "As to the intent of Congress in the grant to the plaintiff there can be no reasonable doubt. It was to aid in the construction of the road by a gift of lands along its route, without reservation of rights, except such as were specifically mentioned, the location of the route being left within certain general limits to the action of the plaintiff. When the location was made, and the sections granted ascertained, the title of the plaintiff took effect by relation as of the date of the act, except as to the reservations mentioned: the act having the same operation upon the sections as if they had been specifically described in it. . . . The construction thus given to the grant in this case is, of course, applicable to all similar congressional grants." The railroad became entitled, in 1884, to whatever patent the government could, under its grant, issue to these lands. It was at that time entitled to, and was the owner of, every property interest in said land which the United States government could, by virtue of said grant, convey. It was such owner, and so entitled by reason of having fully complied with the conditions subsequent of the grant; the statute constituting a grant in præsentia, with conditions subsequent. Buttz v. Northern P. R. Co. 119 U. S. 55. 30 L. ed. 330, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 100; St. Joseph & D. C. R. Co. v. Baldwin, 103 U. S. 426, 26 L. ed. 578.

This case is readily distinguishable from that of Mann v. Tacoma Land Co. 153 U. S. 273, 38 L. ed. 714, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 820. In that case an attempt was made to locate Valentine scrip upon tide lands, no part of which was subject to such scrip. The would-be locator had no rights whatever to the tide lands he was seeking to file upon with the scrip, and there was no legal authority by which he ever could, with said scrip, acquire any rights in or to any portion of such lands. In the case at bar there is no question as to the railway company's right to a patent to the principal part of lot 3; but it is contended that said lot, as surveyed, contains certain lands it should not, and that the patent is invalid as to such portion. In other words, the survey is claimed to have been erroneous. It may sometimes be difficult to definitely and accurately locate the line of ordinary high tide. Physical changes going on for a number of years may alter the location of said line. There must be, touching a survey, some authority recognized, for legal purposes, as correct. It would seem that the survey made by the United States surveyors, after standing forty years or more, as has this, should constitute such authority. It should be presumed as correct in a case where its disturbance would upset titles and destroy the rights of those who have in good faith relied upon it for many years. "The official surveys made by the government are not open to collateral attack in an action at law between private parties." Whitaker v. McBride, 197 U. S. 510, 49 L. ed. 857, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 530, and cases cited; Stoneroad v. Stoneroad, 158 U. S. 240, 39 L. ed. 966, 15 Sup. Ct. Rep. 822; Russell v. Maxwell Land Grant Co. 158 U. S. 253, 39 L. ed. 971, 15 Sup. Ct. Rep. 827; Horne v. Smith, 159 U. S. 40, 40 L. ed. 68, 15 Sup. Ct. Rep. 988. In Hardin v. Jordan, 140 U. S. 371, 35 L. ed. 428, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 808, 838, the Supreme Court said: "In our judgment, the grants of the government for lands bounded on streams and other waters, without any reservation or restriction of terms, are to be construed as to their effect according to the law of the state in which the lands lie." In speaking of the effect of a patent, the United States Supreme Court, in Whitney v. Morrow, 112 U. S. 693-695, 28 L. ed. 871, 872, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 333, 334, said: "If by a legislative declaration a specific tract is confirmed to anyone, his title is not strengthened by a subsequent patent from the government. That instrument may be of great service to him in proving his title, if contested, and the extent of his land, especially when proof of its boundaries would otherwise rest in the uncertain recollection of witnesses. It would thus be an instrument of quiet and security to him, but it could not add to the validity and completeness of the title confirmed by the act of Congress. Langdeau v. Hanes, 21 Wall. 521, 22 L. ed. 606; Ryan v. Carter, 93 U. S. 78, 23 L. ed. 807; Riyp v. Spring, 5 Sawy. 209, 216, Fed. Cas. No. 14,180." See also, upon this and other points, the case of Deseret Salt Co. v. Tarpey, 142 U. S. 241, 35 L. ed. 999, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 158. As the railroad company had been entitled to its patent long before the adoption of the state Constitution, we think it was as much entitled to the benefit of the disclaimer of § 2 as if it had already received its patent at the time. We can see no reason for discrimination, and cannot hold that the people intended any.

It is urged by the respondent that the action of the United States government in issuing the patent for these tide lands was a mistake on the part of some of its officers or servants; that the government did not intend to grant or convey any land below high-water mark. Ordinarily it is not to be presumed that public officers or servants have made a mistake in a given matter. The presumption is usually the other way. But, suppose it was a mistake; is it not one of the very "mistakes" or circumstances which the people had in mind at the time they adopted the disclaimer section, supra? When Congress passed the statute making the land grant to this railway company, it did not assume to grant a certain number of acres, or a certain number of sections, or any definite quantity; but it undertook to grant a certain class of sections of land, and their identity was defined by reference to the system of government survey. In other words, the railway company was granted every alternate section located within 40 miles of the line established by the definite location of its railway line. These sections were not defined as so many acres surveyed or platted by the railway company, or the county surveyor, or state surveyor; but they were the sections as shown, and to be shown, by the maps and plats prepared by the government from the field notes and surveys of its own surveyors. In Cragin v. Powell, 128 U. S. 691, 696, 32 L. ed. 566, 568, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 203, 205, the United States Supreme Court said: "It is a well-settled principle that, when lands are granted according to an official plat of the survey of such lands, the plat itself, with all its notes, lines, descriptions, and landmarks, becomes as much a part of the grant or deed by which they are conveyed, and controls, so far as limits are concerned, as if such descriptive features were written out upon the face of the deed or the grant itself." The land in question was surveyed years prior to the time of the admission of this state into the Union, and prior to the filing of the map of definite location of route by the railway company. The enactment of the statute, the filing of the map of definite location, and the survey and platting of these lands, all having taken place years before Washington attained statehood, it must be presumed that the railway company was holding and claiming all of said lot 3, including these tide lands, in accordance with said government survey, and that the Constitution makers had in mind all such grantees when they adopted the disclaimer aforesaid. The mere fact that the patent, which is but an evidence of a right earned before its issuance, was not actually issued until after the adoption of the Constitution, can in our opinion constitute no good reason for depriving the grantees of the benefits sought to be conferred by this section of the Constitution. If, as respondent claims, a mistake was made, it first occurred at the time the lands were surveyed. As no attempt has been made during these many years to correct said mistake, and as the government itself, in issuing the patent, recognized the same boundaries established long before by its surveyors, we are unable to see wherein the ends of justice would be subserved by this court at this time overturning appellants' title upon the theory that the government officials made a mistake. This lot 3, including said tide land, has been sold and conveyed several times; all grantees evidently assuming the description to be correct and the title good. To hold that neither appellants nor any of their predecessors in interest ever had any title to these lands would in our opinion be to permit the very result which the disclaimer clause in the state Constitution was intended to avoid. We conceive the facts set forth in appellants' complaint sufficient to constitute a cause of action.

The judgment of the honorable Superior Court is reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings.

Crow, Hadley, and Dunbar, JJ., concur.

Rudkin, J., dissenting:

It seems to me the majority opinion assumes the very question in controversy in this case. It assumes that the United States granted, or attempted to grant, this 11 acres below ordinary high tide, covered and uncovered by the flow and ebb of the tide, to the Northern Pacific Railroad Company by the act of July 2, 1864, and then concludes that this grant was confirmed by § 2 of article 17 of the state Constitution, which provides as follows: "The state of Washington disclaims all title in and claim to all tide, swamp, and overflowed lands patented by the United States: Provided, the same is not impeached for fraud." In my opinion the assumption on which the majority bases its conclusion has no foundation in law or in fact. The defendant contends that Congress could not make a valid grant of the tide lands within the territory of Washington, as the United States held such lands in trust for the future state. The plaintiffs contend the contrary. I do not think that that question is involved in this case. If any proposition is settled by the decisions of the Federal courts, it is this: That 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

general grants of land, such as the homestead laws, the pre-emption laws, the donation acts, the grant to the Northern Pacific Railroad Company, and all similar acts and grants, do not extend to or include tide lands. In Mann v. Tacoma Land Co. 153 U. S. 273, 38 L. ed. 714, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 820, Justice Brewer, in delivering the opinion of the court, said: "It is settled that the general legislation of Congress in respect to public lands does not extend to tide lands." The grant to the Northern Pacific Railroad Company stopped at ordinary high tide on Puget sound. There is no more pretense for claiming that it extended beyond this than there would be for claiming that it extended beyond the 40-mile limit. The only effect of the extension of the public surveys, the filing of the map of definite location, and the construction of the road, was to locate the grant. It will scarcely be contended that the ministerial officers of the United States, in erroneously extending the public surveys below ordinary high tide, carried land grants with them. Had the plaintiffs in this action no other right or title than that conferred by the act of July 2, 1864, and were they relying upon such title alone, I have little doubt that a showing that the land was below ordinary high tide, and was therefore not included within the grant, would be a full and complete defense to the action.

Was the claim of plaintiffs, or their predecessor in interest, confirmed by the constitutional provision above quoted? I cannot believe that it was. In Mann v. Tacoma Land Co. supra, the court said that the state "excluded from its claim of title lands which the government had, in the due administration of its Land Department, disposed of by a patent." Let us look for a moment at the conditions which confronted the framers of the Constitution. The state to be asserted "its ownership to the beds and shores of all navigable waters in the state up to and including the line of ordinary high tide in waters where the tide ebbs and flows, and up to and including the line of ordinary high water within the banks of all navigable rivers and lakes." Const. art. 17, § 1. With in the knowledge of the framers of that instrument, patents had already issued for portions of these tide lands, and in justice to these patentees the next section disclaimed all title in and claim to all tide, swamp, and overflowed lands patented by the United States. The disclaimer only extended to such tide lands as had already been patented. It cannot be maintained that the state commissioned the general government to patent tide lands in the future, and I do not understand that the majority so hold.

As heretofore stated, the general land laws and general land grants did not extend to or include tide lands. Therefore all existing patents issued under the general land laws for tide lands were issued without authority of law, and were void. This constitutional provision was in effect a grant of these lands from the state, and this court so held in Scurry v. Jones, 4 Wash. 468, 30 Pac. 726. As a grant from a sovereign state, it should be strictly construed. Nothing passed by implication or by intentment. A constitution is framed with much greater care and deliberation than an ordinary statute, and greater effect is always given to the language used in the former. If I concede that the disclaimer should not be confined to lands patented, which I do not, it should not be extended beyond the lands which were the equivalent of patented at most; and these lands were not. The addition of the proviso, "provided the same is not impeached for fraud," affords conclusive evidence to my mind that the framers of the Constitution had in mind the claims of individuals patented under the general land laws in due course of administration, and not cases like the present; for how could a grant by Congress be impeached for fraud?

Let us confront the constitutional convention with the facts in this case as they stood at the time of its deliberations. The Northern Pacific Railroad Company had no legal or moral claim to this land. It was not within its grant, and no patent had issued. The utmost that could be claimed was that the public surveys had been inadvertently or erroneously extended below ordinary high tide; for, as said by the court in Barney v. Keokuk, 94 U. S. 324, 24 L. ed. 224: "The United States has wisely abstained from extending (if it could extend) its survey and grants beyond the limits of high water." Would the convention have confirmed the title of the railroad company to this land, and to all lands similarly situated under such circumstances? I can conceive of but one answer to this question, and that answer is not found in the majority opinion. It seems to me that the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in Mann v. Tacoma Land Co., supra, if followed, disposes of every question involved in this appeal. The plaintiff in error in that case, prior to the adoption of the state Constitution, had selected and scripped certain tide lands in Elliott bay, and the selection had been approved by the local land office. He had received a certificate from the local land office, certifying that he was entitled to a patent for the land selected as soon as the lands were surveyed by the general government. It was contended in his behalf that his title was confirmed by the constitutional provision relied on by the plaintiffs in this case. In answer to that contention the Supreme Court of the United States said: "Reliance is also placed on article 17, § 2, of the Constitution of the state of Washington, which reads: 'The state of Washington disclaims all title in and claim to all tide, swamp, and overflowed lands patented by the United States: Provided, the same is not impeached for fraud.' In respect to this it is enough to say that these lands were not patented. It is doubtless true, as said by this court in Stark v. Starr, 6 Wall. 418, 18 L. ed. 930, that 'the right to a patent once vested is treated by the government, when dealing with the public lands, as equivalent to a patent issued.' But here there was no right to a patent. The entry in the local land office and the receipt issued by the local land officers were unauthorized acts, and gave no right to a patent; and it cannot be supposed that the state of Washington, when it excluded from its claim of title lands which the government had in the due administration of its Land Department disposed of by a patent, meant thereby to exclude every tract for which a local land officer might wrongfully issue a receiver's receipt." To this we might well add, "nor to exclude every tract over which the ministerial officers of the government had wrongfully extended the public surveys." The above decision also disposes of what is said in the majority opinion about the doctrine of relation.

In conclusion, the opinion of the majority rests upon the following statement contained therein: "The railroad became entitled, in 1884, to whatever patent the government could issue to these lands. It was at that time entitled to, and was the owner of, every property interest in said land which the United States government could, by virtue of said grant, convey. It was such owner and so entitled by reason of having fully complied with the conditions subsequent of the grant; the statute constituting a grant in præsenti, with conditions subsequent." What I have said sufficiently shows that this declaration is entirely inconsistent with the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States. The Northern Pacific Railroad Company acquired no interest whatever in this land in 1884, or prior thereto, or at any time, until a patent was wrongfully issued years after the adoption of the state Constitution.

For these reasons I dissent from the majority opinion.

MASSACHUSETTS SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT.

COMMONWEALTH OF MASSACHUSETTS

v.

HENRY D. SISSON.

SAME

v.

FRANK SISSON.

(.... Mass.)

1. Legislative regulations—hearing.

That the act of public authorities in forbidding the casting of sawdust from a particular mill into a particular stream is not a general regulation does not make it a judicial act, which will entitle the mill owner to a hearing.

2. Water course—protection from pollution.

The legislature may forbid the casting of sawdust into streams, for the preservation of the edible fish.

3. Pollution of water course—prescriptive right against public.

The unrestrained exercise for thirty years of the right to cast sawdust into a stream gives no prescriptive rights which will interfere with the public right to regulate such use for the preservation of food fishes.

4. Legislative delegation of regulation of stream.

The legislature may delegate to a board having peculiar knowledge upon the subject the selection of the streams in which fish are of sufficient value to warrant the prohibition of the casting of sawdust into the stream.

Case Note.—There is no doubt that the state has a right to regulate fisheries either in public or private streams, and to adopt appropriate means for the preservation of food fishes for the benefit of the people. Farnham, Waters, p. 1393. For this purpose the legislature has the power to forbid the casting into streams or water ways of substances which will destroy fish or drive them from the stream. Cartwright v. Canandaigua Gaslight Co. 32 Hun, 403; State v. Kroenert, 13 Wash. 644, 43 Pac. 876; State v. American Forcite Powder Mfg. Co. 50 N. J. L. 75, 11 Atl. 127; Blydenburgh v. Miles, 39 Conn. 484.

And the pollution of the water of a river by means of refuse from a sawmill so as to destroy the fish therein is a nuisance. People v. Truckee Lumber Co. 116 Cal. 397, 39 L. R. A. 581, 58 Am. St. Rep. 183, 48 Pac. 374. It being a public nuisance, the rule applicable to such nuisances generally applies, and a right to maintain the nuisance cannot be acquired by prescription or lapse of time. As shown by the cases cited in the note to Leahan v. Cochrane, 53 L. R. A. 891, the cases are uniform to this effect, and of those especially in point attention may be called to Lewis v. Stein, 16 Ala. 214, 50 Am. Dec. 177, which held that no length of time 1 L.R.A. (N.S.)

5. Legislative commission—action without sworn evidence.

A board of commissioners having authority to determine what streams contain fish of sufficient value to warrant the prohibition of casting sawdust into the stream for their preservation are not bound to act on sworn evidence.

6. Nuisance—declaration without hearing.

A hearing is not necessary to enable the legislature, on a particular state of facts, to declare a thing to be a nuisance per se.

7. Same—abatement—compensation.

Where, under the police power, a legislature declares a thing to be a nuisance per se, and orders it to be abated, no compensation is due.

EXCEPTIONS by defendants to a ruling of the Superior Court for Berkshire County, made during the trial of an action against defendants for violation of an order of fish commissioners prohibiting the discharge of sawdust into a river, which directed a verdict in favor of the commonwealth. Overruled.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Herbert C. Joyner, and H. M. Whiting, for defendants:

Defendants were entitled to a hearing.

would exempt a person from a penalty for allowing sawdust to fall into a creek, thereby impairing the quality of the water; North Point Consol. Irrig. Co. v. Utah & S. L. Canal Co. 16 Utah, 246, 40 L. R. A. 851, 67 Am. St. Rep. 607, 52 Pac. 168, holding that the right to foul waters of a canal from which a number of persons obtain water for irrigation and domestic purposes could not be secured by lapse of time.
